Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman says that he can not see the necessity for employing any more men. I call attention to what Mr. Schlesinger said——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not say anything about any more men. I voted with the gentleman on the question of men and the amount of money that could be expended.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But the gentleman is now speaking with reference to increasing the salaries. I wish to call attention to what Mr. Schlesinger said on this provision. I asked him what he would do with this if it were awarded, and he said:

> Mr. SCHLESINGER. I would first try to get an admiralty lawyer in New York at the head of the department there, which is sadly in need of it. We probably could not get one under $20,000. Then I would like to get about four or five more special counsel, who would be very high-priced men. I would like to put them on some of those very special cases, and have them to investigate them and run them down. That in itself would take pretty nearly $100,000.

Mr. MANN. Very likely. What they would do would be to take the men they have now in the office and increase their pay. We reduced it last year. We cut it down last year. They were receiving more money when they went into the service of the Government, and we reduced the pay of the attorneys, so that their highest should be only $11,000 a year, and not one of them quit, so gentlemen say. I have great respect for good lawyers. They receive high fees, but I think it is time that this Republican House stopped paying these enormous outrageous salaries that are not necessary. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, as the House knew the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] last August, and even later at the time of the consideration of the reclassification bill, he was justly entitled to the reputation of an economist, and in my personal association with him I have always valued his good judgment in matters of public expenditures. He seems, however, to have fallen under some kind of hypnotic spell, since he conducted the hearings on the bill we are now considering, especially on that part of the bill relating to appropriations for the Shipping Board. Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee has read an interesting statement made by the gentleman from Indiana last August, when appropriations for the Shipping Board were being considered in the deficiency bill, and I wish to submit a further very strong statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] at the same time. It related to the employment of high-salaried men in the legal department of the Shipping Board, and I am informed that the parties referred to are still in the employ of the Shipping Board, and one of them will likely have his salary increased, if the board is now authorized by this bill to grant increased salaries to seven attorneys, as proposed. Quoting from the gentleman's [Mr. WOOD] speech before the House last August, on page 4934, I read as follows:

I want to call attention of the committee to an imposition upon those in charge of the legal department of the Shipping Board. I called the attention of Congress two years ago to the same character of graft then being practiced on the Government. At that time, directly after the armistice was signed, there was appointed what was called a War Claims Board, and the Assistant Secretary of War was at the head of the board.

There was a man by the name of Fairbanks, who came from some little town up in Vermont—St. Johnsbury, I think, who testified that he was receiving $1,000 a month for the service he was rendering; that prior to coming here he never earned more than $2,500 a year in the practice of law. He was a lieutenant in the Judge Advocate's office and resigned to take this position paying $1,000 a month. There were 75 of these men getting all the way from $7,500 a year up to $12,000, $15,000, and $17,000 a year. We were given to understand that they would be continued but a short time. I now find that this man Fairbanks was continued in that job until about four months ago, when he was disconnected on the incoming of the present administration——

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. In one minute, when I finish reading from the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]:

Then he attempted to set up a business in this town for himself, but by some hokus pokus we find him again as one of the attorneys for the Shipping Board, drawing not $12,000 a year but $15,000 a year.

In reply, then, to a question by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] as to whether these parties would be dropped from the pay roll, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] made this statement:

They will not be put off the pay roll by this bill, but their salaries will be fixed by the limitation in it. That is as far as we could go; more added would have made it subject to a point of order. But I hope there will be permanent legislation coming from the proper committee whereby it will be made absolutely impossible in all future time for men to grab the Government by the neck in a time of its distress.

The House will remember that this was the attitude of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] last August, and yet we now find him advocating the employment of seven attorneys for the Shipping Board, without any limit as to the salary to be paid them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLIVER. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. I only wanted to say I think there ought to be a bill introduced in the House that no Member of the House should be allowed to quote another Member of the House back further than 30 days. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER. I think it would save considerable embarrassment if such a bill should pass. [Laughter.] The question propounded by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] was certainly very pertinent to the matter now under discussion, because it developed this state of affairs, that on Saturday afternoon, against protest from Members on both sides of the aisle—and this is not a partisan question—the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] objected to limitations being placed on the Adjustment Board in the expenditure of the $50,000,000 appropriated in this bill for the settlement of claims. The discussion disclosed that a large part of the $50,000,000 might be used for the purpose of setting what may be termed "equitable claims," and not alone in the payment of claims constituting a legal and enforceable liability against the Government. All claims presented, if viewed from the viewpoint of the claimant, presents some grounds of equity, but surely the House was in error when it refused to place a proper limitation on the Adjustment Board in the expenditure of this $50,000,000 so as to prevent the payment of claims on which no suit could be sustained against the Government in any court and which constitute no legal liability against the Government.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Was the gentleman here when we adopted that original amendment requiring these claims to be legal claims?

Mr. OLIVER. No, sir. No such amendment was adopted.

Mr. MANN. Such an amendment was agreed to, with a statement in favor of it by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. OLIVER. I have great respect for the accuracy of the recollection of the gentleman from Illinois, but he is in error as to that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman was not here.

Mr. OLIVER. I was here, and taking part in the debate, but the gentleman was silent. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] will remember how much the gentleman from Illinois is in error.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? I appeal to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], who offered the amendment, which was agreed to, if I am not correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No such amendment was adopted Saturday.

Mr. MANN. Maybe the gentleman from Wisconsin was not here. We agreed to that amendment this morning.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But a reader of the RECORD would never know it.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not want this colloquy taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is in error as to the amendment adopted. He will find that the House refused to adopt an amendment limiting the expenditure of this $50,000,000 to the payment of legal claims. The amount will be placed at the disposal of the adjustment board, and so far as any limitations now carried in this bill are concerned the board will not be precluded from considering claims other than those constituting a legal liability against the Government.

Mr. MANN. We agreed to that amendment which was offered last Saturday by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], and we agreed to that amendment this morning.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Here is the amendment:

Provided, That no claim shall be paid out of the amount appropriated herein unless the Shipping Board shall find that such claim grew out of an agreement, express or implied, entered into with the United States Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation or their legal representatives.

Mr. OLIVER. I am surprised that the gentleman from Illinois—as good a lawyer as he is——

Mr. MANN. I admit that.

Mr. OLIVER (continuing). Would, for a moment, insist that such an amendment will confine the Adjustment Board to the consideration of claims constituting a legal and enforcible liability against the Government. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] refused on Saturday last to accept an amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], which sought to require a written opinion from the general counsel of the Shipping Board as to the legality of all claims passed on by the Adjustment Board before payment was made. In the discussion of that amendment the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] referred to claims which might not constitute a legal claim against the Government, and yet which the Adjustment Board might find it desirable to settle. I call the attention of the gentleman of Illinois to the fact that "a claim growing out of an agreement, express or implied, entered into with the United States Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation," may not necessarily constitute a legal liability against the Government. In fact, it has been stated that the holders of these claims, which it is proposed to settle out of this $50,000,000 appropriation, recognize that they have no claim enforcible in the courts, and for that reason no suits have been filed seeking to enforce the same, yet we, in this bill, have appropriated $50,000,000 to enable the Adjustment Board to settle—not claims pending in court—but claims which have been outstanding for more than two years and on which no suits have been brought, and for which no legal liability exists.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 29, line 11, after the figures "$11,000," add: "But no compensation or salary shall exceed $25,000."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment with the idea of securing an expression from the House, and if it is adopted or enacted into law as an expression of the Congress, the time has well arrived when we can get along with these extremely high-salaried officials, even for this important business like the business of the Shipping Board. We pay our Cabinet officers, who operate the executive departments, equally as important as this business which we are trying to get rid of, $12,000 a year. Now, Mr. Powell, I think it is, who comes here and is at the head of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, has a salary, I understand, much below $25,000 a year—gets a dollar a month. He is running this Emergency Fleet Corporation and is bringing order out of chaos, and is putting regulations resulting in efficiency and organization into effect. But we pay $35,000 to two or three officials and $28,000, perhaps, to others, and I believe if we enact that no compensation shall exceed $25,000 we will not be hampering the efficiency of this organization, nor will we be restricting the field from which we can secure competent and efficient men to direct the destinies of this business.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is it proposed by your amendment that out of this appropriation not more than $25,000 shall be paid for any salary?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. No; not out of this appropriation.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Out of any appropriation?

Mr. MANN. The provision in the bill is that not more than so many officials shall be paid——

Mr. WALSH. Shall be paid——

Mr. MANN. Eleven thousand dollars, or no compensation or salary shall exceed $25,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what I understood—that no part of this appropriation shall be paid in excess of $25,000 to anybody. Is that what you mean?

Mr. WALSH. The Shipping Board shall not pay more than $25,000.

Mr. MANN. The Shipping Board shall not pay more than $25,000.

Mr. WALSH. It might be paid out of funds that are available. It is the maximum they can pay for salaries. Now, if they are gradually reducing these claims, if they are gradually perfecting an organization for the future, if they are gradually getting plans laid whereby they can turn this fleet over to private ownership, I say that $25,000 now, particularly with the depression that exists in shipping circles, is a highly remunerative salary to be paid these men. If they are not willing to take it, let them go back and accept their positions with the competing lines and go into competition with the Emergency Fleet ships. But I believe we are not restricting the field in any sense which would deprive us of competent people, men who will come down here and give their services at salaries at a little more than $2,000 a month, especially when we have been able to get Mr. Powell, formerly at the head of the Fore River Ship Corporation, a mighty good shipbuilder, one of the officials of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, for a dollar a month to supervise and be the vice president in charge of all these high-salaried officials. So when we say the limit should be $25,000 a year we are not doing the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation any injury whatever. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I shall come to the conclusion pretty soon that I am on trial along with the Shipping Board here. [Laughter.]

Now, it does not make any more difference to me than it makes to anybody else here what you do with this Shipping Board, whether you kick it into the river or not. It has caused me more trouble than it has caused anybody else, I expect. I have tried as best I could to get the facts before you, so that you can do with it exactly as you please. It is like Champ Clark's hound dog. Everybody thinks it will be popular to kick at it. But stop a moment and consider what you are possibly doing. We have been talking here in Congress for about half a century concerning the establishment of an American merchant marine. If we are ever going to establish one, it is now or never, because we have less excuse now for failure to establish an American merchant marine than we have had in a quarter of a century or will have again for three-quarters of a century, in my opinion. We have this great aggregation of property on our hands, scattered all over the world, operating as best it can under the most difficult and trying circumstances, when the greatest skill and ability must be exercised in order to make it operate at all, until such time as conditions grow better and something may be realized out of it.

Now, gentlemen, do not confuse the three men who are getting $35,000 a year with the lawyers. There is not a lawyer who is getting or can get since this amendment has passed more than $11,000 a year, and the head of the legal department, who I know is making a sacrifice here of $100,000 a year, has reduced his own salary in order that criticism might not be leveled against him.

Mr. Powell, who has been working for a dollar a month, has been subjected to the most severe criticism because he has been working here for a dollar a month, and he is criticized as having some selfish interest in view; otherwise, it is said, he would not be here working for a dollar a month.

Now, we are criticized because three of these men are working at salaries of $35,000 a year. Who are they? Mr. Powell does not pretend to be an operator. He is an organizer. It takes organization now; and he is giving his services to this country, and all the while is being damned for it by men in this House. As to these men who are getting $35,000 a year, if you will read the hearings you will find they are men who are making a sacrifice to come here and do it. They are not as rich as Mr. Powell. Is it right to ask these men to give up the possible opportunities of their lives at the head of the greatest industry in the world and say that they shall be hampered and scandalized and criticized because of their performance of patriotic duties? Neither of these three men is a lawyer. There are just three of them receiving $35,000 a year. One of them is Mr. Smull, one of the greatest ship operators in the world. Another is Mr. Love, with an equal reputation, and the other is Mr. Frey, from the Pacific coast.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is Mr. Frey getting $35,000? He was getting only $25,000 last August.

Mr. DICKINSON. Two of these men are receiving $35,000 and one is receiving $30,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Are you going to take a chance? Mr. Smull testified that he could not afford to be here for a cent less and will not stay. If Mr. Smull is rendering $100,000 worth of service for $35,000, would we not be foolish in striking his name off the books? Is there a man here who feels that he would like to take the responsibility of getting a man to succeed Mr. Smull? If there is, let him hold up his hand.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman from Alabama may be able to furnish the man. Who is he?

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am only going to answer the gentleman's question. I think I could furnish a man for less than $30,000. But what I wanted to do was to remind the gentleman of the fact that few men in the shipping business to-day are making more than $25,000 at the present time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. And a lot of shipping concerns are keeping their high-salaried men at a loss in order to prevent a further loss of money in the future. The time when you want big men, strong men, courageous men, is in the hour of distress. That is when you need them. If you want a competent commander to lead your army, you need him most when the army is demoralized in order to have him put it in fighting trim. We have a lot of these fellows who can fight sunshiny-day battles, but we have few who can fight through the clouds and the mire and the mud.

Gentlemen, you can do exactly as you please. Yours is the responsibility, not mine. I say you are making a great mistake if you do the thing that is proposed by this amendment. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but I rose not for the purpose of discussing that particularly, but to correct an error that I made. I stated, in referring to Mr. Gaines, that he had not appeared before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. I know Mr. Gaines very well. He is a clever gentleman. I understand that in making my statement regarding him I did him an injustice. He did come before our committee once or twice, appearing on the matter of the load line, a matter about which our committee is as well versed as anybody else. My reference to Mr. Gaines was not intended to be personal. I hope it will not be so understood. Nevertheless he is a capable lawyer from an inland State; not an admiralty lawyer. If we keep up this high rate of salaries we shall have the Shipping Board to resemble the bunghole of a molasses barrel, with all the bees buzzing around it for something sweet and juicy. I think you can get good men and able men who will devote all their time to carrying on the work of the litigation of the Shipping Board.

I hope we have not got somebody employed there to study the policies to be advocated, because the Members of Congress ought to study the policies necessary for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. It will not be done by high-priced employees. It will not be done by high-priced lawyers to represent the Shipping Board in its various and sundry suits. It will be done by the establishment of a policy that is the reverse of some of the policies we have had heretofore. It will be done by the establishment of a policy that will enable the American merchant marine to furnish to the world the cheapest unit of transportation. We will never get it by any other means, and I hope that this Congress will not be led by high prices and by high salaries of lawyers and managers to say that the American merchant marine can not compete with the world unless Congress goes into the coffers of the Treasury of the United States and pays a vast subsidy. I am afraid all this legal talent is leading up to an argument for a great subsidy to run the American merchant marine in competition with the other merchant marines of the world. We can not pay the big salaries that private corporations pay that have monopolies of the great necessities of life, because when they pay a vast salary all in the world they do is to turn around and charge it up to the public; but when we pay a vast salary we must tax the people who support the Government to pay that salary. I hope this Congress will do what its leaders have been attempting to do. I hope it will get on its economical clothes and let us adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment. I am going to take only a moment. I ask unanimous consent that a short article be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that a short article be read by the Clerk in his time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Kansas City Star, Jan. 26, 1922.]

KICK ON KANSAS MOB LAW—NEXT LEGISLATURE MAY BE ASKED TO REPEAL IT—FEELING IS GROWING OVER STATE THAT CITIES ARE NOT SAFE UNDER NEW INTERPRETATION OF THE STATUTE.

Kansas towns are finding the State's anti-mob law a "costly" statute.

Kansas City, Kans., has 59 suits pending against the city now, totaling $949,978. Twenty-six of these are the result of trouble in the packing-house strike. The suits range from $5 to $25,000.

Independence has had judgments returned against it for $37,250 and other suits still pending as a result of a race-war outbreak there.

Under the law, three or more persons banded together to commit depredations on life or property constitute a mob. As a result, a large number of suits have been brought against municipalities held responsible under the law, and now there is a demand for its repeal.

It is quite probable that the next session of the Kansas Legislature will be asked to repeal or modify the law under which the supreme court has ruled that three or more persons constitute a mob for whose illegal action the municipality can be held responsible.

The feeling is growing over Kansas that no city is safe under the new interpretation of this statute, and the judgments recently obtained against the city of Independence, as well as the suit brought in Wyandotte County by the jeweler whose store was robbed by three men, have served to give cumulative force to this sentiment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question being taken, there were on a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana)—ayes 58, noes 16.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the sums appropriated in this act shall be available for the payment of certified public accountants, their agents or employees, and all auditing of every nature requiring the services of outside auditors shall be furnished through the Bureau of Efficiency: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall limit the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation from employing outside auditors to audit claims in litigation for or against the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Is this practically the existing law, or is it a new provision, inserted at the suggestion of Mr. Brown?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Brown has not anything to do with it. They have been doing their own auditing.

Mr. MANN. Why should they call on the Bureau of Efficiency? What auditors do the Bureau of Efficiency have?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This is the language submitted by the Bureau of the Budget. The Bureau of Efficiency has expert auditors. There is no question about that.

Mr. MANN. Why should they have expert auditors? What has the Bureau of Efficiency to do with auditing?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am utterly amazed at the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. That is not uncommon. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; and it seems to be growing more frequent. If the Bureau of Efficiency is a real Bureau of Efficiency it must have an auditing department within itself. How could they measure efficiency without auditing?

Mr. MANN. Certainly they do advise some departments about auditing, but they are not practical auditors that ever I heard.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. On the other hand, they are practical auditors and have in their employ some of the most practical auditors in the employ of the Government. I am utterly amazed that the gentleman from Illinois did not know that. He generaly knows almost everything.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know better than that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman does not know any better than that, and if he does not know that he is not alive to the situation.

Mr. MANN. Here is the situation: We have a general accounting department, which is the auditing department of the Government. We have an auditing department in the Shipping Board. We have a few teachers of auditing in the Bureau of Efficiency who are not in the main practical auditors themselves. Now it is proposed to have them create a new bureau to audit the Shipping Board.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; that is not the purpose at all.

Mr. MANN. That is what it says, practically.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Before this time they have been employing independent auditors. They had the Montgomery Auditing Co. and some other auditing company, and were paying out a large amount of money for work that ought to be done by the auditors employed by the Government for auditing the business of the Government.

Mr. MANN. This is not any inhibition against the employment of outside auditors.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is an inhibition except under the proviso.

Mr. MANN. Except that the outside auditors shall be furnished through the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is all. What peculiar qualifications has the Bureau of Efficiency for selecting auditors for the Shipping Board rather than having the Shipping Board select its own auditors?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The Bureau of Efficiency has its auditors, who are paid by the Government. Heretofore the Shipping Board has gone outside the Government service and employed independent auditors who were in nowise connected with the Government, just as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] might employ an auditor. He would employ some auditing agency to do his auditing. That is the way they have been doing.

Mr. MANN. Does the Bureau of Efficiency have a sufficient force to do this auditing for the Shipping Board?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We hope it has. I do not know whether it has or not.

Mr. MANN. Is that on the theory that the men in the Bureau of Efficiency have nothing to do, or is it expected that they will have nothing to do in the future, not having very much to do now that is necessary to be done?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that I was not responsible for this language being put in, but I suppose that the Bureau of the Budget, in looking for some channel through which some expense might be reduced, thought it wise to provide that the Bureau of Efficiency should do this auditing rather than pay out the money of the United States for independent auditors.

Mr. MANN. I must confess I do not see any difference, so far as paying out the money is concerned, whether it is paid to outside auditors or paid to extra people employed in the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We are trying to save money, and we would better keep those employed that we are paying for the service rather than to pay somebody on the outside for services that ought to be rendered by somebody on the inside.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what became of the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to make the point of order?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois reserved.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. To what does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I make the point of order to the language against which the gentleman from Illinois reserved the point of order.

Mr. MANN. No amendment can be offered while a point of order is pending, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the language to which I reserved the point of order was:

and all auditing of every nature requiring the services of outside auditors shall be furnished through the Bureau of Efficiency.

That is legislation. It is no part of a limitation at all.

The CHAIRMAN. And this is a new provision?

Mr. MANN. This is not law.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is well taken, if the gentleman insists upon it, but I want the gentleman to know that he is simply entailing extra expense upon the Government.

Mr. MANN. I did not make the point of order, although I did not get a very satisfactory explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. To what language is the point of order addressed?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To the following language:

and all auditing of every nature requiring the services of outside auditors shall be furnished through the Bureau of Efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana concedes the point of order to that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I concede the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee to offer an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 29, line 2, after the word "corporation" insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"No part of the sums appropriated in this act shall be used for the maintenance of a bureau of construction."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, during the hearings on this bill, when Mr. Lasker was testifying as to the personnel of the Shipping Board employees, among others he enumerated was the bureau of construction, with a special expert at $9,000, a special expert at $5,000, clerk to commissioner at $2,400, senior clerk at $2,400, and stenographer at $1,560, making a total of $20,360. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] asked the question:

Who is going to tell us something about this bureau of construction?

Mr. LASKER. I will tell you about it.

Mr. WOOD. You are not constructing any more vessels, are you?

Mr. LASKER. The bureau of construction of the Shipping Board, under Admiral Benson, has nothing to do with the construction department of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

In that connection, there is carried a large appropriation during the current year of over $15,000,000 for the Division of Construction, which is the one referred to here; but this is a different proposition to which my amendment is directed, as shown by the further statement of Chairman Lasker, as follows:

The duties of the bureau of construction of the Shipping Board under the Jones Act are to make academic studies of domestic and foreign construction and costs in order to give private shipowners the benefit of the Government's research as to the types of ships needed, and also to make studies with the Navy as to the type of merchant marine the Navy needs in order to encourage and induce American shipowners to build the types of ships needed for the Navy.

In the first place, Chairman Lasker has already recommended that the auxiliary fleet or transport vessels of both the Navy and the Army be dispensed with. With reference to future construction, the Shipping Board now owns 1,724 vessels, of 11,287,125 dead-weight tons. In addition to that there is a tonnage of 2,300,000 of privately owned American vessels. It is generally regarded by experts that we already have in the United States a considerably larger percentage of ships than American commerce can possibly utilize for many years to come. We are confronted with a very great problem in disposing of ships we already have. Likewise, we have a world tonnage of about 60,000,000 tons—far in excess of any previous period—and experts generally agree that there is considerably more world tonnage than is needed even in prosperous times. Yet, in spite of that situation, we are proposing to appropriate funds in this bill to carry on a bureau of construction in order to conduct investigations as to the character of vessels that ought to be constructed in the future. I think it is ridiculous, and it ought to be stricken out. It simply means the employment of some of those experts who are carried on this roll, whose services are not needed, and this is one place where we can save at least that much without impairing in the least our merchant marine, either Government or privately owned. Consequently, it occurs to me that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the point of order I make is that it is seeking to change existing law. In the organic act providing for the creation of the Shipping Board, section 12 provides that the board shall investigate as to the relative cost of building merchant vessels in the United States and in foreign maritime countries, and the relative cost, advantages, and disadvantages of operating in the foreign trade vessels under United States registry and under foreign registry. That section goes very fully into it, and section 9 and section 37 also go to show that that shall be a part of their duty.

Now, I do not think there will be any construction unless some occasion arises with the service we have. I make the point of order that it is in contravention of existing law; also sections 11, 19, 23, and 25 of the merchant marine act, which provides for construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. With this clearly provided for in existing law, it is proper at any time to put a limitation on an appropriation bill. That does not change the existing law. It only goes to the point of saying that this year on this appropriation bill we will not make the appropriation. It is a limitation clearly just such as are provided for in four or five different places on the same page, and the point of order is not sustained. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 19, noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 29, line 22, after the word "corporation," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"No part of the sum appropriated in this act shall be used in conducting investigations with a view of rebating purchasers of Shipping Board vessels by refunding the difference between the value of the vessels at the time sold and the present value."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment, because it changes existing law, and it does not show upon its face it is going to save money to the Government, but, on the other hand, might possibly cost a larger sum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not sustained on the grounds stated in the preceding ruling.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, soon after the war quite a number of Shipping Board vessels were sold, and the purchasers of those vessels participated in the very great prosperity that then obtained in shipping circles, and made doubtless large profits. The profits being made at that time in seagoing commerce were of such a character that, according to the report on the merchant marine bill, made by Senator JONES from the Committee on Commerce, there were net profits in the operation of the Shipping Board vessels of $137,549,568 for the year ending June 30, 1919, and, of course, private operators were making money in proportion during that time, and yet, by reason of the decline in the price of tonnage, the purchasers of those vessels at that time started a propaganda in favor of their being rebated the difference between what they paid for the vessels at that time, which averaged about $177 a ton, and the present price of tonnage when the bottom had dropped out of the business and, as everybody knows, no ship can be sold at anything like its true value. Now they went to work with the Shipping Board in an effort to secure the rebate referred to, which matter is testified to by Chairman Lasker in the hearings on this bill, and, after reviewing this situation and the claims made by these purchasers for rebates, he states the other side of it in this language:

The other side of the question is this: These people did not buy this tonnage for patriotic reasons from the Shipping Board—they bought it to make money. Should this Government be Santa Claus to adults who go into a transaction for the purpose of profit? Those are the two ways that the question appears to the Shipping Board. So we called a meeting of the pioneer purchasers.

And then he goes on to explain that they were so persistent that the Shipping Board finally suggested that if they would submit their reports and requests they would conduct an investigation and then would report to Congress what they thought they were entitled to. Mr. Lasker himself says that it is very clear that the Shipping Board has no right to make any such rebate without further congressional action. Without there being any legal basis or any congressional suggestion, or any authority from any source, they are now engaged in conducting investigations along this line, and therefore encouraging these men to make these claims and to become imbued with the idea they are entitled to rebates. I say it is a useless function that is being performed and ought to be stopped.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, all I desire to say in answer to the gentleman in support of his motion is that it occurs to me that there is more necessity at this particular time for this particular kind of an investigation of which he complains than at any other time. I desire to quote from the Shipping Board act as follows:

The board in fixing or accepting the sale price of such vessels shall take into consideration the prevailing domestic and foreign market price of the available supply of and the demand for vessels, existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance, the cost of constructing vessels of similar types under prevailing conditions, as well as the cost of the construction or purchase price of the vessels to be sold, and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell. All sales made under the authority of this act shall be subject to the limitations and restrictions of section 9 to the shipping act, 1916, as amended.

Now, then, if you are going to have this board do what the law compels it to do, you ought to at least have some provision whereby they can do the things the law compels them to do, else we will come back here next year and find that they have not done the very things the law compels them to do, because they did not have the appropriation to do them with, and then criticize them for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The Shipping Board, or, rather, the merchant-marine venture, has cost so far three and a half billion dollars. It is a veritable bottomless pit. I would like to see every appropriation for the board stricken out. It is not proposed to establish a merchant marine to be owned by the American people. It is not suggested that the Nation should own the fleet for which the people have paid, but it is cynically proposed that we take more money out of the pockets of the people of the United States in order to help organize a fleet which should be some day sold to private interests for a song. That is what we are doing. It is a direct case of the exploitation of the people by private interests. It is socialism reversed. It is the socialism of plutocracy. Every appropriation for the Shipping Board means an appropriation for the benefit of a group of shipowners into whose coffers money is to be poured out of the pockets of the poor. Out of the funds of the United States Treasury, funds to be raised by taxation, we are to develop a new private industry. What sort of democracy do you call that?

The gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], who has been so insistent in his condemnation of socialism, does not protest against this kind of socialism. He seems to take it for granted that it is the duty of Congress to appropriate money so that we may develop an industry for private capital.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. LONDON. For a short question.

Mr. LAYTON. I do not think you have heard a word, as far as my mouth is concerned, as to my attitude on this bill.

Mr. LONDON. Then I presume the gentleman's attitude is the same as mine, except that I say what I think on the question.

Mr. LAYTON. I would have to go a good way to be with the gentleman, because I am afraid of him generally.

Mr. LONDON. I am not afraid of anybody, not even of the gentleman from Delaware. Nor am I afraid of myself, because I know what I want.

Now, our experience with the Shipping Board is, of course, one of the fruits of the war for democracy. After we had started out in company with the Czar of Russia and with the King of Serbia and the King of England and the King of Italy and the peerless champion of democracy, the Mikado of Japan, to make the world safe for democracy we got ourselves into all sorts of trouble. This is one of the results of the noble attempt to bayonet Europe into a higher spiritual state—into a genuine democracy. Nothing so illustrates the rapacity, the vileness, the immorality, the decay of plutocracy as our experience with the Shipping Board. We were told that our Nation was in danger; that our civilization was threatened; the very existence of the Republic was menaced, but plutocratic interests kept on robbing, kept on stealing, and they do not want to stop it now. Now they do it in a lawful way. We vote into their pockets now. The whole business, every line relating to the Shipping Board, should be stricken out. In a way, I sympathize with those in charge of the Shipping Board. Nobody can be connected with it without having his name some day mixed up in some scandal. I would like to see everybody who has any self-respect get out of that vortex of capitalistic filth.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the funds of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall be available for the rent of buildings in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1923 if suitable space is provided for said corporation by the public buildings commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, simply to ask why this restriction is limited only to the Fleet Corporation and does not include the Shipping Board as well?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My understanding is that it is because the Shipping Board has a provision for it and the Fleet Corporation has not. I have no objection to amending it, but that is the only reason for it. The Shipping Board is in a Government building and the Fleet Corporation is outside.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the sum appropriated in this act shall be used to pay any claims of the United States Navy Department against the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation arising prior to July 1, 1921, or to pay any final judgment rendered in any suit authorized by the act entitled "An act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty, suits for salvage services, and providing for the release of merchant vessels belonging to the United States from arrest and attachment in foreign jurisdictions, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1920.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Why is it that these claims shall not be paid out of this appropriation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is for this reason: Of course, if these claims were paid out of the appropriation it might mean a diminishment of the appropriation, and in order that there might not be any uncertainty about it we put it this way. There is a question with reference to about $16,000,000 worth of claims between the Navy Department and the Shipping Board. There have been vessels transferred, and so forth, and we thought we would prevent any appropriation being made until we knew exactly what ought to be paid.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the claims existed prior to the transfer of these vessels. Now, the claim comes on how much an allowance shall be made because they have transferred some vessels from the Shipping Board to the Navy board?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it thought that some of the funds made available in this act shall be used for settling these claims?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There was the possibility of its being done. In order that it might not be done and the amount hereby appropriated might be had for the purpose of operation of the Shipping Board and the Congress might know what was being expended and that there might not be any uncertainty concerning these matters between the Navy Department and the Shipping Board, we thought the provision ought to be made.

Mr. WALSH. This says, "No part of the sum appropriated." That would apply to direct appropriations in this act. Some of the funds are made available in this act for the payment of claims. Ought not that language to be included here—"no part of the sum appropriated or made available in this act"?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There will not be any part of that $50,000,000 available for this purpose, for the reason that the $50,000,000 appropriated for claims is for claims that are due under contracts or otherwise. Our purpose in putting this in was in order that no part of this sum should be paid to the Navy Department.

Mr. WALSH. The amount received for the fiscal year 1923 is made available for the Emergency Fleet Corporation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If that is made available for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, could they not spend part of that for settling these claims in the absence of a direct appropriation of any sum being made for that purpose?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Possibly that might be done, but I do not think there is any danger of its being done. They are so regardful of their moneys that they are not likely to do it.

Mr. CHALMERS. That was the reason for putting it in?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; that was the reason for putting it in—to prevent their paying any claim brought by the Navy Department.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and to preclude them from paying a final judgment in admiralty suits?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; out of these sums; so that they will have to come to Congress for it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Out of what did the claims brought by the Navy Department against the Shipping Board arise?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Most of it is for operation of vessels during the war.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I understood the gentleman to make the statement in responding to a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that he did not want to authorize the Shipping Board to pay these claims out of funds made available as direct appropriations. Is it not a fact that the Shipping Board is asking us for authorization to cancel the claims of the Navy Department?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. There is a dispute between the Shipping Board and the Navy Department as to just exactly what is due, just as there might be between the gentleman himself and myself on an open account. They do not want to be compelled to pay it out of this, nor did we want them to do it until we knew what the sum was and until final and definite settlement could be had.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Would it not stand on the same footing as other questions as to which there is a dispute?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. We did no want to do it beyond the amount already allowed unless we knew exactly what it would be.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I understand that the Shipping Board is asking for the cancellation of these accounts from the Navy Department.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Answering the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] a while ago as to the payment of claims, it seems on page 48 this fund for payment of claims is made available for carrying out the operations of the merchant marine act. Could they not pay these claims out of funds available but not directly appropriated?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think you can rely on the Shipping Board not paying the Navy anything until they have to. This is peculiarly a bookkeeping transaction at best when it does come, but in order that Congress may know——

Mr. JONES of Texas. This refers not only to the Navy but to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. The fact of the matter is that the debt is against the Shipping Board, and the Emergency Fleet Corporation had nothing to do with it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. So that they could not pay out these funds?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU.

For carrying out the provisions of an act entitled "An act to establish a Veterans' Bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau and to further amend and modify the war risk insurance act approved August 9, 1921," including salaries and expenses of the central office at Washington, D. C., and regional offices and suboffices, and including salaries, stationery and minor office supplies, furniture, equipment and supplies, printing and binding, rentals and alterations, heat, light, and water, miscellaneous expenses, including telephones, telegrams, freight, express, law books, books of reference, periodicals, ambulance service, towel service, laundry service, repairs to equipment, storage, ice, taxi service, car fare, stamps and box rent, traveling and subsistence, salaries and expenses of employees engaged in field investigation, motor vehicles, including purchase, maintenance, repairs, and operation of same, salaries and operating expenses of the Arlington Building and annex, including repairs and mechanical equipment, fuel, electric current, ice, ash removal, and miscellaneous items, $25,815,942: Provided, That on or before the 15th day of each month when Congress is in session, the Director of the Veterans' Bureau shall transmit to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives a statement giving in detail (a) the total number of positions at a rate of $2,000 or more per annum, (b) the rate of salary attached to each position, (c) the number of positions at each rate in the central office and in each district office or suboffice, and (d) a brief statement of the duties of each position.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, the unemployment problem still stares us in the face and a conservative estimate evidences the fact that we have 3,000,000 American workers who are deprived of an opportunity to earn a living. This condition of affairs is due almost wholly to the fact that the tariff bill passed in this House on July 21 last year has been delayed in the Senate month after month, resulting in our markets being deluged with cheaply produced foreign goods, and a resultant slowing up of our industrial activities.

If these 3,000,000 toilers earned an average wage of $4 a day, then the delay at the other end of the Capitol is causing a loss of $12,000,000 a day. I trust that I may be permitted to digress from the subject matter under discussion in order to present the following statement:

That on the 30th and 31st of this month in this city the National Association of Manufacturers will hold a special convention. The manufacturers are but voicing the sentiments of American wage earners when they declare that the delay over tariff is retarding the restoration of business.

This National Association is seeking no participation in rate making nor seeking special favors. Its one purpose is to ask that all ad valorem duties be imposed on the basis of American valuation.

That they have substantial backing in their convention for this vital principle is evidenced by the vote which was taken among some 6,000 manufacturers who employ nearly 3,000,000 persons. The vote shows 77.7 per cent in favor of American valuation, 21.7 per cent opposed to it, and 1.6 per cent of ballots cast defective. The vote represents a total of 2,336,000 employees on the side of American valuation and 621,000 opposed.

ORIGINAL PLAN—TARIFF REVISION FIRST.

When this Congress met in April, 1921, the tentative program was to write a new tariff bill and follow it as soon as possible with a revised tax bill. This was after a conference at the White House where our distinguished leaders were assembled to discuss legislation for the extraordinary session. This was good news to the manufacturers of this country and carried a message of prosperity to the millions of workers throughout the land. Nobody expressed any surprise at such procedure for the country by a tremendous majority had swept back into power the party of protection. [Applause.]

HOUSE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS GET BUSY.

The Ways and Means Committee, under the direction of its most capable and masterful chairman [Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY], immediately got into harness for the preparation of a tariff bill, in relation to which they had been holding hearings for three months. This committee labored zealously and untiringly, and the House of Representatives passed the Fordney tariff bill July 21, 1921, and without a moment's rest from their labors the committee commenced work on the revision of the tax bill. During this period there had developed a most insidious propaganda against an administrative factor contained in the bill, namely, American valuation. The combined influence of the international bankers, the importers, and the free traders was exerted to defeat this provision.

IMPORTERS NOT AGAINST AMERICAN VALUATION BUT AGAINST PROTECTION.

Their attack did not fool anybody but themselves, for it was apparent that they were not so much against American valuation as they were against protection in any form. All the disturbance about prohibitive rates under this plan of valuation was pure buncombe for if they had been honest in their objections and logical in their deductions, they would have gone before the Finance Committee and asked for a careful revision of the rates computed on American valuation that none might prove prohibitive. But that was not their method of approach, they simply declared themselves as against this eminently fair and absolutely necessary factor in the administration of the tariff bill and have up to the present moment offered no valid or substantial reason for their attitude. There has been some criticism regarding the passage and extension of the emergency tariff bill. Some Members holding that as the agricultural interests were in a measure satisfied with the relief it afforded, they were not as anxious for a permanent tariff law as those of us who represent industrial communities. I do not believe that this criticism is warranted, for the Members of this House know full well that the condition that must be recognized for the good of the country is interdependence, rather than independence. There should be no sectional lines drawn in placing so essential a fundamental of Republican principle on the statute books. The West is Wall Street and Wall Street is the West. Gentlemen of the House, this is no time for blocs, either industrial, agricultural, labor, or capital. What we need in the Republican Congress is an all-American bloc, dedicated to the establishment of the shortest route to normal conditions. [Applause.] Frequent reference is made to this return to normal conditions, and a flood of capitalistic propaganda distributed through the press calling attention to the fact that wages are too high. The return to normalcy by the wage-reduction route will not be a very popular movement, and it is unfair for capital during this period of depression to take advantage of labor's necessity and cut wages to a point where the standards of living for our great body of workers must be lowered. [Applause.] There were too many high salaries and too high a rate of wages paid during the war period, but that always happens in an emergency. Remember that with the end of the war came the end of the job, and the added problem of inducting 4,000,000 soldiers back into industrial, technical, and professional vocations. A great percentage of them have never been able to get back to their prewar standard as to earning power.

It is a favorite, and in some circles a popular cry, "Wait till we get back to prewar times." Gentlemen, we are never going back, so far as wages are concerned; it is not an American method. "Forward, march," has been the program that put the old U. S. A. on the map, and it has been the motto of dough boy and devil dog, business man, and wage earner. [Applause.]

ORGANIZED LABOR SHOULD HELP.

In regard to American valuation: I feel that organized labor should use every ounce of its influence to have this important fact incorporated in the Fordney tariff bill. It is the one method that will help to maintain the wage standards and give our manufacturers a square deal in competition with European producers. American industry will be false to itself and the labor which it normally employs if it does not from this time forth devote itself indefatigably to the business of making it clear to Congress and the President that what the country needs now more than any other one thing is the protective tariff which the President has so splendidly outlined and urged; but that the only way such protection can be made to effectively serve its purpose is by administration of the tariff upon the American value for application of the ad valorem rates.

Great Britain has cast her boasted free-trade principles to the winds and on October 1 last put into effect a tariff on nearly 7,000 articles of 33⅓ per cent, with the duty to be calculated on home valuation, which is synonymous, of course, with our proposed plan of American valuation. The facts are that England is threatened, as in prewar times, with a flood of German and other cheaply produced European products, and she is determined to protect her industries against it.

Great Britain is quite willing and anxious that that trade be diverted to the United States, a live cash customer, and so enable Germany to pay her reparations to France and the other countries to liquidate their indebtedness to her. All this reparations fund and war indebtedness is to be paid by the United States opening her ports to cheap European and oriental products, while American mechanics and their families are sacrificed on the altar of unemployment. It is high time we realized that "America first" means something. [Applause.]

In the district which I have the honor to represent the unemployment problem has reached an almost unsolvable stage. The General Electric Co. and the American Locomotive Works, of Schenectady, are operating with greatly reduced forces. Amsterdam, N. Y., has been more fortunate, and, with a diversity of industries, has managed to keep her mills running on nearly full time, with the exception of the glove mills and the oil mills. Johnstown and Gloversville, in my district, the home of American-made gloves, began to feel the full effects of the low Underwood rates as soon as trade relations were reestablished in 1919. The winter of 1920 and 1921 was the worst season for many years, but they faced the music, feeling sure that this Congress, called April 11, would give them a tariff bill that would once more give them necessary protection against the low production costs of France and Germany. This winter of 1921 and 1922 finds the glove and leather shops closed, as are also the cotton-glove shops. Thirteen million dollars' worth of gloves were imported for the 11 months of last year ending with November 30, and nearly every man, woman, and child who received gloves for Christmas had gloves not made in America.

What we lost by foreign valuation and depreciated foreign currency is demonstrated by these figures: Importations from 1898 to 1913 averaged $5,000,000 per year and paid a duty of $3,200,000, the equivalent of 64 per cent ad valorem of declared foreign valuation. During 1920 the importations amounted to $13,250,000 and paid but $1,660,000 duty, the equivalent of less than 13 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. Chairman, I hope every Republican Member of this House will urge upon his Senators the necessity of haste in passing a tariff bill. Our leaders have dwelt eloquently on the accomplishments of this Congress and its record warrants that meed of praise, but the people of this country gave the Republican Party a tremenduous majority, and every Republican vote was a vote for nationalism as against internationalism; for a protective tariff as against free trade. When that sort of message comes from the American people the wisest and best thing the party in power can do is to give heed and obey the command. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

In the section before us there is a provision for the support and maintenance of regional and suboffices of the Veterans' Bureau. The Veterans' Bureau bill became a law in August, 1921. So far as I was concerned I felt that it was somewhat unwise to clothe the 14 regional offices with the power to make compensation awards, grant vocational training, and to pass upon the question of insurance claims; but we were told that that should be done, and that was the only thing that could be done in order to provide proper service for the disabled service men. It seemed to me and I know that it seemed to a great many Members of the House at that time that decentralization was all right, but that it ought not to go beyond the point of merely coming in contact with the service man, seeing that he was given the most thorough attention and examination, given all the advice and counsel in reference to the submission of proof, and seeing that that proof was preliminarily passed upon; but we did think it was unwise to so decentralize that all of the files in the Veterans' Bureau at Washington should be transferred to these 14 regional districts. At the present time the files of 3 of the 14 regional districts have been transferred. That means that this great organization that it has taken some four years to develop here in Washington, that was just about commencing to function so that files could be located and claims passed upon, has suddenly had a considerable portion of its files transferred. These files are shipped in box cars, under guard, of course, and every care taken to safeguard them until they reach the regional district. We are confronted with this situation: Here is a man who is sick in district No. 10, at the city of Minneapolis. The doctors there say that he should go to Arizona because of his tubercular condition. They write down here to Washington and his file is transferred to the Arizona district.

The result is that when he comes up again for examination his papers and everything are being considered there, in a district where he has not come in contact with the officers before. They know nothing about him, nobody else knows anything about him. This makes for trouble. It is going to be multiplied a thousandfold when all these files are transferred. In the law we provided that these regional offices should cease to exist within five years from the date of the passage of the act. The director of the bureau testified in the hearings before the committee that it will take about three years before they can get these files sent out into these regional districts. In other words, before all the 14 districts can have these files transferred it will take about three years. Then there will be only about two years when these regional district offices can function with all these files. They must then be returned. From the experience we have had it does seem to me that Congress might well take action to prevent extreme decentralization and confine these suboffices and these regional offices so as not to grant jurisdiction involving the transfer of all of these claims and their files.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. Who is authority for the statement that it will take three years to transfer the files?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. My authority is Col. Forbes, the director of the bureau. He so testified in the hearings before the subcommittee.

Mr. LONDON. What reason did he give?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not know that Col. Forbes gave any reason, but I can well understand the reasons therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is made that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. For example, there are 900,000 claims that have been filed here with the Veterans' Bureau. There are 900,000 claims on file. The sorting out of these claims is an enormous task when it is remembered that there are thousands of requests for information regarding these claims every day. Three or four thousand requests come in every day from Members of Congress regarding claims, and it is an enormous job. The sorting out of these claims in accordance with the districts the allotting and getting them ready for shipment, and then getting them out to the regional offices is a very great undertaking. Then when you get them to the regional offices you have got to get your filing force ready, you have got to have your filing cases ready, and it will be months, literally months, before you can locate some of these claims. In the meantime the demands upon the Congressmen for action upon the part of this Government bureau will increase in accordance with the delay incidental to this transfer.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I am very much interested in what the gentleman says, and I agree with him. In my district I think the files have been changed. New York is under the regional system at the present time. My own experience is right along the line of that of my friend from Minnesota. It is slowing down action in the Veterans' Bureau by having that regional branch in the city of New York. I can not get half the results we used to get when the files were in the city of Washington.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Suppose a soldier in the gentleman's district writes to him to assist in expediting matters, where does the gentleman send his letter?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the soldier now lives in district No. 10, in my district, I have to write to Washington, and I have to write to Minneapolis, because I have no means of knowing whether his claim for compensation was started before the veterans' act became a law or afterwards. If it was started afterwards, Minneapolis is the office where the claim can be found. That office has original and final jurisdiction. If started before, then the papers are still in Washington; but when the papers are transferred to Minneapolis, all correspondence must be with the district office, save on appeal cases.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. And when a boy in Minneapolis writes to the gentleman in Washington, the gentleman writes to Minneapolis to answer the soldier in Minneapolis.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes; and to carry it further, if the boy is transferred to a district in which Arizona is located, then I have to write three letters. It seems to me that very soon we ought to give very serious consideration to curtailing this extreme decentralization of the Veterans' Bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HERRICK: Page 31, line 23, after the word "position," insert: "That no part of the funds appropriated shall be used to pay the salary of F. C. Kile, district manager of the Veterans' Bureau at Dallas, Tex., after March 1, 1922."

Mr. HERRICK. I do not know that the offering of this amendment is going to do any particular good, but I have found the administration of the work of the Veterans' Bureau by its district manager at Dallas, Tex., marked by such inefficiency and indifference and disregard of the wishes of disabled veterans that I believe the service would be improved if he could be eliminated. I have had a good deal of business with his office, for all our Oklahoma ex-service men come under his jurisdiction. When I have made complaints of failure on the part of his office to carry out the intent of the law in the relief of disabled soldiers, he has whitewashed the offenders under pretense of investigating the offense. He has insisted that Oklahoma soldiers go to his home town of San Antonio for vocational training or else be denied training, notwithstanding the fact that as good or better training can be had in Oklahoma, where the soldier can be nearer his home and his family. If an Oklahoma soldier needs hospitalization, he must go to Texas. He seems to find Oklahoma a convenient annex to the State of Texas for the purpose of supplying patients for a hospital at Houston and students for a training center at San Antonio. His work is quite the opposite of decentralization, for it tends to centralize everything in favored Texas towns. He certainly must like to see the Government pay the railroads for transporting Oklahoma soldiers to and from Texas. I find that it takes longer to secure action upon compensation claims than when they were handled by the bureau here in Washington and that the action when finally taken is not so fair to the veterans. The American Red Cross workers, the American Legion workers, and all others who are unselfishly trying to assist disabled men to secure what the country desired they should have and what Congress thought had been assured for their aid are making complaint that the Dallas office and some of its suboffices refuse to give advice or information and actually delay the settlement of claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HERRICK) there were—ayes 15, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Compensation: For military and naval compensation for death or disability, $160,000,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to cite a positive, concrete illustration of the matter that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] just discussed. I have in mind the case of a soldier in my district whose compensation was reduced from $90 to $22.50 a month last June. He has a wife and child. I have been trying incessantly since last June to get that case readjudicated, an effort being made all of the time to prove greater disability than the department has been willing to concede. In the latter part of October last I received word from the bureau here that the matter was entirely in the hands of the Boston office and that a telegram had been sent to the regional director of the Boston office to expedite the case. An examination has been made by two physicians appointed by the board, the regular board physicians, and the papers should have been, and I suppose were, in the Boston office very soon after the 25th of October. From that time to this the soldier has had nothing beyond the $22.50 a month for the support of himself and wife and child. His claim is one of total disability. Just what the nature of the report made by the two physicians is I do not know. But I do know that even messages from the director general here to the regional director in Boston since October last can not produce action. The director in Boston failed to reply to letters and telegrams that I have sent until one day last week I received a long communication from him in which he said that the reason no result was obtained in the case was owing to the decentralization and the passing of the papers. They could not get at the files. I infer that the Boston office is one of the three to which the gentleman from Minnesota refers. It is a mighty unfortunate situation for the soldier. If we made a mistake in that decentralization vote passed at the time of the last amendment to the Sweet bill, let us recognize that error now and change it promptly. [Applause.] I agree fully with the gentleman from Minnesota that the construction of the decentralization proposition has gone altogether too far.

And if the authority here in Washington, Col. Forbes, can not get the information from his subordinates since the 27th of October, when the examination was made of this man; if no result from that time to this can be obtained, something is wrong with the system or else with the employees.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What jurisdiction would the gentleman think could be given to the district officer?

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, I am not competent to pass on that. I think the committee did the very best it could, and if I remember rightly the committee of which the gentleman from Indiana is a member did not favor the complete decentralization scheme which the House passed. However, I may be mistaken, but I think the House passed it over the head of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It is my recollection that the law goes further than the report that the gentleman and Mr. SWEET made.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The committee favored a smaller number of offices, but the committee did favor the district division.

Mr. TREADWAY. But not so complete that it was all taken out of Washington and transferred to the regional offices, as I recall the situation at that time?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the bill as originally reported gave the district offices jurisdiction to pass on the claims. That is my recollection.

Mr. TREADWAY. I realize the great inconvenience of all that sort of work, and I think from the appearance of the thing we made a serious blunder so far as obtaining prompt action on behalf of the soldier is concerned. We intended to expedite adjustments for the veterans, but my experience is that either the system is a failure or the officials are inefficient. I hope a remedy can soon be found.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Gentlemen of the committee, I quite agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] and with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and with all others who have spoken in reference to the decentralization plan. I know that my experience has been very unsatisfactory since the adoption of the so-called Sweet bill. In fact, I have frequently written the Veterans' Bureau to be informed that the file of papers are with the district manager at Atlanta, Ga. Ofttimes I request that the papers be sent back to the Veterans' Bureau in order that I may have the privilege of looking into the matter to see whether or not the ex-service man has presented his case in a proper way. I think the thing we should do here, seeing as we do that we have made a mistake in the plan that was followed in the recent Sweet bill, is for the committee to bring in an amendment to that bill and bring those papers back to Washington where we can look after them. [Applause.] Now, I want to make this further observation, gentlemen——

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. Briefly.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman realizes, of course, that the committee brought in the bill in response to the judgment of everybody who had anything to do with the administration of this law, all the authorities of the bureau, and that every ex-service man's organization in the United States passed resolutions unanimously indorsing this decentralization. Does not the gentleman think that if we had brought in a bill that did not allow these regional offices the final authority that it was quite possible that the House would have passed the bill allowing it just as they did with reference to the suboffices, which were increased to 140 in the House?

Mr. CLOUSE. I quite agree with the gentleman, and I am not trying to criticize gentlemen for any action that has been taken. I voted to do this myself, but from my observation I think we have made a mistake, and therefore, like men, let us correct it. Now, there is another question.

Hundreds of thousands of ex-service men who bared their breasts on the battle field of Flanders went there untutored and uneducated. They came back in the same condition. They knew absolutely nothing about how to prepare their case and present it to the Veterans' Bureau or the district manager; but under the provisions of this bill—and, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to this fact, because I believe it is of vital importance to every ex-service man in the country—we have inserted a provision in the law that prohibits any attorney from charging an ex-service man more than $3 for any services he may render him in preparing and presenting his case to the bureau. In my judgment that provision has deprived thousands of ex-service men from receiving prompt and just consideration, because no attorney can give his case proper attention for this fee, and what I think should be done, and what I hope the committee having jurisdiction of this question will do, will be to amend it so that an attorney may charge something reasonable for his services and at the same time render proper service to the veteran. Now I do not want the bridle taken off so that he can impose on an ex-service man, but I want the ex-service man to have his rights presented to the Veterans' Bureau and get that to which he is rightfully and justly entitled. I have just recently had a case up with the Veterans' Bureau where a young lawyer—who, by the way, the very day he was admitted to the bar to practice law in my State, volunteered his services and went to France, and who was in the heat of battle—he came back here and his comrades in arms came to see him and consult and advise in reference to the preparation of their cases. One of them had great difficulty in explaining to this board of doctors down here just what his ailments were, and after he had convinced them of the fact that he had a disability then he had again to go down there and convince them that it was of service origin and was contracted in the line of duty.

This young fellow took affidavits of his comrades, scattered all over the United States, and finally after about a year's time convinced the Veterans' Bureau of the merits of that claim. He charged him $25. Do you know what happened? They were on the verge of indicting him in the district court for violating the provisions of this law. That ex-service man would never have received a dollar of compensation, in my judgment, but for the services of that young attorney.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, all of the debate that has been had thus far upon this proposition is, of course, clear outside of the matter immediately under consideration. But I wish to take this opportunity of calling the attention of this committee to what this decentralization is costing the Government. I was opposed to it originally, and I think it was the greatest mistake we ever made. [Applause.] It is costing us between $14,000,000 and $16,000,000 more than it would have cost us if we had not had the decentralization, besides all the disappointment and vexation that is being entailed and will continue to be entailed by reason of the decentralization itself.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to a further proposition that we will have to consider before we get through with the final consideration of this bill. An additional estimate has been brought to the attention of the committee, coming in too late, and which I think it is not well for us to consider in this body even by way of amendment, but perhaps will have to be considered by the Senate, asking for $19,000,000 more for vocational training, an emergency that has occurred since the submission of this item, and $9,000,000 more for operation of these offices created by reason of this decentralization.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman mean that the offices now will cost $9,000,000 more than they would have cost under the other system?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. They will cost $16,000,000 more, but they are going to ask for an additional appropriation of $9,000,000 in addition to what they have already asked for their operation. That is what it is costing us by reason of this decentralization theory that was going to take this work to the boys, back to the communities in which they are. The fact is we are taking it away from them, so far as the results are concerned.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman permit me to state that one day last week I got three letters from ex-soldiers, and I went down to the Veterans' Bureau and was informed that two of the cases had been sent to Atlanta and one to St. Louis. We had to notify those three boys of that, and then write three letters, two to Atlanta and one to St. Louis. Two days afterwards I got two letters with like results, that had to go to Atlanta, and this morning I got another letter and went down to see about it, and found the case was in Atlanta and had to go through the same process. It is a woeful mistake, and the sooner corrected the greater blessing it will be. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This ought to be a lesson to us. We just simply yield to clamor and demand sometimes, and do the very thing we should not do, in trying to accomplish a good purpose.

Mr. HERRICK. Is it the intention of the gentleman to present an amendment abolishing these regional offices and bringing back these records to Washington?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That would have to go to the proper legislative committee. This committee has nothing to do with it.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this seems to be something in the nature of an experience meeting this afternoon. I should like to add my own impression as to the present situation. I desire to say at the outset that I have no feeling against any official of the Veterans' Bureau. On the contrary, I have the kindest personal feeling for all of them, from the top to the bottom, with whom I have any acquaintance. But I feel I must say this—and I think I am voicing the impression of most of the Members of the House in saying it—that I think the service the disabled soldier is getting is very appreciably worse than it was six months ago, and I think the service six months ago was appreciably worse than it was six months before that. We are confronted with this difficulty, among others, whenever we take up a disability case with the Veterans' Bureau: If we take it up with Washington we are relegated to Boston, in my case, or to Minneapolis, or to Tennessee, or whatever the locality of the Member writing may happen to be. If we take it up, on the other hand, with our locality at home we are relegated to Washington. And I have file after file of instances where Boston has referred me to Washington and where Washington, in the same case, has referred me to Boston. No one knows at this moment with which end of the line he should communicate in order to do justice and get justice for the disabled soldier with an honest claim. I confess I had hoped that that was characteristic merely of the period of transition, and that when ultimate decentralization was effected we should see definite improvement of a permanent character. But nearly six months have elapsed since the enactment of the Sweet law of August 9, 1921, and things to-day are worse rather than better.

I am a good deal disturbed at the comment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] this afternoon, to the effect that the director of the bureau has himself stated it will take some three years more to effect this decentralization. If I am correct in so quoting the gentleman——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Three years after the passage of the act.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. SANDERS of Indiana rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I will first yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman knows the director of the bureau thinks we ought to repeal the provision for decentralization?

Mr. ROGERS. I am not competent to pass upon that question.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have not talked personally with the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, and I have no right to pass judgment upon his opinion, but I do know that some of the men who are doing the actual work there have put up to me some of their problems, or, at least, as I have talked to them those problems have come to me, and I think they are almost insurmountable so far as speed is concerned, if we keep up this extreme decentralization.

Mr. ROGERS. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I may be mistaken in my recollection, but I will ask the gentleman if he was not one of those who was very insistent that we should embark on this decentralization, and was it not his will that was very largely followed by the committee?

Mr. ROGERS. I am perfectly frank to say to the gentleman that from the outset of this problem I did believe that decentralization was at least a partial remedy; and I am also perfectly frank to say that I am not yet convinced that it is not a remedy. It seems to me that if we can decentralize effectively and fairly, speedily and completely, it is logical to assume that a man in Alabama or a man in Boston or a man in Springfield, Ill., can get better results from an office that is dealing with only one-fourteenth of the cases and from an office that is geographically near at hand, so that he, or his legion officers, or some other interested person who may go to that office can deal personally with his particular case.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But with the information now before the gentleman as to the practical working of decentralization, what is the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. ROGERS. My purpose this afternoon was to make inquiry as to whether the difficulties with which we are all familiar and with which I dare say we are all struggling are difficulties due to the system, in which even we had better abandon decentralization, or difficulties of administering the system. Frankly, I do not know.

In my own case I have visited several times the district manager of district No. 1, in Boston, an admirable gentleman. While this has no bearing on his fitness, it is worth while remembering that he was a famous half back on the Yale eleven a few years ago; and he has the apparent virility and courage and push that you would expect to find in a brilliant football player. Whether it is his fault, or the fault of his subordinates, or the fault of the system, I do not know; but I do know that I can not get replies back from his office on the simplest cases within a reasonable time, and that when they do come they are seldom satisfactory.

Weeks will elapse before I get an acknowledgment in some cases, and when the acknowledgment does come it does not in the least advance the cause I am seeking to advance. So far as Washington is concerned, frequently I will simply get a rereference to Boston, and in some cases even that will be greatly delayed. Formerly I used to go down to the War Risk Bureau, as it then was, or even telephone there, with the confident expectation that I should get action within 24 hours or, perhaps, even the same day. Now it is apt to take as many days to make the same progress as it then took hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, all this talk is out of order. We expect to finish this bill to-night. There is no reason why we should not finish it. I hope gentlemen will allow us to get along to some place where debate will be in order. At some other point gentlemen might give their experience, but if the time is extended we shall be here until to-morrow night.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my request, and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Under leave granted to extend my remarks I print a letter which I wrote some six weeks ago to a correspondent in Boston:

DECEMBER 16, 1921.

Mr. JOHN D. BATES,
Military editor Boston Evening Transcript, Boston, Mass.

DEAR MR. BATES: I have read with very great interest your letter dated November 26, but only received by me this morning.

I have had very great hopes that tremendous improvement in the adjudication of compensation and other claims would result from the enactment of the decentralization law. After four months I still have the hope, but nothing more as yet. Improvement, so far as my experience indicates, has not yet resulted. In fact, I think that the Veterans' Bureau—and I speak only for the cases in my own office—has recently been and is doing poorer work than at any time since 1919. Of course, I can judge only by results, and I am not getting results. I do not expect to get an award of compensation or of training in every case. You and I know perfectly well that many apply for the one or the other, or both, who are not entitled thereto under the law. But I do maintain that every applicant—whether he intercedes directly or through his Senator or Congressman—is entitled to a speedy adjudication of his claim. This he is certainly not getting.

I inclose herewith a memorandum referring briefly to a dozen cases which happen to be open in my office at this moment. Some of them show more dereliction than others. But the Washington Director of the Veterans' Bureau is constantly sending forth through the press proud boasts to the effect that the bureau is at last on a current basis. He cites cases where a claimant presents his case to the Veterans' Bureau for the first time and a few hours later walks out of the building with a compensation check in his pocket. I can not get any such results as these, and I assure you that it is not for lack of diligence in trying. Some cases I have presented personally to responsible officials of the bureau, either in Washington or in Boston, six or eight or even ten times.

I have had several agreeable conversations with the district manager in Boston, whom I personally like very much. He tells me—has told me more than once—that if I do not get results within 24 hours from the time the case is brought to his attention there is something wrong with his system. But I have never, I think, in a single case out of the many scores I presented to the Boston office, gotten favorable results in 24 hours or 24 days.

I learn through the press and otherwise of the activity of "clean-up squads." These cheery items describe how representatives of the bureau go into the very communities of the disabled and deal with the men face to face. It is a splendid idea. The use of the "clean-up" squad suggests that only a few scattered cases have been left unsettled which the Veterans' Bureau is determined to go out and close up without a second's delay. I do not know what results have been achieved elsewhere. I do know that several hundred men found it necessary to wait upon the "clean-up" men when they were in Lowell six weeks ago. Perhaps some of the cases then presented have by this time been settled either favorably or adversely. My guess is that 90 per cent of them are still unsettled and will be for a good long time to come. One of the most prominent Legion men in Lowell, who has taken a great interest in helping the disabled men, told me recently that so far as he knew very few adjudications had resulted from the Lowell sessions. Certainly our own correspondence with Lowell claimants since the visit of the "clean-up squad" would not indicate that the millenium had arrived or even started. I dare say the "clean-up squad" itself did excellent work. The difficulty doubtless is that when their reports get back to the Boston office—or perchance to the Washington office—the same hand of death is laid upon them that is reaching out to minister to the letters which are sent from this office.

Latterly I have gotten so discouraged in dealing with the Boston office that we have resumed our dealings directly with the Washington office. I am not sure that we are not jumping from the frying pan into the fire, but, whether we are dealing at the moment with Boston or with Washington, we are quite sure that the other must be better, hence our occasional changes back and forth.

I am not unmindful of the difficulties which attend the task of the director in Washington and the manager in Boston. The job is unquestionably a vast one. It has become complicated by the program of decentralization which is apparently even now still in-process. But our first consideration must be to get results in the most deserving type of work which devolves upon a Congressman.

Here is a not unusual case: A soldier named Armand Alix, of Lowell, was wounded in the head by shrapnel in 1918. The piece of shrapnel remained embedded in the center of his brain, and could not be removed. Dr. Cushing and others had him under their care. The man was helpless, and there was no doubt from the beginning that he was and would be totally disabled. Yet he had been given only a temporary total rating, which excluded him from the benefits of his $10,000 insurance. He has struggled to have this rating changed to permanent, but in vain. I first heard of the case on October 13, and wrote a strong letter to the Washington office of the Veterans' Bureau.

Under date of October 18 Director Forbes wrote me that "This claim is being held in abeyance pending receipt of report of physical examination requested October 13, 1921." What they had been doing for a long, long time before, nobody knows. On receipt of this letter I took the matter up with the district manager in Boston on October 20. On October 28 Director Forbes wrote me that the report of physical examination referred to in his letter of October 13 had not been received and he was wiring the district manager at Boston to expedite the report. Under date of October 31 I received a reply to my October 20 letter to the district manager at Boston. The district manager stated that the case was pending, awaiting the receipt of certain papers bearing on the case which had been requested from Washington. Under date of November 2 I wrote the district manager at Boston a strong letter calling attention to the fact that Washington was blaming Boston and Boston was blaming Washington. I closed my letter thus: "Which is right? With whom shall we deal? Can't some action be taken to cut further red tape in this meritorious case?" On November 5 the district manager at Boston finally telegraphed he was recommending Alix for permanent total disability and was forwarding examinations requested by the central office.

Alix died November 8. Under date of November 16 I received from Director Forbes word that the claimant had been awarded permanent and total rating from July 22, 1918. Here was an admission that for three years and more this soldier had in fact been totally and permanently disabled as a result of wounds received in action. But he never had the satisfaction of knowing that the Government had recognized his rights. He had died a week before the award was made.

This is not an isolated case, although the circumstances make it a particularly distressing one. Frankly, I am at my wit's end. You are quite at liberty to make any use of this letter that you see fit.

Sincerely, yours,

JOHN JACOB ROGERS.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HERRICK. Would an amendment to this bill abolishing these regional offices and bringing back the records to Washington and centralizing all these bureau activities in Washington be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair could not tell until he knew what it contained.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the desire of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. WOOD] to proceed with the consideration of this bill, but I wanted to speak for just about five minutes on the proposition that has been raised here, of repealing the provision for the district offices and suboffices.

I do not know whether this decentralization is going to be a success or not. I know that nobody knows now whether it is to be or not. As a member of the committee that helped to report out the Sweet bill I know that we labored long and earnestly before we finally reported the bill providing for district offices and suboffices. We brought the bill into the House with the provision for a number of district offices, giving the district offices final jurisdiction in these matters and creating a small number of suboffices. The House, over the committee's recommendation, increased the number of suboffices, and it was only by a diligent fight on the part of the committee that we prevented the enactment of legislation which would have given the 148 suboffices complete jurisdiction that is now given the district offices.

Everyone who has studied the proposition at all knows that there is going to be difficulty and hardship and some lost files in changing this system. This law was passed in August of last year. This is January. Nobody knows whether it is going to succeed or not, so far as actual results now are concerned. I think it can unquestionably be said that, so far as Washington is concerned, so far as the Congressman is concerned, his difficulties with cases which are presented to him are manifestly increased. The decentralization was for the purpose of putting the administration close to the soldier boys, so that the soldier boys could reach the suboffices and the district offices.

Now, it follows necessarily that when a Congressman is appealed to, with the file in the district office or the suboffice, the Congressman has greater difficulty in getting cases through the Washington office into the district office and in the suboffice. The point I am making is that it is not necessarily a bad law because our difficulties increase. When we passed this bill at the earnest insistence of the service men and brought into the form of legislation the remedy that would give relief to the service man, and we all praised the bill, I could not help but wonder—and I think I expressed the idea on the floor of this House—I could not help but wonder whether it could be carried into effect. How easy it is in a legislative enactment to make wise provision to take care of all of the complaints of 4,000,000 men, dealing with a half dozen different questions—compensation, insurance, hospitalization, vocational training! How easy it is to write it into the law!

How easy it is to write it into the law, and how difficult it is for the process of administration, with all its imperfections, with all its human frailties, to give the benefit to the final beneficiary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks leave that his time be extended for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The point I want to make is, let us not decide suddenly to change the policy we have agreed upon. Let us remember the difficulty that is always in the way of the practical administration of a law which embraces 4,000,000 beneficiaries and covers half a dozen different elements. We say there is delay because they want an affidavit to prove this and an affidavit to prove that. We wrote the law. We have to surround it with these requirements. The difficulties must necessarily be there. These administrative officers can not grant compensation unless the law is complied with. Let us not condemn them for carrying out the provisions of the law which we wrote. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Vocational rehabilitation: For carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended, $127,000,000: Provided, That no part of the foregoing sum shall be used for the establishment, maintenance, or operation of training schools at any Army camp or cantonment acquired for use as a training center, except Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ohio: Provided further, That the enrollment of trainees at the training school, Chillicothe, Ohio, shall not exceed 1,000 at any one time: Provided further, That no part of the foregoing appropriation shall be expended for construction work except necessary minor repairs.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HERRICK: Page 34, line 13, after the word "repairs," insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"All regional offices of the Veterans' Bureau are hereby abolished and all records pertaining thereto are hereby transferred to the central office at Washington D. C."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My point of order is that it is a change of existing law and legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. REECE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REECE: Page 34, line 7, after the word "cantonment," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert a period after the word "cantonment.'

Mr. REECE. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is simply to prevent the establishment, maintenance, or operation of training schools at any Army camp or cantonment.

I have talked with a large number of ex-service men, as well as other men, who are familiar with this phase of rehabilitation work, and in their opinion it is not a wise policy to carry it on at these Army camps and cantonments. The committee evidently thought the same, since it excluded all the camps except Camp Sherman. The chief objection to carrying on this rehabilitation work at these Army camps and cantonments is that the ex-service men who have been wounded are segregated into these Army centers where they are still under the old Army environment, and to a degree under the old regulations, when they ought to be dissociated from them and put out into civilian life, and get civilian ideas by mingling with civilians. That is the purpose of the amendment, and I submit it for the consideration of the House.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word upon this amendment. The committee spent considerable time in hearing evidence upon this question pro and con. I will confess that as far as I am personally concerned I am in sympathy with the amendment, but I think it would be very unwise to adopt it, and I will tell you why. The Chillicothe institution has already been established. They have assembled there what is assumed to be a practical university to teach all that may be taught in other institutions, and in addition to teach some of the things that can not be taught elsewhere. There are some things that appeal to the average mind in favor of this undertaking, but it is entirely experimental. Whether it will be a success or not no one knows. If it is a success the experimentation authorized in this measure will be developed. If it is not a success we will all know it. We do not want to take away from these young men any possible opportunity. It has been demonstrated that there are some who are peculiarly afflicted who can not be given the advantage of vocational training in the institutions of this country. There are those who are afflicted with epilepsy, who can not be placed in danger, and some other peculiar cases that may be treated at this institution.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. Under what authority was this institution established?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not think under any authority.

Mr. RAYBURN. How many of these universities did the Director of the Veterans' Bureau want to establish; five, did he not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know. I do not want to do the director of the bureau any injustice, and I do not think this idea originated with him. It was proposed that a number of these cantonments be utilized for this purpose during the time of this vocational education, but they have not attempted to carry it out at any place except at Camp Sherman. There they have established an institution which is now a going concern. They have, I think, some 360 ex-service men there, or had at the time of our last hearing upon this proposition, and they have an overhead established which will take care of at least 1,000. If it is confined to 360 it will make the proportional expenditure very extravagant; but if it is permitted to go to the length of educating or trying to educate 1,000 men there, it will bring the expense of that institution within a reasonable approximation of similar expenses for like education in other places.

I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If there is no authority of law for this institution, what is the necessity for any part of this proviso?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Perhaps I ought to have said in answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] that it may be a question upon which lawyers might honestly differ whether there is or is not authority; but they claim authority under section 9 of the vocational rehabilitation act.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This proviso appears by implication to authorize the expenditure.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and the gentlemen felt they had a right to do it. I do not propose to set up my opinion against them.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I ask the gentleman whether the Comptroller General has passed on this expenditure?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. The expenditure has thus far been allowed. I feel we will be taking upon ourselves a responsibility that should not be taken under existing conditions. There will be no further expenditure on any of these other proposed institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The limitation with reference to the education of trainees is 1,000. I think that with the admonition that the director of this bureau has received at the hands of the committee and from different Members of Congress, before any of these other enterprises are undertaken he will at least advise with Congress. There was a rumor that they proposed to establish a nautical school on one of these vessels belonging to the Shipping Board. That was purely imaginary. On investigation we found there was no attempt at that at all. The only thing being done was in response to a demand for that sort of education to inquire whether it was practical and advisable. I believe your committee has acted wisely in making this limitation what it is. I believe it would be unwise if we destroyed this experiment which has been undertaken by those who were in charge of the administrative branch of this activity.

Mr. REECE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I offered, and offer in its place a substitute, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which he offered, and offers as a substitute the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 7, after the word "cantonment," strike out the remainder of line 7 and all of lines 8, 9, and 10, and insert a semicolon after the word "cantonment."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the substitution?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. REECE], for I can not understand how the health of a thousand disabled ex-service men will be improved by herding them together in a camp or cantonment. And I can not see how the health of 500 men suffering from epilepsy can ever improve when they are placed together in a camp, even though it is for the purpose of vocational education. Leaving aside the question of the vast expenditure of money, it is most certainly a wrong treatment for the men themselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were—ayes 79, noes 35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive, and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote upon the Reece amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the other amendments en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Reece amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 7, after the word "cantonment," strike out the remainder of line 7 and all of lines 8, 9, and 10 and insert a semicolon after the word "cantonment."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 70, noes 32.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Eleven Members, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. LANGLEY and Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from South Carolina yield to me, so that I may offer an amendment to his motion to recommit? I concede that under the general practice, although it is not in the rules, he is entitled to recognition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that he must recognize the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think the Chair is correct, but I do not think I ought to be shut off in any such way. I want to offer an amendment to his motion to recommit, and did not for the moment realize the exact status of the parliamentary situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. LANGLEY. While I have not had a chance to carefully examine the precedents, I think my contention is correct.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

Mr. LANGLEY. I was conversing for the moment with my beloved friend, Uncle JOE CANNON, and overlooked the fact that the time had not yet arrived for me to make my motion to recommit. The ruling of the Chair, of course, is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina moves to recommit H. R. 9981 to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same forthwith with the following amendment, striking out the language in lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 28, which is as follows:

"For the payment of claims, damage charges, and miscellaneous adjustments, $50,000,000, of which $30,000,000 shall be immediately available," and insert, on page 28, after line 12, a new paragraph reading as follows:

"Of the sums appropriated and made available for expenditure in this act for the United States Shipping Board and United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation not more than $500,000 shall be expended for advertising purposes."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. MANN. The language which the Clerk read to be stricken out is not correct. It is intended with the amendments agreed to. There were two amendments.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; with the amendments agreed to. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. I do not think the motion need be changed, but the language reported to be stricken out ought to include both amendments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Would not the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina be in order if he should move to strike out lines 23 to 25, inclusive?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order, of course.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Let us straighten out this first. Does the gentleman from South Carolina desire to withdraw or change his motion?

Mr. MANN. I do not think that the motion need be changed. It needs only to strike out those three lines reported with the amendments agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; to strike out those three lines as amended.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was again reported.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in due time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the motion so it will read "as amended."

The SPEAKER. That is in order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question, and the gentleman from Kentucky makes a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LANGLEY. I desire to ask the Chair if a motion to recommit is defeated is another motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. No; it is not in order.

Mr. LANGLEY. Somebody has ruled it is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very glad for the gentleman to cite such a precedent.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not happen to have at the moment the citation of the ruling, but I will submit it to the Chair later on.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I think the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina is not only confusing, but——

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BEGG. The motion to recommit is composed of two substantive motions, and I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. It has been decided that a motion to recommit can not be divided.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina to recommit the bill with instructions.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina) there were—ayes 41, noes 72.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did I understand the Chair to rule in response to an inquiry that this motion was not divisible?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a motion to recommit can not be divided.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do, too.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and there were—yeas 116, nays 172, answered "present" 1, not voting, 141, as follows:

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], and therefore I wish to answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LANGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute, and most of that one minute will be occupied in reading the motion to recommit that I endeavored to offer a few moments ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am against this civil-service nonsense. I have always been against it, because I have been up against it and know what it means. [Applause.] I think that the greatest embarrassment to Republican Members of Congress all over the United States to-day is that they can not name their own friends to these places. I am called on to carry out my promises but am helpless in my efforts to redeem my promises. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to insert in the RECORD the motion to recommit, which I think was in order, and which I think the Chair, with all due respect to him, was mistaken in his ruling that it was not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the motion which he thinks was in order. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman might think it was in order. It was not offered on the floor.

Mr. LANGLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I sought to offer it.

Mr. WALSH. I do not see what useful purpose can be served.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not know what I know. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. I regret to say that that is very true. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. If you want to object, go ahead and do it. I will put it in the RECORD to-morrow or some other day. I want the RECORD to show that I am against the President's order and sought to have a debate on it.

Mr. WALSH. At the intercession of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK], I will not object.

The following is the motion referred to:

Mr. LANGLEY, of Kentucky, moves to recommit the bill H. R. 9981 to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to that committee to report it back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment:

"Strike out, on page 7, the paragraph beginning with line 10 and ending with line 15, and the succeeding paragraph, beginning with line 16 and ending with line 21."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 167, noes 41.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. I think we ought to have one.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-seven Members are present, a quorum.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. WOOD of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER appointed the following as members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy:

Mr. HICKS, Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, Mr. SNYDER, Mr. CRISP, and Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of law and order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of law and order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. WALSH. On law and order?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. No; on agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REREFERENCE OF BILL.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 621, which is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, be rereferred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Raymond A. Lasance, national adjutant of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, together with a memorial presented to the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, those memorials are ordinarily put through the basket.

Mr. ROUSE. This is in regard to the condition of the ex-service men.

Mr. WALSH. It does not make any difference what they are in regard to. They usually go through the basket. I think we ought not to start the practice of printing memorials in the RECORD unless it is in regard to something of most unusual importance.

Mr. ROUSE. This is of great importance.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is a copy of the memorial that was sent to the President.

Mr. WALSH. Is it a memorial to the President?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A copy of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter and memorial referred to:

THE DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR, NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
Cincinnati, Ohio, January 17, 1922.

DEAR SIR: Our national commander, Judge Robert S. Marx, in the course of his recent address to the Ohio State convention of our organization at Columbus revealed the startling conditions of neglect, indifference, overcrowding, and profiteering surrounding the insane veterans in Ohio. The statements made by Judge Marx were followed by a no less startling confirmation and admission of their truth by the State authorities of Ohio having charge of the State institutions for the insane.

As the recognized national association of the wounded and disabled men themselves we, therefore, felt it our duty to make a Nation-wide investigation of the treatment of the insane veterans. This investigation was conducted by our chapters throughout the Union and disclosed the same conditions of genuine neglect, indifference, overcrowding, and profiteering as were found to exist in Ohio. For these reasons we have presented a memorial to President Harding urging the prompt relief of this situation by the appropriation of the sum of $16,500,000, to provide adequate and sufficient hospitals to take care of the insane and tubercular ex-service men, a copy of which memorial is inclosed herewith. A bill to provide this appropriation has been introduced in Congress and is known as the Langley bill. We feel that the situation calling for the enactment of this bill into a law is an emergency requiring immediate action by Congress and are appealing to you for help in securing the most immediate action. May we count upon your support?

Yours, very truly,

THE DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR,
By RAYMOND A. LASANCE, National Adjutant.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 11.

The Disabled American Veterans of the World War, as the official national association of the wounded and disabled men themselves, to-day presented to President Harding a memorial reciting the inadequate treatment and neglect of the mentally disabled veterans of the recent war and appealing for Government hospitals and immediate relief from conditions of gross overcrowding, profiteering, and mistreatment of insane veterans in pauper and criminal asylums.

The memorial presented reads as follows:

"We, the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, as the official national organization of the wounded and disabled men themselves, respectfully present this memorial in behalf of the thousands of our mentally disabled comrades, who, unable to speak for themselves, are the victims of gross neglect, callous indifference, deliberate profiteering, and inadequate treatment to an extent which is a black reproach to the honor of this rich Nation.

"We present this memorial in the confident belief that as the President of the United States and having the welfare of the disabled soldiers of the Nation at heart, you will not permit the conditions recited herein to continue one instant longer than is absolutely necessary to provide the means and money to right this injustice.

"We begin this statement of fact by depicting conditions in Ohio, because as an Ohioan familiar with Ohio institutions and government, you will readily understand that if such conditions exist in Ohio, which is considered to have better institutions for the care of the insane than most States, the conditions in the other States of the Union are no better and in many States are even worse.

INADEQUATE TREATMENT IN OHIO.

"We represent that in the State of Ohio to-day—

"First. The Government of the United States has provided no hospital facilities of any kind to care for mentally disabled ex-service men.

"Second. That the United States has farmed out the insane ex-service men of Ohio to State asylums which are notoriously overcrowded, undermanned, and inadequately equipped to treat and care for them.

PATIENTS SLEEP ON FLOOR.

"Third. That, for example, in the Longview Asylum of Hamilton County, Ohio, there are 42 gallant soldiers who broke down mentally under the stress of war, although Longview is so overcrowded that 240 of the inmates sleep on the floor like cattle every night.

"Fourth. That although approximately one-half of the 250 mentally diseased and curable cases are being daily doomed to permanent improper medical treatment and hospital care for their mental diseases, these men are given no medical treatment of any kind for their mental diseases, and curable cases are being daily doomed to permanent insanity.

"Fifth. That the tubercular and nontubercular patients in these institutions are not separated, but are all mixed together.

FIFTY PER CENT PROFIT MADE ON SOLDIERS.

"Sixth. Finally we represent:

"That the State of Ohio is making a profit averaging $300 a year for every service man confined in Ohio asylums, which profit is made from the money paid by the United States Government to the State. The truth of these charges is frankly admitted by the officials of the State institutions.

CHARGES ADMITTED.

"Dr. E. W. North, sperintendent of Longview Asylum, in a public statement issued December 28, 1921, said: 'These statements are not exaggerated in any particular.'

"Dr. H. S. MacAyeal, director of the State welfare department, said in a public statement, issued December 30, 1921, that the State of Ohio made the profit shown by the following table on each insane soldier in its institutions, namely:

Statement showing the profit made by the State of Ohio on each insane soldier for the year ending Dec. 30, 1921.

Institutions.	Cost per man.	Received from United States.	Profit made by State per man per year.
Athens State Hospital	$277.86	$547.50	$276.66
Cleveland State Hospital	238.24	547.50	309.26
Dayton State Hospital	309.54	547.50	237.96
Lima State Hospital	310.75	547.50	236.75
Massillon State Hospital	234.20	547.50	304.30
Longview Hospital	231.28	547.50	316.22
Toledo State Hospital	286.86	547.50	260.64
Ohio Hospital for Epileptics	332.69	547.50	214.81
Institution for Feeble-Minded	226.57	547.50	320.93

"The State of Ohio makes a profit of more than $125,000 annually by reason of ex-service men in Ohio asylums.

NEGLECT OF INSANE VETERANS NATION WIDE.

"What is true in Ohio is true in practically every State in the Union, because of the failure of the United States to provide adequate facilities for the medical care and hospitalization of our mentally disabled comrades.

"The national magnitude of the problem may be grasped from the fact that almost one-third (27 per cent) of all sick soldiers now in hospitals are mental cases.

UNSEEN ARMY OF NEGLECTED INSANE.

"Moreover, for every mentally afflicted soldier in any institution to-day there is another soldier who should be receiving treatment, but whose family will not consent to have him adjudged a 'pauper insane' and sent to one of these State asylums for the pauper or criminal insane, which are the only places now available. If the Govenrment had proper hospitals, these men who now form the unseen army of neglected insane would glady come forth and half of them would be restored to useful citizenship. We charge that not only are these cases totally neglected, but that in thousands of cases the United States Government has farmed out its responsibility to care for its own fighters, who broke down mentally because of their service.

ONE-HALF INSANE VETERANS "FARMED OUT."

"We charge that conditions in Ohio are duplicated in almost every State in the Union, and that to-day nearly one-half, namely, 48 per cent, of all neuropsychiatric patients are farmed out to 'contract' institutions, asylums, and what not. It is a misnomer to call these 'contract' places 'hospitals.' They are mostly nothing more than 'lockups.'

"Of the 13 Government hospitals for mental cases only 1—St. Elizabeths—was built for that purpose. All of the rest are makeshifts—remodeled schools, inebriate institutions, Army posts, soldiers' homes, etc. A complete list of existing Government facilities is herewith attached as annex No. 1 to this memorial.

FOUR THOUSAND VETERANS IN "CONTRACT" ASYLUMS.

"When all the money now appropriated for additional facilities is spent and the facilities are finally available—two years hence—only 2,860 more beds will exist, and there are now, to-day, over 4,000 mentally sick soldiers in unfit, overcrowded, and undesirable 'contract' asylums and an equal number who ought to be hospitalized but are rightfully unwilling to go to such places as Longview, and the Government officials admit they can offer nothing better.

SHORT 4,000 BEDS.

"Moreover, when the extra beds for which money has been appropriated by public act 384 are ready—in two or more years—the increasing number of patients will still leave the United States Government short 4,000 beds to properly hospitalize the mentally disabled ex-service men who will then need hospital care.

"This need is growing greater. On July 16, 1921, there were 7,440 neuropsychiatric cases in hospitals, of whom 3,632 were farmed out to 'contract asylums.' The United States Senate committee reported August 24, 1921 (Rept. 233, pt. 2), that there was an urgent need for 4,375 more beds for mentally unbalanced veterans of the World War.

HUMAN LIFE AT STAKE.

"The Senate committee reported that this need will exist after all the money for hospitals now appropriated is spent. They found that $16,000,000 more must be spent to take care of the tubercular and mental patients. Yet to date nothing has been done. Meanwhile human life is at stake. Every day's delay adds to the growing risk of our comrades whose mental condition is becoming incurable because insanity is a disease which grows progressively worse.

"The crying pity of this criminal neglect of the Government to care for these insane veterans is that all competent physicians and physchiatrists agree that fully one-half of these young soldiers can be restored to reason or socially and economically rehabilitated by prompt medical care. These thousands of brave Americans who could be cured are to-day being doomed to mindless lives and to permanent insanity by neglect, indifference, or ignorance.

MORE HOSPITALS ONLY REMEDY.

"We therefore address this appeal to you for action to save these men. The remedy is simple. It is sufficient Government hospitals adapted for the treatment of mental cases.

"By this, we mean real hospitals—not phantom hospitals—hospitals built and equipped for the care of mental cases, not makeshifts—and not 'lock ups' or asylums, miscalled hospitals. There is no remedy except to provide Government hospitals with sufficient beds to care for every one of these service men. What if we do have to scrap part of these hospitals when the need ceases to exist—we daily build naval and military armaments intended to end life, which in a few years are useless and then scrapped. Why not build hospitals to save life when the need is urgent, even if in 20 years part of these hospitals like armaments must be scrapped?

"Let us appropriate some of the money we will save from 'scrapped' ships to build these hospitals.

SIXTEEN MILLION NEEDED NOW.

"It will cost $16,000,000 now to provide enough Government hospitals to care for all the insane and all the tubercular veterans. This bill is before Congress. It is based on the findings of the best medical experts, headed by Dr. White and appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. We ask, Mr. President, that you urge Congress to appropriate the money to provide these hospitals without delay.

RECOMMENDATION FOR EMERGENCY.

"Meanwhile we face the emergency of caring for these patients until the money is appropriated and after that until the hospitals are built and the personnel, staff, and equipment obtained, and the hospitals ready to receive patients. This will take at least two years. Something must be done quickly to bridge this terrible gap. We respectfully suggest the following measures of immediate relief:

INDEPENDENT COMMITTEE OF SERVICE MEN.

"First. Since contract hospitals must be used for two or more years to come, we urge infinitely more rigid supervision than is now provided by the Veterans' Bureau and Public Health Service, and to obtain this we recommend that an independent commission of ex-service men be appointed in every State to assist the Veterans' Bureau in supervising the care given insane veterans in contract institutions.

ABOLISH THE PROFIT.

"Second. In view of the large profit now being made by many public and private contract institutions which are giving inferior care and receiving more than twice the amount they actually spend on the service men we recommend not only the rigid examination of the facilities offered before the payment of bills but also that every institution receiving money from the United States Government for the care of disabled soldiers and sailors be required to spend every dollar received for the benefit of such soldiers and sailors exclusively.

ESTABLISH DISPENSARIES.

"Third. We further ask that Government dispensaries be provided where emergency care and treatment can be supplied. The policy of the Veterans' Bureau is to relieve the Hospital load by discharging patients from hospitals as soon as the maximum hospital improvement has been reached and to send these patients to special training centers. Mental cases must be taken care of between their discharge from the hospital and their rehabilitation, and the dispensary is essential to take care of this interval. Such dispensaries will also be able to treat many cases effectively and prevent the progress of their disease and the necessity of hospitalization.

DEVELOP SOCIAL SERVICE.

"We also petition the good offices of the Executive to request the Government agencies to organize a program of community social service to cooperate with the Government in the rehabilitation of all mental patients. Efficient social service will be a big factor in preventing incipient cases from progressing to a point requiring hospital care and from preventing improved cases from going back to asylums. Consideration of both humanity and economy unite to influence the development of such social service, which is to-day wholly unorganized.

FINAL APPEAL.

"Mr. President, in the name of 10,000 young soldiers, sailors, and marines who sacrificed their minds for America we ask that America now give its millions quickly and generously to restore to the thousands who can still 'come back,' God's most precious gift to man—his reasoning powers. We are certain our appeal will not be in vain.

"Very respectfully,

"THE DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR,
"By ROBERT S. MARX, National Commander.

"Attest:

"RAYMOND A. LASANCE,
"National Adjutant."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial of January 29, 1922, from the New York Times relative to the Sequoia National Park.

Mr. WALSH. On what subject?

Mr. BARBOUR. It is in regard to the bill H. R. 7452, now pending on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, that provides for the enlargement of the Sequoia National Park and changing the name to Roosevelt-Sequoia Park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Following is the editorial referred to:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 29, 1922.]

THE SEQUOIA PARK.

The Sequoia National Park has as its particular glory that it preserves the "most magnificent forest perhaps to be found in the world." This is a forest of giant trees, many of which were in existence 2,000 years before the Christian era and have grown to a height of 300 feet and a girth of 30. To this reservation of patriarchal trees, contemporaries of Homer, it is now proposed to add a great stretch of scenic wilderness—canyons, waterfalls, forests, glaciers, granite slopes, and alpine meadows—making a total area of 1,100 square miles, instead of 252, with peaks of the Sierras on its borders which John Muir called the "Mountains of Light." Among these rises Mount Whitney, the highest mountain in the United States. With such enlargement and such elevation in its scenic grandeur, it will become not only one of the capital national parks but perhaps the most attractive of the Nation's playgrounds.

This reservation, now a part of the national-forest area, is to be known in its enlarged boundaries as the Roosevelt-Sequoia Park—if the Barbour bill becomes a law. Mr. Mather, the Director of the National Parks, states that, in its amended form (forbidding the granting of sites for the commercial development of water power), the bill has now the harmonious support of all advocates of the park, and even that of a number of its former opponents. Los Angeles has been looking to this area for sources of future water power, but it is hoped that even that city will see that the trees of the park far outweigh the local value of the water power.

The boundaries of this proposed park have been drawn by the National Parks Service, and represent due consideration of scenic and recreational values, on the one hand, and the proper use of natural resources on the other. In drawing the lines of the park something has happened that has never happened before, except in the slight rectification of boundaries: A portion of the present Sequoia Park area has not been included in the Roosevelt-Sequoia Park. This is disturbing, and would be more so if there were not complete confidence in the wisdom and fearlessness of the Forest Service in protecting every tree or grove in the national domain that needs protection. In the revision and great enlargement of the bounds of the present park not only has a part of the present park been eliminated but two groves of sequoias—small by comparison with the great groves that are still included in the proposed park—are left outside. The answer—and it is entirely satisfying under the present administration of the Forest Service—is to pass the Barbour bill, make this large reservation, and then see to it that our excellent Forest Service is in no way impaired or interfered with in its scientific care of our national forests, including these precious redwoods.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DRIVER, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. WINGO), was granted leave of absence, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, January 31, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask unanimous consent to take up the conference report on the Treasury Department appropriation bill. If it leads to any extended remarks, I shall not press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. McCUMBER. With the understanding that the pending bill is laid aside temporarily for the consideration of the conference report and that the conference report will require no debate, I shall have no objection, but I wish to reserve the right to object if it leads to any discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think it is right to take up the conference report and bind everyone not to ask any questions about it. There may be some questions to be asked about the report.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, perhaps I ought to state that this is a partial report and it is my intention simply to ask that the report be adopted and that the remaining unsettled amendments be insisted upon by the Senate and referred back to the conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator, of course, will explain what we are asked to adopt, what the conference committee have agreed on, and what amendments are still in disagreement. I have no objection to taking up the conference report.

So Mr. SIMMONS's amendment to the committee amendment as amended was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina will be stated.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina if the amendment which he now proposes is the so-called bonus amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the so-called bonus amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will not defer offering that amendment until after the substitute which I am going to offer to the bill shall have been voted on? His amendment will then be in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be very glad to accommodate the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he now offer this amendment, it might be embarrassing to certain Senators to have to vote on that amendment first.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdraw my amendment temporarily, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina temporarily withdraws his proposed amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, at the end of section 3, page 3, line 8, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, at the end of section 3, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to insert "with interest upon all deferred payments."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the remarks which I made on yesterday were for the purpose of leading up to the amendment which I have now offered. I then endeavored to show that at the present time we have all the obligations which it is either necessary or advisable for the Government to have with respect to the major loans until the time arrives when the debtor nations are ready to begin payment. I called attention to the form of the obligations which the Government holds at the present time. Those obligations provide that the foreign Governments shall issue bonds, the terms of which are specified. There is no reason why those bonds should not be called for now; so I say that the present arrangement is all that ought to be desired until the time comes when the debtor countries are to begin payment.

Mr. President, I see no reason why we should now readjust this indebtedness and yet have the time of payment deferred for two or three years. Why do that now? If we are going to make some arrangement which shall go into force only in the future, and when we do not expect present payment, why give up the obligations which we now have? So, Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought not to embark upon a readjustment of these matters until all payments which are to be deferred shall be deferred on a cash basis or on a basis looking to the payment of the interest upon them.

If Senators will study the bill they will find that, while there is a provision in it that the rate of interest shall not be less than 4½ per cent, there is no provision in it which requires that any rate of interest shall be charged upon deferred payments. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill to point out, if he can, where there is any requirement in this bill that deferred payments shall bear any rate of interest. It is left to the proposed commission to fix a rate whenever any rate is to be fixed, and the bill provides that when a rate is fixed it shall not be less than 4½ per cent; but I fail to find in the bill any requirement that any rate of interest shall be fixed on deferred payments. Therefore it seems to me that there ought to be a provision in the bill so that after the new arrangement shall be entered into deferred payments shall bear interest, or, in other words, put the transaction upon a cash basis. So I have proposed this amendment: At the end of section 3, the latter part of which provides that there shall be no cancellation of such indebtedness except through payment thereof, add the words "with interest upon all deferred payments."

What objection can there be to such an amendment? It is simply a requirement that when any arrangement is entered into for the payment in the future of any part of this indebtedness whatever deferred payments there may be shall bear interest. If the bill does not contain some such provision as that, what is the use of disturbing the obligations which we have at the present time? If we are not going to put the transaction upon a cash basis, why disturb or modify the obligations which the Government now holds?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to inquire whether the Senator's amendment would make it necessary to collect interest on the interest already deferred?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It will now; it simply provides that when the commission shall exercise its power it shall not provide for deferred payments without interest upon such deferred payments.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is, if they should provide that the interest of a certain country may not be paid for the next 10 years, they could not do so without providing that such country pay interest on the deferred interest?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DIAL. Would it not be better to specify the rate of interest?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The bill in the previous section provides that the rate of interest shall not be less than 4½ per cent, and whenever they charge interest at all under this bill it must be at a rate not less than 4½ per cent.

Mr. DIAL. I did not know whether that applied simply to the principal or to the interest on interest.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the purpose of the amendment, and it seems to me that it ought to be accepted by the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill—that whenever we do have deferred payments they shall bear interest. There is no reason why the present arrangement should not continue until the foreign obligations are put upon a cash basis, and whenever that is done, of course, all deferred payments ought to bear some rate of interest.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Do I understand the Senator to contend that we should compound the interest upon the deferred payments?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If there is interest funded, of course, it will amount to that; but I submit that nobody in any business transaction ever enters into an agreement to defer present obligations—I mean, obligations which are payable at the present time—and postpone payment without charging interest upon it. No business concern ever does anything else. Whenever you are going to extend the time for the payment of anything, that is a new contract; and it seems to me, although it may be in the nature of compounding interest, that it is what is done in business life every day.

Mr. KING. The Senator means that he would compute the interest now due, not compound it every six months from the time of the issue of the obligations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly not. If they want to refund the present interest and then have it spread over a period of years, the commission would have authority to do that upon the payment of interest.

Mr. KING. That is right.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But it is not a compounding proposition from time to time. They have the opportunity now to pay this interest, if they want to, to avoid any future interest; but if the interest now due is refunded and put into long-term obligations those obligations should bear a rate of interest. It is simply applying business methods to this transaction. If they do not want to pay interest upon the deferred payments of interest, let them pay the interest now, just the same as any individual would do. The necessity for this refunding has not been shown; but if they do want to refund any part of this and spread it out over a period of years, let it be in the form of an obligation which bears upon its face at least that it is intended as a cash transaction, and to settle up and take a new start upon the payment of this indebtedness. It will give them an opportunity to refund any part of it, but it requires that if they do refund the deferred payments shall bear interest.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, one would think from some of the arguments that are made on the floor of the Senate that we were a famished Nation, hungering for the last drop of blood that we can possibly extract from our debtors. I do not believe that the American people want to occupy that attitude.

Mr. President, I have never heard of any civilized nation, any nation that expected to meet its obligations when they became due, giving a bond that anticipated beforehand that it did not expect to meet the interest on its bonds when they were due, and expected to pay interest upon interest. If we placed that in the law it would be at least an indication to the nations of the world that we hardly expected them to pay their interest when it became due, but that we did expect to give them a further time on their interest, on condition that they pay interest upon the deferred interest. What we want is to collect our interest. What we want is a bond given by a government on such terms, with interest at such a rate, payable at such times, that the nations will meet it, and then we expect them to pay that interest when it becomes due. I think that every nation that intends to give us a bond will give us a bond that will carry with it the implication, not that the interest may be deferred, but that the interest will be paid when it is due.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Does the Senator mean that he is not going to refund the interest that is due now at all?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, provision is made for the refundment of the accumulated interest, because that accumulated interest is of itself an obligation. I shall be glad when we get that accumulated interest into a bond bearing interest; but I do not believe that it is the proper thing for us to do to ask a compound interest upon that interest. I think we will receive bonds for the accumulated interest and that such bonds will bear the same rate of interest that the other bonds bear.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Does the Senator believe that this commission should have power to forego the payment of any of this interest?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the bill provides that the commission can not forego the payment of one penny of the interest. The bill gives authority to convert the interest into long-time bonds if the countries are not able to pay it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, may I ask the Senator whether it is his idea that the long-term bonds into which the interest shall be refunded shall not bear interest?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is to be converted into long-time bonds bearing interest. Why does the Senator waste time in asking me that question when the bill itself is so clear and so definite that there can be no misunderstanding?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, what objection has the Senator to my amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I gave my objection to it. If the Senator can not understand it, and wants me to repeat it, I must say that I can not take the time to repeat it. I stated the reasons why I thought this country should not ask for compound interest upon the interest which may become due under the bonds which will be received. Now the Senator asks me to state them over again.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, my amendment has nothing to do with that situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes; it has.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amendment which I propose is that in stipulating for deferred payments, those deferred payments shall bear interest. That is all that my amendment means, and it is simply a limitation upon the commission. If this Government of ours ever wants to remit a part of this indebtedness, I say that the Congress of the United States should do that, representing the American people, and not confer upon any commission the power to do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have the floor. The Senator has had his time. By no such maneuvering as that is the Senator going to get another opportunity to speak for 10 minutes. The Senator is making a second argument, and that is contrary to our unanimous-consent agreement.

The Senator is mistaken when he says that his amendment applies only to the defaulted interest upon the demand obligations. The way his amendment is worded it would compel them in issuing bonds to provide that all interest shall bear interest after it becomes due.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No, Mr. President; I call the attention of the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. To the language of my amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Just a moment. Will the Senator suspend a moment until the Chair discovers whether the Senator from North Dakota yields?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to call attention to the language of my amendment. It is at the end of section 3, which provides:

> That this act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government, or cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof.

Now, my amendment follows:

> With interest upon all deferred payments.

That is, which the commission may defer.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, of course. Therefore any matter that they may defer will bear interest; and all of the obligations will have to be deferred, or most of them, beyond the time now fixed by law. Therefore, under the amendment offered by the Senator, it would be necessary to provide in the bonds for compound interest.

I say frankly that that should not be done, and I have here the evidence that was taken before the committee, in which the Secretary of the Treasury holds that under the agreement that was made with the foreign nations they could not compound the interest upon the past-due interest. I shall not take the time to read it now, because I have not the time to read it, but it is clear and definite that the understanding between the Governments was that we should not charge them compound interest upon the deferred interest; and therefore when they take all of the deferred interest and issue long-time bonds for it, those bonds to bear interest, that is all that we can ask.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very much surprised at the statement of the chairman of the committee. When the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], to the effect that interest should be paid either annually or semiannually, was defeated, the Senate left the commission absolutely free to fix any time it pleased over which interest could be paid. It left the commission free to say that interest should be paid once in 2 years, or once in 3 years, or once in 5 years, or once in 10 years, or even once in 20 years; and if the commission exercises that power, as I believe it intends to exercise the power, these debtors would be given the benefit of the use of the money during that period.

If the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina had prevailed, these nations would have been required to pay their interest so that it would be kept current, but as it is now—and the Senator from North Dakota knows it—the commission has power to defer the payment of interest for 20 years, and during that time the interest would accumulate into an enormous sum of money on which no interest would accrue.

Section 2 of the bill provides that this commission shall have the power to refund or convert, and to extend the time of the payment of the interest; but that power is indefinite. There is no limit upon it. If it provided for the payment of the interest at the end of 10 years, then, if we figure the interest at $500,000,000 a year, constantly accumulating, the debtor nations would have the use of $300,000,000 free of charge, because the interest for the first year would be five hundred million, for the second year it would amount to a thousand million, at the end of the third year it would be a thousand five hundred million, and at the end of the fifth year it would be three thousand million dollars, and by the end of the 10 years it would be twice that amount. So the average amount of money which this commission has the power, under the bill, to allow to the debtor nations free of any interest is at least three thousand million dollars, if we figure it on a 10-year basis.

As I understand it, it is the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico to make that impossible, to make it impossible for this commission to defer the payment of interest without providing for the collection of interest on the deferred interest, and that is all there is to the amendment. If the Senate wants to put in the hands of this commission the power to defer the payment of the interest indefinitely without charging any interest on the deferred interest, it is giving to the commission the power to give the use of thousands of millions of dollars to the debtor nations without any charge.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. KING. The objection is made that the language contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico contemplates a compounding of interest upon that deferred interest for the period of three years, so that instead of ascertaining what the interest would be at the date of the refunding, in the aggregate, you take the interest and then compound it every six months from the time the first obligations were issued up to the time the refunding bonds shall be executed; so that would be compounding the interest, and if the amendment is susceptible of that construction, it ought to be clarified.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Personally, of course, I should not approve the idea of compounding the interest, and I doubt whether the amendment is susceptible of that construction.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It was not so intended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thought not. If it is susceptible of that construction, it could easily be corrected. What we should do, in justice, is to say to this commission, "You shall not allow the use of the money belonging to the people of the United States without interest. You are not required to compound the interest, but you should, if you defer the payment of the interest over a long period of time, make some charge for the payments so deferred."

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. NORRIS rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Utah to ask a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I have just entered the Chamber. I have taken no time in discussing this matter during the debate, but if I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico, it is intended to provide that we should charge compound interest—that is, interest on the interest on the loan.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; that is not the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. It is interest on interest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The condition is this: We have defeated the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina providing that interest should be paid semiannually. That leaves the commission free to make the interest payable once in 10 years.

Mr. SMOOT. Or once in 25 years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Or once in 25 years. That would result in an enormous gift to the other nations. The Senator from New Mexico proposes that if that is done and the commission exercises that power it shall make a charge for the average interest covering that period.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to be certain about it, and I want to ask the Senator from New Mexico a question in regard to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico has not the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator from Nebraska the floor?

Mr. NORRIS. No; but the Senator from Nebraska is entitled to have it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I was trying to tell the Senator from Utah. I believe there is a misunderstanding on both sides in regard to the proposed amendment. Unless I am entirely mistaken, the Senator from New Mexico and my colleague are both mistaken as to the necessity of it, and as to what would be accomplished by it, and the Senator from North Dakota is likewise mistaken as to what would happen if the amendment were agreed to.

We will not be able by this amendment to remedy the defect which exists in the bill on account of our failure to vote into the bill the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. This will not affect that at all.

Mr. President, I want to get the best possible legislation out of this, and I want the attention of Senators. If I am mistaken, I would like to be corrected, because I would like to vote directly on the amendment. This amendment is proposed to be added to section 3 of the bill. Let us read section 3:

> That this act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government, or cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof.

There are two things provided for. Let us eliminate one of the clauses so as to analyze it properly. Let us eliminate the first one, and it would read:

> That this act shall not be construed to authorize the cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof.

The Senator from New Mexico wants to add right after that the words "with interest on all deferred payments." Let us see how that would make the bill read:

> That this act shall not be construed to authorize * * * the cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof, with interest upon all deferred payments.

My contention is that that does not change the legal sense of the language one iota. The bill without the Senator's amendment would provide that the commission shall not cancel any part of the indebtedness except through payment. If the interest were a part of the indebtedness, they would have no right to cancel it. They can defer it, it is true, and I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, which would have prevented that. I think the Senate made a serious mistake when they voted down that amendment, because it is true that this commission, under the bill as it stands now, would be able to defer the payment of this interest until the maturity of the bonds, in 1947. But this amendment of the Senator from New Mexico will not correct that error, as my colleague argued. As I look at it, it will make absolutely no difference whatever. The amendment reads, "with interest upon all deferred payments." That means that if there is any interest due on deferred payments, it must be collected when the thing is canceled; but it means that without the amendment, because it says that it shall not cancel any of the indebtedness except through payment, and interest is part of the indebtedness.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, in order to get the Senator's viewpoint, I would like to ask him whether he favors compound interest?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not. As I look at it, the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico does not provide for compound interest. I do not think it adds anything to the bill at all. It would not accomplish what he apparently thinks it would, namely, to remedy the defect which exists by reason of the fact that we defeated the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator if he finds anything in the bill now which requires the commission to provide for any interest upon any obligation for the future?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Where?

Mr. NORRIS. That goes with the funding operation. I do not think there is any doubt about that, and, even if there were, this would not correct even that. The particular part of the bill to which the Senator seeks to attach his amendment, shorn of all the clauses which modify it, would provide simply this, that the commission shall not cancel a debt except by payment. If there is interest due as a part of the debt, they can not cancel the interest any more than they can cancel the principal. So, as far as I can see, it makes no difference, as a matter of law or of fact, whether this amendment is agreed to or not.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, while the Senator from New Mexico is on his feet I wish to ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In whose time?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the Senator from New Mexico whether he refers in his amendment to compound interest when he uses the language "with interest upon all deferred payments"?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all, if the Senator please; and at this juncture, in order to meet that suggestion, I would like to perfect my proposed amendment, in order to make it clearer, so as to make it read "with interest upon the principal of all deferred payments." I should like, if the Chair please, to modify or change my amendment so that it will read in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator read his proposed amendment again, with the change he has made in it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I propose to have it read, "with interest upon the principal of all deferred payments," and I ask to have that substituted for my other amendment so as to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator from New Mexico offer that as a substitute for his other amendment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will perfect my amendment by changing it so as to read in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico modifies his amendment, and the Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, line 8, after the word "thereof," insert a comma and the words "with interest upon the principal of all deferred payments."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that that is a useless amendment. The bill gives the authority to provide the rate of interest, and of course the rate of interest will be running against the principal until the obligation is paid.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I stated that the principal purpose of the amendment was to prevent the commission from accepting long-term obligations without a provision in those obligations for the payment of interest. The bill provides that when the interest is charged it shall be at a rate of not less than 4¼ per cent; but there is no provision in the bill which specifies that deferred payments, of principal or anything else, are to bear interest.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to what the Senator from New Mexico has just stated, I think I am safe in saying that the practice, and I think the law as well, is that whatever rate of interest is provided for in an obligation it shall apply even though the payments are deferred; and it is for that reason, Mr. President, that I think the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico is unnecessary. I do not think it will add one thing to the power granted the commission, nor do I think that by adding it there would be a different rate of interest charged. I can not conceive of that being the case.

The Senator's original amendment, if adopted, would have compelled the collection of interest upon interest, but the way he has modified that amendment, it does not give the commission any authority additional to what they have under the bill. If the rate of interest is agreed upon by this Government and the foreign Government, and it should be 4¼ per cent, and if the payments are not made at the end of 25 years—and none will have to be made until the end of 25 years—then there will either be another instrument drawn, an extension granted, or a refunding of the bonds at that time, or there will be a default upon the part of the Government owing the United States.

It seems to me that the amendment is out of place. It does not add to or take from the object of the bill in any sense. Therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], in my time, what he considers the principal of a deferred payment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amount due which is promised to be paid by the obligations.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, if the interest is not paid on a given day after the bonds are issued, does the Senator consider that that becomes the principal within the meaning of his amendment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all; because it is not deferred by the terms of the agreement between the parties.

Mr. LENROOT. But suppose they agree to defer it and it is not paid?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If they agree to defer it, then, of course, it provides for interest upon the amount of the principal of the new obligation, which would make provision for deferring the payment.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, the Senator is in favor of compound interest after the obligations are issued?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all. The amendment, as I construe it, does not mean any such thing at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], who is absent. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I do not see him present. I am unable to obtain a transfer. I merely desire to say that if the Senator from Alabama were present and I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former vote as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who is absent. Therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore as to my pair and my release therefrom, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has not voted. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. I find that I can transfer my pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], which I do, and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 46, as follows:

CONFIRMATION OF JUDGE WILLIAM S. KENYON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

I nominate WILLIAM S. KENYON, of Iowa, to be United States circuit judge, eighth circuit, vice Walter I. Smith, deceased.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 31, 1922.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, following a long-established custom, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the nomination in open executive session, without its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nomination is before the Senate in open executive session. The question is on confirming the nomination, and Senators who favor it will rise.

All the Senators present rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination is unanimously confirmed, and the President will be notified. The Senate will resume its legislative session.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I move to strike out so much of the bill as begins with the word "and," in line 16, on page 2, and ends with the word "therefor," in line 20, on the same page.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana proposes an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 16, of the original print of the bill, after the words "United States of America," it is proposed to strike out the following words:

and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it has been made perfectly clear in the debate that the occasion of this legislation, so far as the loans of this Government to foreign countries are concerned, is to get rid of the necessity of the ratification by the Senate of the United States of any arrangement which may be made; that is to say, so that a binding obligation or contract may be entered into without the approval of the United States Senate, as in the case of agreements with foreign powers generally; but no one has undertaken to explain that portion of the bill to which the amendment which I have offered is addressed.

The bill, as will be observed, deals with two classes of claims: First, those bonds or other obligations represented by loans made by our Government to other Governments; and, second, claims of whatever character they may be, arising in whatsoever manner they may arise, claims that are now in existence and claims that may hereafter come into existence. These are to be settled and adjusted as is provided in this provision of the bill. I have searched the reports of the committees dealing with the measure, and I find no explanation whatever as to why we should commit to a commission the settlement and adjustment of other claims against foreign Governments. Indeed, Mr. President, no suggestion has been made in any of the reports, no intimation is given by any of the members of the committee on the floor, as to just exactly what claims there are against foreign Governments not now represented by the bonds or obligations in the nature of written acknowledgments of indebtedness.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I just came into the Chamber and did not hear read the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Montana. Will the Senator please briefly state the effect of the amendment and where it comes in in the bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have moved to strike out the concluding portion of section 2, appearing on page 2 of the original print of the bill, which reads:

And to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. This provision seems to propose to authorize the commission to adjust any claims that this Government may have against any foreign Government without regard to the question of war loans.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly, and to include claims which the Government now has and claims which may arise in the future.

Mr. ROBINSON. During the life of the commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; during the life of the commission.

Mr. President, there is no occasion of which I know for legislation of this character. It merely emphasizes the argument that has heretofore been made, that vast powers are being lodged in the proposed commission, apparently for no purpose on earth except to deprive the Senate of the United States of its constitutional right to ratify agreements that are made with foreign powers.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The provision referred to would also authorize the commission to settle such claims as those growing out of the sinking of the Lusitania.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly. I was going to refer to that. I suppose there are many claims which are presented to the Government, but of any large class of claims now existing I know nothing, except such claims as may arise or have arisen against the German Government by reason of unlawful acts during the World War, such as the sinking of the Lusitania. This bill proposes to empower the commission to adjust all such claims against the Government of Germany, but I apprehend that it is for the purpose of adjusting claims against other Governments that this provision is inserted in the bill rather than to adjust claims against the Government of Germany. There are claims of our Government against the Government of Great Britain growing out of violations of the laws of neutrality applicable prior to the time that we entered the World War. It will be recalled that our Government protested loud and long against the illegal acts of the British Admiralty directed against our commerce prior to the time that we entered the World War, and I have no doubt that claims are asserted on behalf of citizens of the United States by our Government against the Government of Great Britain. Apparently the commission to be created is to be given power to adjust and settle all those claims, and, Senators will observe, without any limitation whatever upon its powers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator from Montana think it a significant fact that while in that part of the bill which deals with the bonds and obligations that are due the United States from our allies the meaning of the language is made absolutely clear by the insertion of the words "arising out of the war," those words are omitted in connection with the claims to which the Senator is now addressing himself? Is not that omission exceedingly significant; and does it not in itself indicate a purpose to extend the authority of the commission not only to obligations growing out of the World War but to obligations generally growing out of any cause whatsoever?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it is exceedingly significant that the important qualifying words applying to the case of the bonds and obligations are not used when reference is made to the question of other claims. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance if he will kindly advise us as to the purpose of this particular provision of the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will try to answer when the Senator from Montana shall have concluded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota for that purpose now.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not want to break into the Senator's speech; but, if he desires, I will proceed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to section 2 of the bill, which provides:

SEC. 2. That, subject to the approval of the President, the commission created by section 1 is hereby authorized to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration)—

Then follows the language—

arising out of the World War, into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Government in substitution for the bonds or obligations of such Government now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date, or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America.

From this point the Senator desires to strike out the remainder of the section down to the first proviso. The Senator will observe that, while there are included obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, and the American Relief Administration, the language used would limit those obligations to such as arose, of course, directly out of the war. I am not positive, but am of the opinion that at least so far as the American Relief Administration is concerned, other indebtedness was created after the war that did not arise directly out of the war. While the question may have been settled as to what those obligations are—and I think it is fully settled as between the two Governments—I would have doubt in my own mind whether we would not have to split some of those obligations in two if we limited the meaning of the phrase to obligations which arose out of the war.

The Senator has also mentioned that this provision might allow the settlement of claims against Germany. We have ratified and entered into a treaty with Germany which takes care of all of such claims, with the possible exception of a single class. I think the treaty does not provide for the consideration and settlement of one claim, namely, the claim of the army of occupation, but that, I imagine, is the only claim against Germany which could be settled by the commission which is not provided for in the treaty with Germany. That is my information from the Treasury Department.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When the German treaty was under consideration I called attention to the fact that no provision whatever was made for the adjustment of claims, and it was responded that they would be taken care of by a later treaty. So the Senator is mistaken in his view that the claims against the German Government are taken care of by the treaty.

Mr. McCUMBER. The addition to the treaty of the so-called Knox resolution providing that we should have the right to avail ourselves of the treaty of Versailles, it seems to me, would take care of most of the claims against Germany, such as those growing out of the sinking of the Lusitania, and claims of a similar character.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will recall the debate, he will remember that that is not the case. The resolution to which he has referred provides that all claims are reserved; but it was specifically pointed out at that time that the treaty provided no machinery whatever, and I showed clearly that the treaty of Versailles provided no machinery whatever for determining the amount of such claims; but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] answered by saying, "We will negotiate another treaty providing for taking care of those claims."

Mr. McCUMBER. The treaty provided for the taking care of those claims, but further legislation was needed to provide the machinery for that purpose. However that may be, there was furnished through the Grain Corporation and the American Relief Administration, for instance, funds long after the war was over, and, while those claims have been settled, I think the wider expression used in the bill is necessary in order that authority may not be limited particularly to advances made during the war.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, giving to the language which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] seeks to have stricken from the bill its natural effect, in my opinion it can not be construed in any other way than to authorize the commission created under the bill to adjust and settle any claim, now existing or that may arise during the life of the commission, on behalf of the United States Government against any foreign Government. The language is so explicit and comprehensive that no question of construction arises as to its correct application. If this bill passes with the language retained which the Senator from Montana seeks to have stricken out, it will provide a machinery for the settlement of every claim which the United States Government has or may hereafter have while the commission is in existence against every Government in the world.

An examination of the German treaty discloses that no provision was made in that treaty for the method of settling claims against Germany, and the same is true of the treaty with Austria. The whole question was left open to future arrangements. Under a bill which has the ostensible purpose of providing for refunding our loans to foreign Governments we are asked to authorize a commission to settle every claim, without any requirement that its proceedings shall be reported to any authority under the Government of the United States. We do not have to apply technical rules of law to reach this conclusion. We can not reach any other conclusion if we apply the ordinary rules of construction applicable in such cases.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In reference to the bonds and other obligations, it will be observed that the powers of the commission are restricted within comparatively narrow limits. Here authority is given to adjust and settle these claims upon any terms whatever that the commission may desire. I inquire of the Senator whether, in his judgment, the Congress of the United States can delegate any such power to a commission?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think not. The Senator from Montana yesterday stated the correct limitation on the power of Congress to delegate its authority to commissions or other bodies. Under the Constitution Congress is required to exercise its discretion as to what constitutes the best interests of the United States and the people of the United States, and it can not delegate that power to any commission; but in addition to the constitutional question which has been so clearly presented in connection with another feature of the bill by the Senator from Montana there is involved a question of policy of very far-reaching significance.

Does the Senate of the United States desire to commit itself to the policy of permitting this commission, without limitation and without any requirement or obligation to report its proceedings to the Congress, to take any action it pleases in the settlement of all outstanding claims and of all claims that may arise between this Government and any foreign Government? Why, the language is so broad that it embraces every claim of every character—every claim that now exists and every claim that may arise while this commission exists.

I thought that the Senate made a grave mistake in rejecting yesterday the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]; that in declining to require this commission to report its proceedings and acts to the Congress we had gone a long way toward abandoning our constitutional prerogative and toward neglecting our plain duty; but to me it is monstrous to give this commission or any other commission unlimited authority to settle every claim without defining or restricting in any way the method by which it shall proceed or the circumstances that shall govern its actions and conclusions.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The United States Government has a claim of several millions of dollars against the British Government for transporting troops and supplies during the war. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas that that claim could be handled by this commission and adjusted and settled?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly. The language of the bill embraces every claim that this Government has or may have against any other Government during the life of the commission.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am sure we were all delighted when the nomination of our colleague came to the Senate for appointment to this very high judicial position. I am quite sure that no person in that district could be found possessed of more splendid qualities to make a rare and exceptional judge than Senator KENYON. In this body he has been one of the very best Senators who have represented any State in the last decade. Progressive at all times, he has not only stood for that character of legislation, but he has been an outstanding figure and a leader for purity in elections and against corruption in all forms.

When the vote on his confirmation was taken a few moments ago in open executive session of the Senate a rare compliment was paid him; and as I saw every Senator on the other side of the aisle rise in his place and vote to confirm Senator KENYON as a judge of the circuit court of appeals I could not keep my thoughts from going back a few weeks, recalling that the same Senators who now vote to take him out of this body had by their votes only a few weeks ago retained in the Senate one who had won his seat through corrupt and inexcusable methods. Your vote to-day does you credit; your vote the other day discredits you. Certainly this nomination did not come to Senator KENYON because he had stood as the President had stood and as the great rank and file of you Senators had stood, retaining Senator NEWBERRY as a Member of this body. No Senator in all that discussion fought the right of Senator NEWBERRY to retain his seat here harder than did the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. He inveighed with force, logic, and eloquence against your procedure and predicted disaster in the coming election to those of you who defiled this body by voting to indorse such corruption and methods as had been employed in Michigan.

Some reason other than his exceptional qualities and his position in the Newberry case moves his selection.

Some weeks ago the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] made a speech in this Chamber. He criticized, maligned, and abused the so-called "agricultural bloc," and in the course of that speech referred to the agricultural group as the "Ken-Cap-Klan" of the United States Senate; so I suppose by this nomination the President and those in this body who are so anxious to break up the agricultural bloc desired to take the "Ken" out of the "Ken-Cap-Klan." Well you have done it.

Although the country will accept that and interpret that as the true motive that prompted this nomination, I am charitable enough to believe that the President considered also his judicial poise and the splendid legal qualities possessed by him. His long experience as a lawyer, his training here and elsewhere eminently qualifies him to make a most splendid judge; but away out in the Middle West, and through the agricultural sections of the country, many of the farmers whose eyes are now riveted on the Congress of the United States and whose attention was attracted to the agricultural conference here last week will wonder if it was not due to a desire upon the part of the President and his advisers to rid the Senate of the United States of the leader of the agricultural group. Those progressive and patriotic "sons of toil" are not easily fooled. They can see the trail left behind, if not the serpent as it passes. It will need some explanation to remove that impression from their minds.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator assumes that to be true, what would he say of the leader who would consent to that kind of a proposition?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am quite sure that Senator KENYON, as well as myself and others, is a man not of the means that many men possess to-day in public life.

Senator KENYON has given some of his best years to the public service, at a time, too, when he could perhaps have made in other lines of activity from three to ten times as much as he has received as a United States Senator or as an Assistant Attorney General. He perhaps realizes that he must get into some other employment that will pay more money and do away with the expenditures necessary to be elected to public office, so I shall not criticize anyone for accepting the place that has come to him; but the country will believe that it is in part, at least, because of the desire of the leadership of the present administration to break up the agricultural bloc in the United States Senate that this nomination has come to us to-day.

I appeal to the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] who sits before me, a part of the "Ken-Cap-Klan," to continue to associate with us in the work that we have set out to do. Let us not be tempted, flattered, nor deterred in the work that lies ahead of us. Let us not forget the needs of agriculture at this time, and pledge with renewed faith our determination to carry on the battle. I hope, too, that in the mind of the President the idea will not be conceived nor will you on the other side intimate or suggest to the President some alluring position or tempting offer to the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

I trust also that the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], who has been a member of the agricultural group and who has helped us on this side of the aisle to pass beneficent legislation for the farmers of the country, will not be tendered an office so that he will leave us.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. And I can say the same thing about the distinguished Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Mississippi think that the Senator from North Dakota would be justified in leaving if he, like the judge, got $500 additional salary?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the Senator from North Dakota would take it; but I do think that if the President thought he could thereby break up this agricultural bloc he would find some place for him in the Government service.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that there are other positions in life and other services which one could imagine would be very much more congenial to the distinguished Senator from Iowa, who is now retiring from this body, than the continual fight which he has had to wage here.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not blame the Senator under the circumstances for wanting to leave the Senate. Here he has fought for purity of elections and to oust from this body one who had been indicted by a grand jury in Michigan and tried and convicted by a jury there with Republicans on the jury, and he appealed to his colleagues to stand with him for purity of elections, and when he made a great speech they left the Senate Chamber. His way is not their way. Republicanism under the present leadership in this body and elsewhere must be very obnoxious, distasteful, and unpleasant to him. I do not blame him for taking this tempting offer, under the circumstances, but I do hope that the other members of the agricultural bloc will stand with us and help us to pass the legislation recommended by the agricultural conference held in this city last week, which is an indorsement of the work of the Joint Congressional Commission on Agricultural Inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I had noticed the language in the bill which the Senator from Montana has moved to strike out. The first part of the bill states that the commission created by section 1 is hereby authorized, and then the language proposed to be stricken out reads:

> And to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

While I have had no occasion to read the report of the committee in full, I glanced over it yesterday, and I saw no reference to this matter in the report. I ask the Senator from North Dakota if any explanation was given to the committee by the official of the Government who appeared in behalf of this legislation as to why this provision was thought wise, and as to what specific claims it would cover.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the only reference to this matter in any of the testimony before the committee was in regard to the obligations which were taken by the War Finance Corporation and others, which obligations were created to some extent after the war, and therefore were not war obligations. We would want the language to be sufficiently broad so that we would not have to differentiate between the obligations which grew out of the war and those which were given as a matter of charity immediately after the war. That is one feature of it.

The other feature is this: I know of only one Government claim, and that was presented by the Treasury Department after the report was put in, a claim of the United States for payment of money due for the maintenance of our troops in Germany, which has not yet been settled. The Government has no right, of course, to take anything but cash in settlement of that claim, because Germany has agreed to pay cash. They could not settle it by the giving of bonds. The bill would authorize the commission, that being a Government claim, to accept the bond of Germany, due at some future time, and at such a rate of interest as they should agree upon, to cover the expenses of the American Army of occupation.

That is the only unsettled claim I know of. Of course, it is easy to settle that claim, because the terms were fixed by the treaty of Versailles, and Germany has agreed to pay whatever the cost may be. Consequently, there is only the question of determining what the cost is, and then put the matter into a bond or obligation of the German Government, due at such time as the German Government can pay it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator mentions only one specific claim. I think this language is altogether too broad. It authorizes not only the settlement of claims arising out of the war, but the settlement of any kind of a claim which this Government has against any other Government in the world, whether it was engaged in the war or not, not only past claims, but claims which may arise in the future. I can not see the necessity of authorizing this commission, the primary object of which is simply to transfer the existing evidences of the foreign nations' debts to us into a long-time, permanent and regular kind of a security—purely a Treasury operation—to sit as judge, to adjust and settle every claim this Government may have against any foreign Government, in Europe or in South America, or Asia or Africa, no matter how arising, or whether yet arisen. I see no reason for granting such a power.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator allow me to suggest a thought to him, to be taken out of my own time?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator will recall that at the time we had up for consideration the treaty of peace with Germany the question arose as to what was included in the term "claims of the United States Government." That was in connection with the proposal to retain any title we might have in the property seized by the Alien Property Custodian. It was at that time contended by certain members of our committee that the term "claims of the United States" included also claims of the nationals. As the treaty was then framed I did not think it did and suggested an amendment, which was adopted; but if the contention of the Senators who took the other view is correct, then, as this bill is framed, "claims of the United States" might include all claims which we might have against the German Government growing out of the sinking of the Lusitania or of the Sussex or any other of those maritime disasters.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand the view presented by the Senator. Of course, I assume it is the intention to have a mixed arbitral commission appointed for the settlement of claims of our nationals against Germany, but, as I said, this provision authorizes the creation of the commission to adjust and settle, and accept securities in payment of, all claims this Government now has or may have against any government in the world, whether arising out of the late war or not. The primary object of the bill, as I said before, is to transform obligations, which are entirely different from claims, in my opinion, obligations which are now represented by a more or less informal sort of security, into obligations which are more formal. Where there is a written obligation, like an I O U, the claim has been made and settled and there is a written agreement about it; but this anticipates, I should judge from its language, a mere claim which is evidenced by no writing as yet and which is not laid before us for identification.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I have any time left.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I gather that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] takes the position that claims for injuries done the property of citizens of the United States are not in the nature of claims by this Government against a foreign Government. I always took the other view of it. I would like to ascertain what the view of the Senator from Connecticut is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not think my guess about that would be at all reliable. I can see the view taken by the Senator from Ohio, that in a treaty like the one recently before us the term "claims of the United States" might include claims of citizens of the United States; but I have not looked the subject up.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I had gathered the impression from the discussion the other day, and particularly from the remarks made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the chairman of the committee, that this was intended to cover those items which have grown out of transactions taking place since the war, not evidenced by any bonds or obligations, and included such items as might have arisen by reason of the activities of the Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration.

I supposed that those items were to be taken care of in this provision. But when we examine it a little more carefully we find—and I infer from the later remarks of the Senator from North Dakota that he takes this view—that those are not included at all. In the early part of this section, beginning on page 2, we refer to obligations of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America, and the language is, "including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration."

But in the provision which we are now considering that language is omitted, so that it would seem to exclude all those claims. The only justification for this, it seems to me, would be the desire to take care of those claims by this sort of a provision. But they are not included in this. We are limited in this clause to claims not now represented by bonds or obligations which the United States of America now has, or hereafter may have, against any foreign Government. The clause is limited to claims now in existence or which may hereafter arise in favor of this Government against any foreign Government. It does not take care of those items which are not now covered by bonds or obligations and which arose after the war, such items as are mentioned earlier in the paragraph. They are expressly left out. They are evidently purposely left out. Certainly they are not included. It seems to me if the clause should go in at all, it should carry the inclusion of obligations growing out of the activities of the Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, and the American Relief Administration.

It seems to me, too, that it ought to be modified, at least if we do not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, so as to include any such claims, even of that kind, that might arise hereafter. These matters are pretty well understood now. I think there is really no difference between this Government and the other Governments as to the amounts of the outstanding obligations or claims, if we can classify them as claims.

I can see that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is correct in drawing a distinction between obligations and claims, but in this particular provision I think the word "claims" was intended to cover any kind of an obligation not evidenced by a bond or written security of some sort. Even those items growing out of transactions of the Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, and the American Relief Administration are no longer, as I am informed, open to any question between our people and the foreign Governments. The amount of those items is practically understood or agreed upon. Why, in taking care of them here, limit the bill to those items which have been agreed upon and settled so far as the amounts are concerned? The only question that is open is whether we can have security for them or not, and if so what form that security should take, and what time should be given and what the interest, if any, shall be charged.

These are matters of arrangement and negotiation which I think might well be left in charge of the Secretary of the Treasury or some commission, if we create this commission. I am opposed to the commission. I think the whole thing ought to be left to the Secretary of the Treasury. But let us stop there with the transactions as they are closed to date, and not leave the door wide open for anything that may take place hereafter to be under the jurisdiction of this commission. It seems to me that the only justification for this clause would be to reach a satisfactory adjustment and settlement of the transactions which have taken place, not only by the Government itself but by these agencies of the Government, such as the American Relief Administration, the Grain Corporation, and the War and Navy Departments. Those matters might well be taken care of under some such clause as this, but those matters ought to be limited to the status which they now hold, and not be considered as still possible of growth and expansion to create no obligations hereafter which the commission would have the power to adjust. Let us take the situation as it is and adjust it under the bill, because, as I said, there is no difference, there is no matter of negotiation to go through with. The items are well understood and the amounts involved are agreed upon between our people and the other peoples concerned.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think the language is altogether too broad, and I shall vote for the amendment, not because I do not think there ought to be something here, but it ought to go to conference, so that in conference the matter may be fully considered and its scope restricted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry? The Chair may take it out of my time.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. We have in mind exactly the items that are to be considered or are embraced within these loans which are proposed to be stricken out. So why not designate them and authorize the funding of those obligations comprised in those items?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know of anything that is now pending, which the Senator would now propose to designate, that is not already represented by at least an I O U; and if represented by an I O U, authority is given without this clause to accept the obligation.

Mr. KING. Then the clause ought to be stricken out.

Mr. LENROOT. It would seem so to me. The only things that I know of that are unsettled and for which the Government of the United States has no kind of obligation are claims against Germany for the payment of our soldiers on the Rhine; and if there be any general claims of our Government against Germany growing out of the treaty, and I do not know whether there are any or not, those would be included in this authority. I do not think it occurred to anybody—certainly not to one who was not a member of the committee—that the scope of the bill was intended to cover any such claims.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, were not the obligations of Germany with reference to our troops on the Rhine covered by the Knox resolution and the treaty which followed it, and taken care of in the Versailles treaty, which is to that extent recognized by our Government so far as this expense in concerned, and was it not provided there, too, that this expense should be first paid by Germany in advance of reparation?

Mr. LENROOT. I was just coming to that. I do not believe that I would care to vote authority to this commission to subordinate to the reparation claims of France and Great Britain the claims of the United States for the payment of our soldiers. It certainly was understood that those claims should be paid, and paid in cash, and any authority to accept long-time obligations for those claims would not be showing a favor to Germany, but would enable France and Great Britain to have a superior claim upon Germany ahead of the United States.

I do not know at present why the United States should forego its cash payment in that regard, and in any event I do not think that that character of claim is one within the general purview of the bill. I do not believe the scope and the power of the commission should be extended to any such extent. I am frank to say that if I had supposed this language was susceptible of that construction—and I now think it is—I perhaps would have had something to say about this at a previous time.

Before I take my seat, Mr. President, I wish to say just a word about the political speech of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I hope when the terms of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] expire and they come before the people of their respective States for reelection the Senator from Mississippi, whose eloquent voice will be heard throughout the land, will be apprising the people then of the value of the services of those Senators, and that the people of their respective States will return them to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I quite agree with the contention of the Senator from Montana and other Senators as to the construction of this clause, and I shall be very glad to vote for the amendment, as the amendment is in perfect harmony with the entire bill. I can not imagine any greater power than the power which is granted preceding this clause, but it is worth while to consider it. It says—

> To adjust and settle any and all claims not now represented by bonds or obligations which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

I sincerely hope that this will be stricken out and that it will not come back with the conference report, as I assume, in all probability, it will. Of course, we can only deal with it while it is here, and therefore I shall be very glad to vote for the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 2, beginning in line 16 of the bill as printed when reported from the committee, after the words "United States of America," to strike out the comma and the words "and to adjust and settle any and all claims not now represented by bonds or obligations which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to take just a moment of the time of the Senate to call attention to some remarkable figures in the committee's report which I think ought to receive the attention of Senators. In speaking of the national debt, population, and per capita indebtedness of the United Kingdom, France, the United States, and Italy, it is based upon the prewar value of the respective currencies. Under that statement France appears to have a debt of $51,000,000,000. In point of fact the franc is worth now only 8 and a fraction cents, and estimated at its real value the indebtedness of France is only $22,000,000,000. Italy, where the lire is worth only 4 and a fraction cents, instead of having an indebtedness of $18,000,000,000, has an indebtedness of only $4,000,000,000. France, instead of having $1,229 per capita indebtedness, would have an indebtedness of only $537 and Italy an indebtedness of only $127.

I call attention to that because, while these figures are correct on the basis of the prewar value of their currencies, they are misleading as a matter of fact and would indicate that we ought to deal more generously in regard to this matter, because these countries are much more seriously indebted than we are.

I wish to make one further observation, Mr. President. These nations have practically the same material resources which they had before the war, except a very small fraction of France where are the devastated areas. They have practically as great productive power as they had before the war.

I wish to put in the RECORD a table indicating the rate of normal taxes and surtaxes imposed in the year 1921 on individuals in the United States, Great Britain, Canada, and France. It shows that France has no normal tax on incomes of any amount. Even where a man has a million dollars per annum income there is no normal income tax upon it, while all the other nations have such an income tax. I ask to have the table inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. OWEN. I wish to make the further observation that these debts are held by the nationals of France, of Great Britain, and of Italy, and that while they appear as a government liability they are in fact a national asset.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. STERLING's name was called). The present occupant of the chair announces his pair and its transfer as on the former vote, and votes "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and am not able to secure a transfer. Therefore I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COLT. Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR. Making the same announcement as on the previous vote relative to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. McLEAN (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], and will let my vote stand.

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move the adoption of the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk, and ask that the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, at the end of line 11, after the word "finances," it is proposed to insert:

> But said commission shall immediately transmit to the Congress copies of any refunding agreements entered into with the approval of the President by each foreign Government upon the completion of the authority granted under this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the pending bill proposes to delegate to a commission the authority to negotiate and make agreements for the refunding of the exceedingly great debts owed our Government by foreign Governments. It not only gives authority to negotiate in reference to those debts, but it gives absolute and final authority to complete negotiations and bind our Government without any congressional action. Conferring such authority, without the check of review or approval by the legislative branch of our Government, is an evasion of our responsibility to conserve this great asset, the most valuable asset that the American people possess, one which is equal to an asset of $100 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. By the passage of this bill we are to announce to our people that the Congress of the United States rids itself of all further responsibility in the matter of refunding this debt. The Congress, charged with the responsibility of levying taxes and conserving the funds and assets of our people in the Public Treasury, is about to place in the hands of an appointive commission final authority and great discretion in the handling and safeguarding of this asset.

My amendment seeks at least to give to the people through Congress the result of the deliberations of the proposed commission. Why should we be compelled to ask that we be informed in the future of the binding agreements made by this commission. It ought not to be necessary to propose such an amendment here; there ought to be no question whatever about the right of Congress to secure information as to how this commission binds our Government, but it is necessary to propose the amendment because the Secretary of the Treasury announced to the Finance Committee that he would prefer not to have such a provision in the bill. As the reason for his position he stated that when negotiations were completed with one country they would be communicated to other countries if he was called upon to inform Congress of them at the completion of each refunding transaction with each of the debtor nations, and this might result to the disadvantage of the United States. This amendment will settle this question: Does the Congress of the United States want to say to the American people, "We will rid ourselves of all responsibility; this fund is beyond our control; its disposition will be vested absolutely in a commission; but we will also go so far as to say to the country, 'We do not care what this commission does and we do not want any detailed information as to what settlements, agreements, or securities have been accepted'"?

To be sure, the bill provides for annual reports being made by the commission in the Treasury Department reports, but the information as to refunding transactions heretofore contained in the reports of the Treasury Department has been meager; indeed, out of all proportion to the importance of this subject. The Committee on Finance spent weeks in trying to find out just the status of these debts. There are at least five volumes on the desk of every Senator containing the testimony and the information which was obtained about these debts after days and days of hearings before the Senate Finance Committee.

I can not see any valid objection, at least, to having this one safeguard thrown around this proposed legislation, namely, a provision that when the commission completes its negotiations with a given country a copy of the agreement or contract made shall be sent to the Congress of the United States for its inspection and for the information of our people. How can such information be refused our people? Can not at least the Congress insist that it be informed, even if it does not want to approve or disapprove the acts of this commission? Let us have at least the little advantage that may come from the fact that these negotiators of our people's rights in these funds will realize that full details and all agreements are, when completed, at once to be made public. If there are any sinister influences at work, this provision may make them pause. Though we tell them they can do as they please, let us at least demand all information about their commitments and adjustments.

Mr. McCUMBER arose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was about to give reasons why I think we could well accept that amendment, but I will wait until the Senator has finished and then I will give my reasons.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not so anxious to hear my own voice as to continue my argument. If the Senator accepts the amendment, I will cheerfully yield the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, under the bill, as it now reads, it is provided that the annual report of this commission shall be included in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances. Under the bill as it is drawn, whenever the commission accepts the obligations, which will be in the form of bonds, and settles with any country, of course, any influence that it might have upon those bonds ceases, and its power over the bonds ceases. They become, then, the property of the United States, and would naturally be reported in the annual report, and that is all that has been asked in the bill. The Senator desires, however, that as soon as the commission has made its agreement with any country—and, of course, the agreement must be embodied in the bonds of that country—it shall immediately report that agreement to Congress. I can see no reason on earth why that can not be put into the bill if the Senator wants it there. Certainly as soon as they made the agreement the whole country would know it, and it would be published; but I agree with the suggestions made by the Senator, and, as far as I am personally concerned, I will accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

A day or two ago I suggested an amendment of this kind:

Provided, That said commission shall not have the power to extend the payment of interest after the bonds bearing interest have once been taken.

As I recall, the Senator agreed to that amendment in principle, but desired to change it or offer one that seemed to him to suit the situation better. If the Senator has that amendment, can it be brought up at this time?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objecion to bringing it up right now, if the Senator desires.

Mr. President, I offer the following amendment. After the end of section 2, insert the following:

Provided further, That when the bond or other obligation of any such Government has been refunded or converted as herein provided, the authority of the commission over such refunded or converted bond or other obligation shall cease.

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that is the only construction that could be put on the bill as it now stands. The Treasury Department so understands it, but to make it doubly certain I have no objection to that amendment going in. In other words, when they get the bond of a foreign Government and agree what it is and it is delivered and accepted by this Government, then it is the property of the United States, to be dealt with thereafter by Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment? I am in entire sympathy with the amendment, but I am wondering if it is properly expressed. These bonds, when they are finally accepted, will be new bonds.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I understand this amendment, the idea is not to permit the commission to postpone the payment of interest beyond the time of acceptance of the bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator speak a little louder so that we may hear him on this side?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am assuming that before any bond is taken, of course, the bond itself will provide when the interest is to begin to be paid—that must be the case—and then, when it is accepted, it will become an obligation that is due to the United States and owned by the United States, and the commission ought not to have any authority to deal with it any further than that. Therefore, I think that covers the point made by the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The question I wanted to ask, and which I did not reach, is, in what event is one of these bonds to be refunded?

Mr. McCUMBER. This relates entirely to the refunding of bonds for past obligations—obligations that are now due us. That is what the bill deals with; and when those obligations have once been funded into long-time obligations the commission has completed its work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a matter of fact, this bill provides for the funding of obligations, not for the refunding of bonds.

Mr. McCUMBER. The word "refund" is used with reference to obligations. We have some demand obligations. To a certain extent, they are funded.

Mr. WADSWORTH. To-day?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but the word "refunding" is used here as well as "funding." It relates only, however, to bonds that will be taken for the obligations due the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The term "refunded," may I suggest, implies a second funding of a bond or an obligation which has been once funded.

Mr. McCUMBER. We have the expression "refund or convert" in the bill throughout, and consequently I have used exactly the same terms.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, while the Senator is on his feet I should like to ask him a question.

Let us assume, now, that the Secretary, under this power which it seems to be determined shall be granted to him, shall conclude to postpone the payment of the interest on this indebtedness to any one country, let us say Poland: What provision is there for protection of the United States as to the interest which may accrue, although it is not to be paid for some time in the future? Is there any provision in this bill that authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to take obligations for that accrued interest as it accrues, so that we will have something to show for it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Is the Senator asking me the question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, under the bill the commission will have no authority to accept anything less than the amount of principal and interest that is due this country. They will not have any authority to remit or to excuse any part of the accrued or the accruing interest. If it should be necessary, say, in the case of Poland, that interest should not become payable, say, for three or four years, I should assume very naturally that the commission would do the only thing they could do under the bill, namely, provide that the principal should be a sufficient sum greater to take care of the accruing interest up to that time, or that it should be taken care of in some other way, so that no interest will be lost. That might be provided in the terms of the bond. A bond might be made for 10 per cent or 20 per cent more if it were to run for four years before interest began to be paid. That amount might be added to it, and then a provision might be made that the interest should be 5 per cent or whatever interest should be agreed upon.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am speaking, of course, in the time of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has the floor.

Mr. BURSUM. Would it be within the power of this commission to convert the interest into bonds?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, yes; if they were disposed to give them that length of time, they could take what would be the interest at that time and put it into a bond.

Mr. BURSUM. Exactly so; but would not that settle the question?

Mr. McCUMBER. That would settle it; yes.

Mr. BURSUM. If the interest were converted into new bonds?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly it would settle it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, then I understand the Senator from North Dakota as conceding that there would be two possible ways of adjusting the interest in case the commission should extend the time of payment of interest for 10 years. One of those ways would be the consolidation of the 10 years' interest into the principal sum. The other way would be to adjust the interest rate so that it would cover the extended and accumulated interest during the period of extension.

That is just exactly the point I have been insisting upon; and I want again to emphasize the fact that the Secretary clearly indicated his preference for including this interest in the rate of interest to be charged upon these bonds. If that is done, then the 10 years' interest that is extended, and that would be properly due the United States, would not be consolidated in the principal, but would be covered in the rate of interest charged. That rate might be a 6 per cent rate or a 7 per cent rate, or possibly an 8 per cent rate, but likely not higher than a 7 per cent rate. I make the point again that if that is done, and we should put those bonds upon the market, which undoubtedly would be the case, as I have so frequently referred to here, the bonds would be sold only at par, and the inevitable result would be that the Government would lose the interest and the purchaser of the bonds would gain it.

I merely refer to that. I do not want to make any argument about it, but I refer to that as an illustration of what may happen if this particular method is adopted by the Secretary; and he clearly indicated that that was his preference of the two methods in the case of any of the small nations who may insist upon and may be given 10 years' extension for the payment of interest.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I suggest to the Senator that if the Secretary or the commission should make any such arrangement as that, whereby they would absorb the interest in a higher rate of interest for the given length of time, if they left that open for the debtor country to take up those bonds at any time and thereby avoid the payment of the interest which has been included in the higher rate, such an act would be clearly violative not only of the spirit but of the terms of the bill. Therefore, if they would do anything of that character, they must insert a provision to the effect that if it is paid before due a greater rate of interest must be paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. I agree with the Senator that if they should do that, and at the same time make it possible by the contract for the debtor to pay off the principal before the time of payment, they would do an indefensible thing; but why give authority to a commission to do a thing which if done would be indefensible? That is begging the question. Assuming that they did not do that the bond would become the property of the United States. Eo instanti that the agreement is made the United States would have authority to sell that bond, and if it sold it before the time of interest extension expired, and sold it at par, the people would necessarily lose the amount of interest covered in the rate of interest, and that would accrue to the benefit of the purchaser of the bond.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is there an amendment pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The technical status of the bill is that it is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. The Senator from North Dakota has offered an amendment. In order that it may be considered, it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to which he proposes an amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it can be offered as an amendment of the second proviso, can it not, without reconsidering some other amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. That there may be no trouble about it, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered so as to permit the offering of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which that amendment was agreed to is reconsidered. The Secretary will state the amendment now offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The READING CLERK. At the end of the amendment already agreed to, at the bottom of page 2, insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That when the bond or other obligation of any such Government has been refunded or converted as herein provided, the authority of the commission over such refunded or converted bond or other obligation shall cease.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to strike out, in line 14, page 2, the words "or hereafter."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 12, in the original print, strike out the words "or hereafter."

Mr. REED. I ask the chairman of the committee if he can not accept that amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; Mr. President, I think not.

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	McKellar	Sheppard
Ball	Frelinghuysen	McKinley	Shields
Borah	Gooding	McNary	Simmons
Brandegee	Hale	Moses	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want for a moment to enlist the attention of the Senate to this amendment. The Senate has already stricken out the words giving the commission authority "to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor."

In consonance with that I am offering an amendment to strike out the words "or hereafter" in the clause authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to convert any obligation of any foreign Government received by the United States "arising out of the World War into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Government," and to take "in substitution for the bonds or obligations of such Government now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions," and so forth.

I ask the Senate to strike out the words "or hereafter." We are dealing with a concrete question, the present indebtedness of foreign Governments to the United States. All of that debt is represented by some form of security, and the authority to be granted is to settle that indebtedness now represented by some one of the various kinds of securities held by this Government.

If we permit the words "or hereafter" to remain, then this commission, at any time during its life, can proceed to settle any claims hereafter arising. Is it the purpose of the Senate to grant that kind of authority, to give to this commission the authority at any time during its life to settle and adjust any claim of the United States? Surely that is not the purpose of the Senate, and I am surprised that the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill does not accept the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the word "hereafter" appears in the same sense in the sixth line of page 2 of the bill, and possibly that should be provided for.

Mr. REED. It appears in the copy of the bill which I have in line 14, but it is line 12 as referred to in the amendment; and it also occurs in line 6; but I shall attack only one proposition at a time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that it is necessary, to accomplish the purpose of the Senator, to interfere with line 6, but I merely called it to his attention.

Mr. REED. It does seem to me that the Senate surely can not intend to give an authority to this commission to settle claims which may hereafter arise. When the claims hereafter arise let us deal with them as they arise and not grant away our authority over them to-day, when we do not know what they may be.

If it be answered that there will be no such claims, then I reply that striking out this word will do no harm. If it be answered that there may be such claims, and we do not know what they may be, then I reply that we ought to deal with them when they arise.

On this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, if his time has not expired, or. if it has, in my own time——

Mr. REED. My time has not expired.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator misapprehend the meaning of the words "or hereafter"? I may be wrong in my hasty interpretation of the word "hereafter," but it seems to me that it contemplates that during the life of the commission they may convert the obligations of the Government into other obligations of the Government, but it does not contemplate, as I read it, that they may settle other claims than those arising out of the war and for which obligations now exist.

Mr. REED. That would only make it worse. It is proposed to allow these gentlemen to take a set of bonds and then retransmute those bonds during the life of the commission and do with them as they please for three years, which is equally as bad.

Mr. KING. I am not defending that, but I was wondering whether the construction for which the Senator was contending was quite accurate.

Mr. REED. It would cover both cases, in my opinion.

Mr. KING. I am not quite clear as to the meaning of the word as found in the bill.

Mr. REED. It ought not to be here.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the object of the measure, of course, is to give the commission authority to fund the indebtedness owing by our associated Governments or those which are now indebted to us on claims growing out of the war. My understanding of the word "hereafter" is that at the present time all the obligations owing to the Government, because of sales of material by the War Department, the Navy Department, the United States Grain Corporation, and the American Relief Administration, are not now in any bond; that is to say, they have not been reduced to bonds and the character of obligation has not yet been made manifest; the matter has not yet been reduced to writing.

I do not know whether that is so or not. We have telephoned up to the Treasury Department to find out why they have insisted on the words "or hereafter" being retained. The chairman of the committee, who has gone to lunch, told me that he was not sure that all these obligations had been reduced to writing, and that this refers to such obligations growing out of those indebtednesses as had not been actually reduced to writing.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Let us assume that they have not been reduced to writing. The first transaction that we would have would be to take the obligation of that Government, and when we take that obligation we should take it in the form of a bond. There would be no sense in taking an obligation and then having that obligation hereafter transmuted into bonds. The whole transaction should be had at once.

I can tell the Senator why the word "hereafter" is in here, if he will permit me in his time. I have exhausted my privilege on the subject.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Missouri for that purpose.

Mr. REED. It is merely because the bill as originally framed was brought to us giving the Secretary of the Treasury power for all time to handle all this great indebtedness, and we have been changing the bill from time to time, and have now in many important respects changed its purport, but we still find some of the old phraseology here. This is a part of the old phraseology that ought to go out.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I thought it was a very great mistake when the Senate struck out the language embraced in the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], but inasmuch as the Senate saw fit to strike out that language I confess that at this time I do not see the significance of the word "hereafter."

The report comes just now from Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Wadsworth that every day they are receiving notes and obligations from foreign Governments for war material sold by the War Department and the Navy Department, and that they simply want the word "hereafter" in the bill in order to enable them to clean up all those obligations. He says it will not amount to, perhaps, more than a million dollars, and that the object in having the word "hereafter" in the bill was to enable them to handle the situation until the obligation should be reduced to some form of writing.

Mr. REED. But the language is broad enough so that they could take a bond and then afterwards refund that bond. The trouble is the language is not limited to the case of which the Senator speaks. It is entirely too broad.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not see the force of the Senator's objection. Inasmuch as we know the objects of the bill and the purposes that are intended to be accomplished by it and precisely what the department intends to do, I can not see why the word "hereafter" is at all fatal.

Mr. REED. I do not say that it is fatal, but I say it is a grant of power which might readily be abused by somebody.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, any power can be abused by somebody if we are not to have any respect for anybody's authority.

Mr. REED. That argument, of course, would lead us to just a plain grant of authority and say to the Secretary of the Treasury, "Go out and do whatever you please."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is exactly what I wanted to see done, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. REED. I believe the Senator did.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Absolutely. I never had any doubt in the world that the whole thing could have been adjusted and settled in a short time if we had gone at it in a businesslike way instead of fooling with it for six months in the Senate.

Mr. REED. If the Secretary had gone out and developed a plan of settlement of these bonds and say to us, "Here is the settlement I can get through," we would have had a chance to pass on it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield, though I do not wish to lose all my time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator from Missouri, though I am not sure about it, that the word "hereafter" in the fourteenth line, which the Senator has moved to strike out, is put in there to make the provision of the bill uniform with the same word or practically the same word used in line 6.

Mr. REED. That is true, and I intend to move to strike out the word in line 6. I did not think it proper to include the two in the one motion to amend.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I am told that the sales are not yet entirely completed; that only last week there were some railroad cars, for instance, sold out of certain materials, and that those have not all been disposed of yet and the matter reduced to writing in the form of definite obligations. Why should not that authority be granted? How can they abuse that authority in the future?

Mr. REED. Who is selling those materials?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The War Department. No one is going to abuse that authority.

Mr. REED. I think it is an abuse of authority to sell the materials of the Government, and sell them on time, at this juncture at all. It is a gross and an indecent abuse of authority.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not think so. I do not agree with the Senator at all. I think the Secretary of War has absolute authority to sell these materials under previous acts of Congress.

Mr. REED. He has authority to sell them, but I do not think the Secretary of War has authority to sell them on time and to extend credit. When are we going to quit extending credit to bankrupt governments? We do not sell these things to our own people on time. However, I am trespassing on the time of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am entirely willing that the Senator shall do so, but I am not going to discuss at this time the particular question he has raised. The thing has been done and I think the Secretary of War has authority to do it. He thinks he has the authority to do it.

We desire to get the indebtedness in the form of writing, in the shape of a definite obligation. Is there any objection to that? The Senator proposes to strike out the word "hereafter" to cut off that possibility. Why should that be done? This is all a fixed and definite thing. No one is going to abuse this authority, as everybody understands.

Mr. REED. But the Senator just said it is not fixed and definite. When he said we are selling these goods at the present time and not receiving the money for them, he says, in effect, that the thing is not fixed and definite, because that is something which is going on every day.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But these materials are in Europe already.

Mr. REED. I do not care where they are.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. They are not going to be brought back to this country by anybody.

Mr. REED. There is a great difference between owning a thing even in Europe and selling it to a bankrupt government on time, a Government which the Senator tells us can not pay even its interest.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We had better get something out of it than nothing.

Mr. REED. Oh, I do not know about that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. This is a practical way to dispose of these materials, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. REED. I think we had better get something out of it than nothing. We had better get something more than the security of a country which is already in default and which we are told will continue to be in default.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not agree with the Senator that those Governments are in default on interest payments. There is a fundamental difference between us on that point. My contention is that we specifically arranged with those Governments that the interest might be postponed for two or three years.

Mr. REED. When did we arrange that?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We have gone into that time and time again.

Mr. REED. By whose authority was it done?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Secretary of the Treasury—first Secretary GLASS, and then Secretary Houston, and as construed by Secretary Mellon. The Senator understands all that well enough.

Mr. REED. Yes; I understand it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator was at the committee hearings and heard all those statements made. Then, too, all of these things were read into the record when my friend from Missouri did not happen to be present.

Mr. REED. Yes; I have read them in the record.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. There was an agreement that the interest should be postponed for two or three years, and after that further negotiations were broken off and no further interest payments were made, but now, when these are reduced to fixed obligations, and especially if we get them in the form of bonds, there will be no question in the world that the nations which are able to pay will pay, and those which are not able to pay will not pay until such time as they can.

Mr. REED. And in the meantime we are selling them more material.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Indiana has expired.

Mr. REED. I am afraid I took most of the Senator's time.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; though I did not get to say very much.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, as I look at the pending amendment to strike out the word "hereafter," in line 6, and the same word in line 14, it would be absolutely destructive of the purpose of the bill. The bill provides, in the first place, that the Government shall refund or convert not only the obligations which we now have, but as well such obligations as hereafter we may receive. In other words, Czechoslovakia and Poland owe us some money for grain or supplies which were given to them a long while ago. We have yet received no obligation from them. It is like a book account. There is no obligation signed by the Governments which owe us the money.

When these obligations come in, if they should in the next week or 10 days, of course the commission ought to be in a position to convert or refund those obligations with bonds, and yet if the Senate would strike out in line 16 the word "hereafter," there would be no power for the commission to deal with such obligations, because they came into the hands of the United States after the passage of the act.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SPENCER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator sure he is accurate in his statement that we have nothing from Czechoslovakia?

Mr. SPENCER. My information is obtained from the report of the committee that the amounts of money, running somewhere into the millions, due from those countries for supplies purchased from the United States Grain Corporation, some from the War Department, some even from the Navy Department, and others from the American Relief Administration, have not yet been paid for in the shape of negotiable or definite obligations. If they have, if we have every obligation that is coming to us, then there is no harm in the word "hereafter." If we have not, then the Senator will agree with me that it is absolutely essential.

Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, the report made by the Committee on Finance shows that we hold these obligations, and gives the dates and amounts.

Mr. SPENCER. As I recollect, it does not give all of them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can cite them to the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. I shall be glad to have them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under the act of July 9, 1918, we hold the obligation of Czechoslovakia, dated May 29, 1919, for $5,000,000; another one dated June 15, 1919, for $5,000,000; another dated August 10, 1919, for $4,900,000; another one dated October 14, 1919, for $2,464,000; another one dated February 10, 1920, for $1,290,000; and another one dated May 1, 1920, for $1,962,000. Those are obligations of the Army and Navy.

We also hold obligations from Czechoslovakia, dated June 30, 1919, for $6,428,000 on account of the American Relief Administration. So the obligations are already liquidated; that is, the claims are liquidated in the form of obligations in the Treasury.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will turn to page 8 of the report from which he is reading, he will find amounts from sales of surplus war materials, from the American Relief Administration, and from the sales of flour by the United States Grain Corporation to some 10 or more countries. There is no date given as to any of that indebtedness. It may be that there is some form of indefinite I O U for those amounts, but my information is that there is no definite obligation.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator remember the report of Mr. Hoover, that even the money that he had taken over there and distributed had been secured by certain obligations of the foreign Governments involved by collateral and different forms of securities? The Senator has made a very broad assertion that these claims are not liquidated. If they have not been liquidated, somebody ought to be sent to jail.

Mr. SPENCER. The junior Senator from Missouri did not say they had not been liquidated. The junior Senator from Missouri said that his information was that the obligations from these countries were not in any definite shape in all cases. It may be that there are definite obligations. In such cases there is no harm in the use of the words referred to. The senior Senator from Missouri has had too great experience in the drawing of contracts not to know the advisability of providing somewhere that the negotiating authority shall have power to reconvert every form of obligation, whether we have actually received it as a matter of fact before the date of the passage of the proposed law, or whether we have received it months afterwards; and the words "or hereafter," in line 6, and the words "or hereafter," in line 14, are precisely to give that authority.

Mr. REED. Of course they are.

Mr. SPENCER. If we have a commission of four men, together with the Secretary of the Treasury, to deal with this question, why should the senior Senator from Missouri want so to tie their hands as to limit the necessary negotiating power rather than to give a decent license of power adequately to perform the task which they will have to perform?

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, I have had some experience in drawing contracts; I have also had some experience in drawing powers of attorney; and I am not inclined to give to an attorney in fact unlimited authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the senior Senator from Missouri that he has once spoken upon this matter.

Mr. REED. I know I have, but I was trying to speak in the time of the junior Senator from Missouri. I was trying to answer his question.

Mr. SPENCER. I shall be very glad to have the Senator answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Missouri had taken his seat, and the Chair supposed he had yielded the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. I have not yielded the floor, now that I know the senior Senator from Missouri wants to say a word in reply.

Mr. REED. I want to reply to the question which the junior Senator from Missouri directed personally to me. If these claims are liquidated, then, under the authority granted, with the words "or hereafter" stricken out, they may all be settled. If they have not been liquidated, then under the general authority to settle claims the commission may proceed to settle them; but whether they are obligations or not——

Mr. SPENCER. They can not refund or convert anything except obligations now or hereafter existing.

Mr. REED. They can take bonds.

Mr. SPENCER. They refund, convert, or take other obligations.

Mr. REED. "Or take obligations?"

Mr. SPENCER. That is right.

Mr. REED. The commission is authorized to refund or convert and to extend the time of the payment of interest or principal, or both, of any obligation of any foreign country now owing the United States.

Mr. SPENCER. "Now owing," which seems to necessitate some provision for any other obligations that may hereafter need refunding or conversion.

Mr. REED. So that every debt, whether it is represented by any instrument or not, is an obligation; every dollar that is due us is an obligation; and they have got the right to take a bond for it. The only reason for the words "or hereafter" in this instrument is to cover future transactions. That is why they are here.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. That is why this language has been insisted on; that is why the Secretary of the Treasury insisted on its insertion before the committee. If this authority is left here the Secretary of the Treasury can accept the bonds of Great Britain to-morrow and reconvert them the day after.

Mr. SPENCER. Why should he not? Suppose we took the bonds of Great Britain to-morrow at 4½ per cent running for 30 years, and three months afterwards Great Britain desired to change them to bonds running for 15 years, why should he not reconvert them?

Mr. REED. Or to 30 years.

Mr. SPENCER. He would not reconvert them into bonds running for 30 years, because there is a limit in the law.

Mr. REED. Now, I have the Senator just exactly where I want him. I do not mean that he is at a disadvantage, but we shall understand each other. The Senator wants the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the commission, to have the authority for the three years' time to take bonds and then to reconvert them, and to do with them as they please for three years' time, subject to such limitations as are in the bill.

Mr. SPENCER. There is not any doubt as to that if the interests of the Government would be thereby subserved.

Mr. REED. I do not want that authority conferred on any human being. It is the business of Congress to attend to those matters; and if we give the Secretary of the Treasury the right to make this adjustment once that is sufficient authority; it is going further than we ought to go. Now, the junior Senator from Missouri takes the opposite view. He says the Secretary of the Treasury and the commission should be trusted for three years to do as they please with the $11,000,000,000 of the money of the United States. I have not any doubt he would like to see the 3 years extended to 30 years, provided he knew that his party would stay in power that long, but I do not trust these gentlemen; I am not so trustful as is my friend.

Mr. SPENCER. There will be no difficulty about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the junior Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the report filed by the Finance Committee shows on several pages that the Secretary of the Treasury already holds the obligations of various foreign Governments for surplus war supplies sold by the Army and the Navy——

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator may be right as to that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That he already holds obligations on account of the American Relief Administration under the act of February 25, 1919; that he already holds the obligations of the United States Grain Corporation under the act of March 30, 1919. The obligations which have been received from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy aggregate $574,673,710; the obligations received from the American Relief Administration aggregate $84,093,963; and the obligations held by the American Grain Corporation aggregate $56,858,802; so that there is no warrant for the statement that the words "or hereafter" must be incorporated in this bill for the purpose of caring for the debts which other nations owe us through these three instrumentalities. Obligations are already held, and they are not "hereafter" to be held.

The only reason that I can see for inserting the words "or hereafter" is to give the power to the commission which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] himself now declares it should have; that is to say, after it has made a bargain with one of the debtor nations, extending its time of payment, or extending its interest period, or making some other concession to it, and has made a report to that effect to Congress, nevertheless, if the words "or hereafter" are to be included in the bill the commission, without any additional authority, shall have the right to grant another extension of time to that nation.

Mr. SPENCER. Within three years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Within three years. I say that simply shows how wide it is proposed to make the powers of this commission. It is practically abdicating to that commission not only the power to make a bargain for the extension of the period of payment but it is proposed to give it the power to modify the agreement subsequently in any way it may please under the law for three years.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. Does the Senator from Nebraska see any difficulty or danger in this proposition? If, for example, the commission is created and in pursuance of its duties it takes from Czechoslovakia bonds running 25 years, with no interest for the first two years, but with the interest included in the principal, and six months after it takes such bonds, which lie in the Treasury of the United States, the statement comes from the representatives of Czechoslovakia, "We can do much better than that; we thought we needed 25-year bonds with no interest payment for two years, but we now find we are in a position to give 20-year bonds and commence paying interest within a year." Is there any danger or lack of wisdom if the commission is still in being in giving it authority during the three years to which its powers are limited to say, "We will gladly exchange the securities which we now hold for those which will be more advantageous to the United States of America." Wherein lies the danger of that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that would be a very fine state of affairs, if we were living under an absolute government, and we proposed to vest in the hands of the Executive power over the people's money, but under the Constitution of the United States the Congress of the United States, representing the people of the United States, is the body which should decide such questions. We have gone too far, in my opinion, when we vest in the commission the power even to make the original bargain, let alone the additional power of modifying it after several years have elapsed. I think that it is an abdication of the power of the Congress of the United States, and that it is an outrage under a republican form of government like ours, to vest in the hands of a few men this enormous power to deal with the nations of the world without any appeal, to make that little commission of men the supreme authority to administer thousands of millions of dollars which belong to the people of the United States. I think it is an outrage; I think it is a perversion of the government of a Republic.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Did not the Secretary of the Treasury under the last administration have power conferred on him to sell bonds of our Government and to fix all the conditions of the bonds, including the rate of interest?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. He did have that power; but it is not proposed to confer any such power on the present Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; the Congress was very careful in the matter to which the Senafor from Indiana refers. It conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power to buy certain securities of foreign countries, but Congress provided that the rate of interest on those bonds should be the same rate of interest that was paid on the Liberty bonds of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will ask the Senator to wait a moment. Congress provided that the maturity of those obligations should be the same as that of the bonds of the United States and the rate of interest should be the same.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But the Senator did not get my point. When our own bonds were issued we conferred upon him absolutely the power to fix the terms, including the rate of interest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is another question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no; it is not another question; it is the bestowal of power upon an officer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a bestowal of power that is historic. That is in accordance with the manner in which we always have proceeded when we have had to borrow money and go into the market for it; but we now have a case where we have loaned money to foreign nations, and, instead of dealing with that transaction as we dealt with it heretofore, we propose to intrust to a little commission of men during the next three years the duty and the power of dealing with the debtor nations of the world, not only to grant them extensions, but after they have been granted and the contracts have been made to modify the terms and conditions. I say it is an abdication, an abandonment of the powers of Congress over this tremendous interest of the people of the United States. The Senator may not think so, but, no matter what confidence he may have in such a commission, he is taking a tremendous risk when he reposes in them such enormous power to deal with foreign nations in that way. We do not even permit the President of the United States to deal with foreign nations without submitting the result of the negotiations to the Senate of the United States. The transactions and bargains concluded with foreign countries are carefully provided for by the Constitution of the United States. The President can initiate, but when he has made a bargain he has got to come here and submit it to the Senate of the United States, and he has got to have a majority of two-thirds of the Senate before his action binds the American Nation; yet it is proposed to give this little commission this prodigious power over this illimitable amount of money. I say you are taking a risk, and you are running into a scandal, and you are furnishing us a very good asset for the next campaign.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SPENCER. I have no time of my own, but perhaps the Senator from Nebraska will let me ask him a question.

I quite understand the point of the Senator from Nebraska. He makes it clear that he believes that it is vicious and dangerous to intrust this power to a commission of four men. Even though they have to come before the Senate for confirmation, even though the approval of the President of the United States is also required, even though they can not release a single dollar of obligation of any foreign Government, he nevertheless thinks it is dangerous. What I ask him is this: If we once establish the proposition that the commission ought to be created and that this general power of dealing with $11,000,000,000 of foreign obligations ought to be vested in this commission, with the limitations of this bill, after we have once taken that step does not the Senator from Nebraska think that in the line of fairly carrying out the policy announced by the creation of the commission, the commission ought to have the very power that is included in the words "hereafter" in the sixth and fourteenth lines?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it is very difficult to make the bill any worse than it is, but I think those words accomplish it, if it can be done. I think it is an attempt to get away from responsibility to the American people. You, sir, as the Senator from Missouri, can not vote on a proposition of this sort without being responsible to your constituents nor I to mine; but this commission has no responsibility. There is no appeal from it. There is no relief for the American people; and if it makes an unconscionable bargain and throws away thousands of millions of dollars, there is no relief. I say it is apparently an attempt on the part of the representatives of the people here, who should be responsible to the people of the United States, to escape that responsibility and to vest this enormous power in the hands of a few men.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I do not see how any Senator can disagree with him.

This is a tremendous question that we have before this body to-day. It took the power of Congress to lend this money to the foreign nations. It took a mighty drive in the sale of Liberty bonds to obtain the money from the American people to supply these foreign nations with the money they now owe us; and here we are, in a Republican Congress with a majority of 24 in the Senate, going to surrender our right to pass upon the settlement suggested by these four men working in concert with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, what is there back of this scheme?

I suggested here a week ago, and it has been frequently talked about since, that there are $5,000,000,000 of indebtedness of foreign nations due to certain interests in this country, and most of them are in Wall Street.

This $11,000,000,000 due to the Government of the overburdened taxpayers of America is going to be sidetracked. It is going to be babied along to the rear, and the interest rates juggled, and the payment of interest postponed down the future for years and years to come, while these Wall Street interests come forward and demand payment of their claims. That is the case in a nutshell. That is exactly what the Senate of the United States is about to agree shall be done. All that we ask is what the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] proposed in the amendment which he offered, asking that this commission of five men be required to submit back to Congress for approval or disapproval whatever suggestion it had to make with regard to these settlements; and you deny us the right to do that.

Senators, I inquire again, what is it that has prompted this course? Are these men already decided upon? Do you already know what they will do when they are appointed? I think you do. I believe that some of you on the other side know now who will compose this commission, and I am satisfied that some of you know just exactly what they are going to recommend with regard to postponing the payment of this foreign debt, in order that these interests in the United States who contribute big funds to the Republican Party at election time shall proceed with the collection of their debt.

I wish the people of the United States knew just exactly what was going on here. Would that there was some way that we could get it to the country just exactly as it is! Of course, I know and you know that the Republican bosses and money lords of this country own the large part of the press of the country, and whatever grain of truth filters down to the reader amongst the masses is so colored and warped and twisted that they hardly know what is going on.

I want to assert again that it took the solemn action of the American Congress, approved by the President, to loan this money to the foreign nations, and not when we come to ask that it be paid back the Republican Party, in power from the President down, asks us to lodge the power in the hands of four men with a Republican Secretary of the Treasury to do as they will with this thing. We say, "Will you not let them submit it back for Congress to accept or reject?" "No, sir." Why not? What have you in your minds? What are you intending to do? What is it that you intend to do which makes you afraid to submit the proposed settlement or recommendation back to Congress? Oh, Mr. President, it is an awful thing that is about to be perpetrated upon the American people. Let me ask the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], who suggested to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that the names of the men to be appointed on this commission would be submitted here for confirmation, does that mean anything in view of the seating of NEWBERRY? I saw the Republican side of this Chamber vote to confirm the sale of a seat in this body, and if it will vote to confirm the sale of a seat in the United States Senate do you suppose there will be any trouble about the President, who favored the seating of Mr. NEWBERRY, having this commission confirmed in this body? If it were found necessary to get one or more out of that side who might vote with us, they will appoint them to some office. You know what David did with Uriah when he wanted to dispose of him? He sent him to the battle front and had him shot. The President of the United States has a milder-mannered way of disposing of a Republican Senator who votes with the Democrats to bring relief to the distressed farmers of the South and West. To-day he has taken from the firing line of the farmers' friends in the Senate the leader of the agricultural bloc, Senator KENYON, of Iowa. I regret to see the able and faithful Senator from Iowa leave this body. I wish him much happiness in his new field of service.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we now hold the obligations of these foreign Governments in a form which I take to be quite as legal and binding as any form to which they may be hereafter reduced. There seems to be an idea that we have some kind of an intangible evidence of debt which needs to be put into a more binding form; but the bond which we shall take will have no more binding force legally than the bond which we now have.

We have, for instance, from Great Britain a bond which reads as follows:

The Government of Great Britain and Ireland for value received promises to pay to the United States of America or assigns the sum of ——— dollars on demand, with interest from the date hereof at the rate of 5 per cent per annum—

And so forth.

Of course, Mr. President, if I had a note of that kind outstanding, I doubtless would be greatly worried until I got it exchanged and transformed into a note which was to be paid 25 years from now. If the transformation could be had, it would be a great accommodation to me, because a demand note is a very annoying circumstance, whether to an individual or to a nation.

But, so far as we are concerned, "we should worry." We have a demand note bearing 5 per cent interest, payable annually. What better will we have when we get the bonds?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does my friend from Idaho think that that sort of an obligation is negotiable, transferable, and can be sold?

Mr. BORAH. I am coming to that. That is precisely what I want to talk about. There is a reason for wanting to reduce this to the form of a bond, and unless somebody absorbs that bond, unless somebody buys it, you are in no better position than you are by having this present obligation. You desire a bond, because you hope somebody will purchase it and absorb it. Who will do it? Nobody will do it but our people.

Mr. KING. And they will not unless the Government guarantees it.

Mr. BORAH. Even if the Government should guarantee it, there is nothing which the Republican Party could do so disastrous to the future, from an economic standpoint, as to push into the possession of the individual people of this country who have money this $11,000,000,000, or any part of it. That which is bleeding the United States white to-day is the fact that our money, instead of being expended to extend our own industries and build up our own prosperity, is being used in just this kind of security.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, Mr. President, if we had these obligations funded which are now in the form of bonds they could not be sold in the United States, probably, without the Government guaranty, unless provision were made to make those bonds nontaxable, because an English bond sold anywhere in the United States would be subject to all local taxes of every kind.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is plenty of money to invest in just that kind of security; but the Senator answers himself, it seems to me. You are either going to change this bond so that some one will purchase it or you are not. If you do not, then the Government of the United States, if it must hold that bond, is in no better position than in holding this demand note.

Mr. President, why the haste about this change?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator asks why this haste about the change. Does the Senator think that there will be very much haste in changing the securities to the securities named in this bill when five years is given in which to make the change? Does not the Senator think that instead of haste in making the change the object and purpose of this bill is simply to extend the time of the interest payment?

Mr. BORAH. Possibly the Senator is correct. Mr. President, last summer there convened in the city of Paris some of the leading international bankers of the world, and while in session there they came to this conclusion, that Europe never can and never should undertake to pay these public debts; that it would be economic madness for her to undertake to do so; that the slate will have to be wiped clean of this class of indebtedness; and, said the bankers assembled—declared in substance—there need not be any worry about the United States provided sufficient time is given to educate the public mind of the United States as to the economic necessity of a cancellation of the debt.

Provided sufficient time is given. We now have a demand note, the interest payable annually. The first step which the Senator would take if he were conducting this transaction for the purpose of securing ultimate cancellation would be to have this note extended for 25 years, in order, as the London press says day after day, that there may be given an opportunity to the economic leaders of the world to educate the people of the United States as to the necessity of cancellation.

Any man who discusses this bill or considers it without considering the underlying proposition of the entire scheme—and that is ultimate cancellation—in my judgment, misinterprets the facts and circumstances which surround this legislation.

What would be the second step toward cancellation?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, does the Senator assert on the floor of the Senate that the President of the United States, all the members of the Cabinet, and all the members of the Finance Committee, who have given this subject the most earnest consideration, animated, I assume, by the highest patriotic motives, are all conniving and scheming in some way or other to get this debt canceled?

Mr. BORAH. I have not made any assertion of that kind. I do not deal with particular individuals. I define a situation.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am asking the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I say I have not made any assertion of that kind. I am stating that the underlying proposition of this entire scheme is ultimate cancellation. I have not any more doubt about it than that I look into the good-looking face of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Now let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. BORAH. I could go further and say, if the Senator desires me to say it, that I do not know that the President or the Cabinet would entertain that proposition at all; but my friend knows that in the ultimate sweep of the years the influences which control legislation are not lodged in any particular man's mind or any particular individual or set of individuals.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Notwithstanding the specific declaration in this bill itself that no dollar of it shall be canceled?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; within the next three years. Nobody expects it to be canceled in the next three years. Nobody expects it to be canceled in the next five years. As has been said, it takes time to educate the public mind to this proposition, and that is what they are now engaged in. There are plenty of influences in the United States of tremendous force in the Republican Party which are openly advocating it now. There are any number of men who contribute to the success of the Republican Party year after year who are advocating it every day, some of them in their newspapers.

Only a few nights ago a most distinguished person, speaking in the city of Washington, said that the first duty of the American people was to cancel this debt, in order that we might have economic sanity restored. You can go anywhere outside of official life and you will find any number of men who advocate the cancellation. You will find men sitting here in the Senate Chamber, men of perfect sincerity, of unquestioned integrity, who insist that the only thing to do is to cancel this debt.

I am not blind to the proposition, nor is the Senator from Indiana, as to what effect that will ultimately have in the disposing of this matter, but the first thing which the Senator would do, assuming he was in favor of the cancellation, would be to secure an extension of 25 years in which to consider the proposition, and to prepare for it.

The second thing which the Senator would do would be to see that there was no interest paid within any reasonable length of time. If the Senator owed a note which he expected ultimately to have canceled, or the consideration for which he believed was not just, he would not want to pay interest upon it for five years if he hoped ultimately to be relieved of its payment.

Therefore, Mr. President, though I ought not to say it in such a way as to indicate that it is in the minds of the Senators who are advocating this at this time, I assert that the ultimate plan with reference to this debt, among those who deal with such things, is its ultimate cancellation.

When this bill shall have been passed the disposition or ultimate settlement of this $11,000,000,000 will have been taken out of the hands of everyone except four or five men. It will go to secret conferences.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the discussion of the words appearing on line 14, page 2, of this bill, "or hereafter," and the fact that no very clear explanation to my mind has been made of their presence in the bill, suggests to me a use which may be made of them, even though it may not be intended now.

Some two years ago, as I remember, it appearing that further loans were being made to various European nations, and to Liberia in Africa, under the Liberty loan acts, or the provision of those acts providing for loans to our allies to enable them to more successfully conduct the war, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] introduced a bill to prohibit any further such loans, and that matter was very thoroughly investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the bill was referred.

I read from the report of that committee on that bill:

Since the date of the armistice approximately $1,500,000 has been loaned to foreign Governments.

Credits have been established for foreign Governments on which advances have not as yet been made, to the extent of approximately $129,000,000.

Of the original $10,000,000,000 provided for by Congress, approximately $300,000,000 over and above the $129,000,000, already referred to, remain.

Among the contemplated loans at the time of that investigation was, as I remember now, five million to the Republic of Liberia, and the evidence tended to show, if it did not conclusively show, that that, of course, was not to be used in the prosecution of the war, for the war was over, and, furthermore, there was an absolute inability on the part of Liberia to aid in the prosecution of the war. It was to pay a bonded debt which that little Republic had created, I believe it was stated, to some American financiers. It occurs to me now that I afterwards heard that that was controverted.

A few days ago I read in the press that the proposition to loan Liberia $5,000,000 was now under discussion by the present administration, and that it had been favorably discussed by the proper officers. It thus occurred to me that probably these words, "or hereafter," might be intended to cover any loans or advances which might be made of this $300,000,000 left over under the Liberty loan acts. That is certainly a better explanation than has been made of it by the proponents of this bill.

In view of that fact, I think it would be very proper to have an amendment to this bill so as to prevent any further such advances to aid our allies or others in winning the war, now some two or three years after the war is over, and I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand there is one amendment pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask that it be read and lie on the table until we dispose of the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add a new section to the bill, as follows:

SEC. —. No further moneys shall be paid under the authority of the so-called first Liberty loan act, approved April 24, 1917; the so-called second Liberty loan act, approved September 24, 1917; the so-called third Liberty loan act, approved April 4, 1918; the so-called fourth Liberty loan act, approved July 9, 1918; or the so-called Victory loan act, approved March 3, 1919, unless express authority of Congress shall hereafter be granted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, perhaps I misunderstood the position of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in the remarks made by him a moment ago, but if I interpreted his position correctly it was that because the United States held the obligations of certain European nations there was no reason for transmuting the same into long-time obligations. I am constrained to dissent from that view, at least if it shall be contended that there is no moral obligation resting upon the United States to extend the time of payment of the demand notes held by the United States. It is my understanding that the credits extended to our allies called for obligations to be given by them, which were to be of substantially the same character as those executed by the United States when it borrowed money during the war. The first Liberty loan act, approved April 24, 1917, declared that it was an act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign Governments, and so forth.

The provisions of the acts of Congress bearing upon this question, in substance, are that the United States should purchase at par the obligations of our allies, and that the debtor nations should evidence their indebtedness to the United States by giving bonds bearing the same rate of interest and substantially the same provisions as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of such acts. In the pressure incident to the war credits were extended to our allies, but bonds were not given by the allied nations evidencing the indebtedness resulting from the advances. Obligations were issued of a temporary character and payable on demand, with the understanding that these obligations were to be taken up and long-time bonds given by the debtor nations to the United States, the terms of the same being substantially the same as found in the bonds issued by the United States. The United States issued bonds to the extent of billions of dollars. These bonds do not mature, perhaps, for 20 or 30 years.

Mr. McCUMBER. They mature in 1947.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the debtor nations understood—or, at least, they were justified in believing—that their short-time obligations would be transmuted or converted into long-time obligations; and I insist that there is a moral obligation on the part of the United States to take up the notes and obligations now held by the United States and given by the allied nations and to refund the indebtedness and accept from these nations bonds carrying the same rate of interest and payable at the same time as provided in the bonds issued by the United States.

Mr. President, though I believe that our allies are entitled to have their indebtedness refunded, I am not in favor of the pending bill. My contention is that existing law is sufficiently broad to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the indebtedness due to the United States. He has the authority to receive the bonds of the debtor nations containing substantially the same provisions as to interest and time of payment as are found in the bonds issued by the United States.

It is possible that in the negotiations that may be called for in effectuating this result some conditions may develop that may call for further action upon the part of our Government. In that event, if it is a question between the United States and other nations, the President of the United States, under his constitutional powers, can present the matter to the nations involved and enter into such arrangements as he may deem proper to fully settle and adjust the matter. These arrangements may be denominated a "contract" or a "treaty." Upon concluding the matter he can then submit it to the Senate for its action.

But at the present time there is no controversy between the United States and other nations growing out of these obligations. The debtor nations have not applied to the United States for a modification of the terms under which they obtained the money. They voluntarily gave their obligations and, as I understand, are willing now to refund the short-time obligations and to execute suitable bonds evidencing their indebtedness. What is the necessity of further legislation?

But if, as stated, a situation develops which shows that the present law does not fully comprehend all questions that may arise, then the President possesses full authority to enter into agreements respecting any possible controversy or question of doubt and then submit them to the Senate for action. Therefore, Mr. President, I contend that we are wasting time in discussing the present bill.

The debate upon this bill might give the impression to disinterested parties that the United States was pressing with severity its claims against its former allies. I have sometimes thought that there was too much feeling exhibited in various parts of our country against our allies and that there was some form of propaganda calculated to inflame the minds of the people against the brave and heroic people who gave so much in defense of liberty and to secure in part at least the same objects as were sought by the United States when it entered the war.

Mr. President, we should take into account the bankrupt condition of Europe and the critical situation of our former allies. Most of the nations of Europe are in a precarious condition, not only politically but economically and industrially. The domestic debts are so stupendous as to be beyond our powers of comprehension, and the obligations to the United States are so enormous that it seems almost impossible for the debtor nations to meet them. They have but little gold. The credit of most of them is exhausted. Their production, not only of finished products but of raw materials, is reduced to a minimum, and the entire situation is such as to call for most generous treatment upon the part of the United States. I have no sympathy with any effort to drive sharp bargains with our debtor nations or to augment their burdens and intensify their griefs. I am anxious to aid in every possible way the rehabilitation of Europe. I desire to see the sun of prosperity shine upon all lands and peace and justice abound in all the earth. It would be poor policy for the United States to cut from Europe the pound of flesh and destroy the European nations economically.

The United States derived hundreds of millions of dollars of profit annually in her commercial relations with Europe. If Europe is prosperous it will bring added prosperity to our country. A bankrupt Europe would mean a distressed, if not bankrupt, United States. Of course, it would mean the loss of the sixteen to eighteen billions of dollars owing from Europe to the United States. It would mean, moreover, the destruction of our foreign trade and commerce, with the destructive reactions that would follow.

Something has been said by the Senator from Idaho about cancellation of the European debts. There is much to be said in favor of a cancellation by European nations of all debts due each of them, and a cancellation by the United States of the obligations due it from our former allies. Undoubtedly, if these mutual obligations were, in the language of the Senator from Idaho, "wiped out," there would be a remarkable revival in the trade and commerce of the world. If Great Britain were to release her debtors of the eight billions due her, and she were to be relieved from her indebtedness to the United States, it would be of immense advantage to the nations of Europe, and if the cancellation extended to all, undoubtedly Europe would be greatly prospered and benefited.

There are two sides to this question. Many reasons have been given by Mr. Vanderlip and other distinguished Americans in favor of a mutual cancellation of obligations growing out of the war. A recent book has been written by Mr. John Foster Bass, who gave us a most admirable work on "The Peace Tangle," and Dr. Moulton, a book entitled "America and the Balance Sheet of Europe." They recommend that the United States cancel the allied debts due to it. They review the conditions of Europe and offer valuable suggestions looking to an alleviation of the almost intolerable conditions that now exist throughout the world. Senators will remember the statement by Mr. McKenna, former chancellor of the British exchequer, who said that "if the broken countries of Europe are not restored, even the States still solvent will slip, one by one, into the general ruin."

Mr. President, even a selfish policy upon the part of the United States would require that it address itself in every proper way to a stabilization of economic as well as political conditions in Europe. If the weak States of Europe fall, the stronger ones will be dragged down, and with economic and political chaos in Europe no one can foretell the awful catastrophe that would engulf the world. This is a time for world fellowship, for a fine spirit of internationalism, for generous Christian brotherhood, for helpfulness, and for the application in international affairs of that true altruism which in the end must triumph and bring nations and peoples into harmonious relations.

Mr. President, I am not advocating that we cancel the debts due from the allied nations to the United States. I would not, as I now see the situation, vote for such a measure, but I do plead for a policy to be adopted with reference to our international dealings that is not only just but is essentially humane and generous. I plead for a spirit of amity and indeed affection that will bind together not only the allied and associated nations but all the nations of the earth. A narrow, provincial nationalism is not consistent with the spirit of the hour, and the great nation is the one who carries justice and mercy and fellowship and heals the nations afflicted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is only one question in the case now, and that is the question whether or not we should strike out the word "hereafter"—obligations of a foreign Government which may "hereafter" come into the hands of the United States. We are settling and propose to settle in this case the obligations for the sale of supplies made by the Navy or the Army which are still over in France. We have been making such sales recently. We made some sales only a few days ago.

The question is, if we make some such sales after the bill has been passed and the law enacted and we desire to include in the settlement any amount arising from such sales, whether or not we should allow such amounts to be funded into long-time bonds. I think we should. I do not know why we should leave out a few million or a few hundred thousand dollars in the final settlement with France or Belgium or Great Britain simply because it was not an obligation at the time we passed this bill.

I can not imagine that the word "hereafter," in the sense in which it is used, could cover anything else. Remember that we are dealing with obligations which grew out of the World War, and it is so stated that these are the obligations. There is a question in my mind whether this obligation for a sale now of property that was shipped over to France during the World War could be considered an obligation growing out of the World War. Of course, the thing which was sold was something that we transferred to the shores of France during the war, and it would not pay us, possibly, to ship it back to the United States.

I would like to have such sums included in our settlement if there should be any made after this bill becomes a law and before the matter is fully settled. I can not see any serious objection to that. I do not think that it amounts to a great deal. It will not cover very many claims at most, but it ought to be broad enough so that it would cover any claim that might come into existence which was directly or indirectly connected with the World War.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. REED. Why would it not cover the right to accept the obligations of Liberia, for instance, for the $5,000,000 loan that we are told it is proposed to make under the claim that it is covered by commitments or arrangements made by virtue of the World War bond act?

Mr. McCUMBER. Liberia is not owing us that sum now. We did not advance the money. She has not received the money. We necessarily have not her obligation. If we advance the money to her, I assume it will have to be done pursuant to some kind of an arrangement by treaty with Liberia under which she will receive it. If the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, loans Liberia $5,000,000, or feels, by reason of the relations which existed between this country and Liberia, that we still ought to extend the $5,000,000 credit which we did not extend to her, that would be the subject of a treaty and the terms of which would be fixed under the treaty. The Senator does not claim now that what we propose to do with Liberia in the future is an obligation that would come under the provisions of the pending bill?

Mr. REED. I am very much afraid it would.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think not. I can not imagine that we can make a loan to Liberia now without either congressional action or a treaty. It has to be done by some kind of law. As a matter of fact, there is no claim on the part of Liberia at the present time. She gave an obligation at one time under which she was supposed to have a credit. She did not draw the money, and the obligation has been canceled.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the obligation has been canceled, and if the Senator will call up the Treasury Department he will find that is the case. Having been canceled, there is no obligation on our part to advance the amount, and there is no indebtedness now due us from Liberia. If we create an obligation hereafter by loaning them money, we have to get further authority from Congress.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator answer a further question? When was our arrangement with Liberia canceled?

Mr. McCUMBER. It was withdrawn on the 4th day of November last.

Mr. REED. The Senator certainly will desire to reexamine that question if he means that it is claimed that the United States Government has absolutely declined to carry out the arrangement for the payment of $5,000,000.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The reports of the Secretary of the Treasury states that—> the credit in favor of Liberia was established only for a specific purpose. The balance of this credit was withdrawn on November 4, 1921.

Mr. REED. That is, the credit?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. REED. That does not cover the whole question. It was contended during the hearings on the matter that we were still under obligation to Liberia.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My recollection about it is, if the Senator will permit me, and his may accord with mine, that we were under some obligation to grant a credit of $5,000,000 to Liberia some time during the war, but that expired by reason of some limitation or other, the terms of which I have forgotten. England was to advance so much and France so much, and they advanced their portions, and we were under some sort of a moral obligation to advance the remainder, but the Secretary of the Treasury, my recollection is, said that it could not be done without authority of Congress, and that that was hereafter to be asked.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator is in error and the record, of course, will have to be examined.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; we will have to look at the record.

Mr. REED. The point I am making and the question I am asking the Senator is, Suppose it is true that we shall hereafter sell goods to European countries and sell them on credit, does the Senator then contend that this commission would have the authority to fix the terms of payment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not as the bill now stands.

Mr. REED. If the Senator leaves the word "hereafter" in it certainly will have that authority.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; because the words "or hereafter" there used relate to obligations arising out of the World War. If we should now sell anything to any foreign Governments, unless possibly the transaction might connect itself with some understanding or obligation made while the World War was in existence, we could not say that it arose out of the World War.

Mr. REED. Then, if the Senator please, that cuts the entire ground out from under those who have been claiming that the reason they want the words "or hereafter" left in the bill is to take care of these very claims for the sale of goods which the Senator now says we can not make and that would not be covered under this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let the Senator from Missouri be fair. I said that we did make arrangements in France and elsewhere for the sale from time to time of surplus material which was shipped over to the Old World while we were carrying on the World War and that probably sales of goods that were over there, that were to be taken over by those Governments, and the prices later to be fixed upon, might be said to grow out of the World War. Certainly such transactions would have to be connected in some way with the obligations of the World War in order, as the bill now stands, to have the bill apply to them.

Mr. REED. But every claim connected with the World War has been settled long ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may, I will ask the Senator from North Dakota a question in my own time, and let him answer in my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from North Dakota has stated, and I know it to be a fact, that our Government has been selling war supplies to France from time to time. I was disposed to think that those supplies had all been sold, though I may be in error about that; but as the War Department sold them, it is to be presumed that they had the right to determine the terms of settlement. Do they not have that power under the law?

Mr. McCUMBER. They may have that power.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, if that be so, what is to be gained by incorporating the words referred to in this proposed law?

Mr. McCUMBER. We could not take bonds; there is no question about that. The only thing on earth we could take would be cash. The whole question here is whether we should put these obligations into the form of long-time bonds or simply leave them as demand obligations.

Mr. POMERENE. Has the Senator from North Dakota the statute before him which authorized the War Department to make these sales?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I have not that statute before me. I will ask the Senator if I may, in his time, refer to another matter which has been alluded to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]?

Mr. POMERENE. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from North Dakota for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. In the testimony of Mr. Mellon he was asked about this Liberia matter. I quote from his testimony, as follows:

> Senator REED. How about Liberia? When did they withdraw their claim?
> Mr. MELLON. Liberia has not withdrawn any claim. Liberia is still requesting that advancements be made; but the Treasury does not regard the request as a binding one that the Treasury is under any obligation to comply with.

I think that clearly shows the attitude of the Treasury Department; and I think since that testimony was taken—though I am not certain as to the time—the obligation which Liberia gave for the advancement has been marked "canceled and surrendered."

Mr. SHIELDS and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin, not having spoken, is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think the situation as to Liberia ought to be clearly understood, and if I do not state it accurately I hope the chairman of the Finance Committee will correct me.

As I understand, there was a credit extended Liberia of $5,000,000. That credit was opened and was extended upon Liberia making certain arrangements with regard to the prosecution of the war. Only $26,000 of that $5,000,000 credit was ever taken by Liberia, and that is the total amount that Liberia now owes the United States. The President of the Republic of Liberia was over here last year. Liberia claims that, having fulfilled all of the conditions under which the credit was granted by the United States but not having availed herself of it at that particular time, she is still entitled to the $5,000,000 less the $26,000 which she has received. I understand the executive department admits the moral obligation and the claim of Liberia, and that the credit would be extended except for the fact that under the statutes authorizing these loans the Secretary of the Treasury has no longer any power to make any advance or loan to any nation. Therefore, while the moral obligation to Liberia still remains, there is no power existing, and can not be without further legislative authority, to carry out that moral obligation, and no money can be advanced to Liberia unless Congress by legislative action or by treaty shall authorize it. Have I stated the situation correctly?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has stated the situation exactly as I understand it to exist.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Wisconsin claim that there is any difference between the situation in which Liberia stands and the situation with reference to other countries for which the United States has established credits and who drew their money after the armistice? Does the Senator think the situation is different?

Mr. LENROOT. It is different in this respect: Under the bond acts there is no authority to advance or loan money to any nation except for one purpose—the prosecution of the war. Then, also, the authority to loan is limited to the countries who were at that time engaged in war with the enemies of the United States.

Mr. REED. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, under those acts, the authority of the President or the Secretary of the Treasury clearly has ceased so far as Liberia is concerned.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Wisconsin think that that is occasioned by the fact that we have actually made treaties of peace or that it is determined by the question of fact as to whether we were at war?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly, where treaties of peace have been made, and particularly after we have entered into a treaty of peace with Germany, there clearly can be no authority to advance a single dollar.

Mr. REED. I do not think there was authority at first.

Mr. LENROOT. That may have been, but it is beyond question now.

Mr. REED. It was exercised and exercised upon the theory—I am trespassing upon the Senator's time and do not want to do so if he wishes to avail himself of the time—it was exercised upon the theory that we had made commitments during the war and that, having made the commitments, we must carry them out. Now, we did make a commitment to Liberia of some kind, and if——

Mr. LENROOT. I think I see the Senator's point, and I will say frankly that, in my view, if the last administration extended a credit or advanced money where a contract had not actually been executed between a foreign country and the United States—and Liberia never did execute her contract—from the time that the other nation had entered into a treaty of peace with Germany and no longer engaged in war with Germany the authority to extend the loan or credit ceased.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him once more—and then I shall try to end this colloquy——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I will yield to the Senator in a moment. Whatever may have been the case before, I am sure he will not take the position that there is any authority, now that we have entered into a treaty of peace with Germany, to continue these advances.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the situation as I understand it is this: After the armistice was signed and the war had actually ceased some two thousand million dollars were paid out of the Treasury. It was said in justification that we had obligated ourselves to pay it out, having established credits during the war to certain nations engaged in the war, and that as to other sums we were paying them out to other countries to which we might not have had actual commitments, but for expenses incurred during the war. I thought that all which was paid out after the war ceased, without further authority of Congress, was illegally paid, but the other view was taken, and it has continued apparently to be the view. One of the commitments we made was to Liberia. If we made that commitment during the war, why are we not bound by it just as we were bound in the case of other countries, because our obligation does rest upon the fact of war, but it rests upon the claim that a contract was made when the war was in existence.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have only a minute left, and I shall have to interrupt the Senator there. As a legal proposition, I will say to the Senator that entering into an armistice does not mean the ending of a war. I believe the last administration acted wholly within their rights in continuing these advances for the duration of the armistice, but if any money was loaned out after the treaty of Versailles was entered into the money thus advanced was wholly without authority. So far as the Liberian loan is concerned, there can be no question that whatever authority had existed has expired, and not one dollar can be advanced to Liberia now without further authorization of Congress or by treaty.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the facts in regard to the Liberian loan, for I do not think he has stated them with entire correctness, as I understand them, although I happened to be out of the Chamber when this discussion began.

I referred a while ago to the bill now pending before the Judiciary Committee in regard to the making of further loans after the armistice, either on commitments already made or commitments to be made. I will say that I am sure that bill was never reported because of the assurance of the then Secretary of the Treasury that no further commitments or loans would be made to foreign countries, which, because the war was over, were supposed not to be entitled to such loans under the provisions of the bill to which I have referred. The correspondence in regard to these foreign loans between the Secretary of the Treasury and other departments of the Government was also submitted to the committee, and was carefully considered, and a report of the substance of them made.

In regard to Liberia, it was said in that report:

Under the Liberty loan act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to make loans to foreign Governments then engaged in war with enemies of the United States for the purpose of the prosecution of war, a credit of $5,000,000 was established for the Government of Liberia. This credit was established September 9, 1918. Upon this credit advances were made to the extent of $26,000, which was for the purpose of sending the Liberian delegation to the peace conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask that the balance of this statement be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks; but I was speaking on the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has already spoken once on the pending amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS. I offered one amendment, and one is pending.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I cheerfully yield to the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator can use part of my time if he desires.

Mr. SHIELDS. In the time of the Senator from Georgia, then, I will finish reading this statement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that can not be permitted A Senator can not farm out his 10 minutes, under the rule.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then in my own time, when the amendment is presented to the Senate, I shall finish reading this report and give the facts concerning it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the balance of the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

I have not attached the correspondence on Liberia, because the committee in the examination of Mr. Kelley went into the Liberian matter thoroughly and placed in the record the correspondence showing all of the facts.

There now remains an unexpended balance under the credit established for Liberia of $4,974,000, and a mission from Liberia arrived in this country a few weeks ago to try and obtain advances on this credit so established.

Mr. WATSON of Georiga. Mr. President, on page 426 of volume 2 of Blaine's Twenty Years of Congress, I find the following, speaking of President Grant, of course:

As soon as the President's message was read Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, asked "unanimous consent to introduce a bill repealing so much of the act of September 2, 1789, as prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from being concerned in carrying on the business of trade or commerce and providing instead that in no case shall he act on any matter, claim, or account in which he is personally interested." Mr. Sumner objected to the introduction of the bill, suggesting that it ought to be "most profoundly considered before it is acted upon by the Senate."

In brief, President Grant withdrew the name of Mr. A. T. Stewart, the big business man of New York, because of the statute of 1789. The clause of that statute applying to this subject is as follows:

No person appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury, or first comptroller, or first auditor, or Treasurer, or register, shall, directly or indirectly, be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner in whole or in part—

And so forth. The balance applies to other things.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] cited facts, apparently upon the highest authority, showing that the present Secretary of the Treasury is one of the largest business men of the world, possibly as large a business man as Rockefeller, engaged actively in 60 different corporations, as I remember the number—at any rate, a very great number of corporations—one of which is the Aluminum Trust. In reference to this very bill, where he is to become ex officio a member of this commission, I submit to Senators whether this statute is not worthy of serious consideration as to whether he is qualified to serve on this commission, or qualified to hold the office of Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made before with regard to my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STERLING. Making the same announcement as on the former roll call as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. OWEN. I find that my pair, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], has not voted. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McCORMICK. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). My pair, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], sent me a day or two ago a note stating that if at any time he was absent from the Chamber I was at liberty to vote, and hence I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 42, as follows:

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say some time this afternoon that his amendment was to be offered last, after all other amendments had been offered.

Mr. NORRIS. Any other amendment would take precedence over mine, because it is a substitute. I assumed that all the amendments had been offered except the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who kindly said that he would offer his afterwards. The Senator can offer an amendment now if he desires.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have an amendment which I desire to offer. I will ask the Senator to withdraw his amendment so that I may have this one passed upon.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I am perfectly willing to do that. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska withdraws his amendment. The Senator from Tennessee offers an amendment which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add at the proper place in the bill a new section, to read as follows:

No further moneys shall be paid under the authority of the so-called first Liberty loan act approved April 24, 1917, the so-called second Liberty loan act approved September 24, 1917, the so-called third Liberty loan act approved April 4, 1918, the so-called fourth Liberty loan act approved July 9, 1918, or the so-called Victory loan act approved March 3, 1919, unless express authority of Congress shall hereafter be granted.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I desire to read from the report made to the Judiciary Committee upon the bill prohibiting further advances under commitments to foreign nations after the termination of the war, of which I have spoken. I will read it all in order that it may appear consecutively in the RECORD:

Under the Liberty loan act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to make loans to foreign Governments then engaged in war with enemies of the United States for the purpose of the prosecution of the war, a credit of $5,000,000 was established for the Government of Liberia. This credit was established September 9, 1918. Upon this credit advances were made to the extent of $26,000, which was for the purpose of sending the Liberian delegation to the peace conference. I have not attached the correspondence on Liberia, because the committee in the examination of Mr. Kelley went into the Liberian matter thoroughly and placed in the record the correspondence showing all of the facts.

There now remains an unexpended balance under the credit established for Liberia of $4,974,000, and a mission from Liberia arrived in this country a few weeks ago to try and obtain advances on this credit so established.

Mr. President, Mr. Kelley, the gentleman referred to, had some connection with the Treasury Department. I have forgotten his position, but he was a very intelligent man, and explained it fully, and I am sorry I have not now before me his testimony, which fully sustains this report. There was a commitment, and it conclusively appears from his testimony, and all the facts warrant this report made to the committee which I have just read.

Mr. REED. Mr. Kelley was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of foreign loans.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is the position he held, as I now remember. I am glad the Senator furnished the information.

If the commitment to Liberia was binding, of course they were entitled to the money. I understood from a paper that was being read, perhaps by the Senator from Indiana, when I returned to the Chamber, that Mr. Mellon, the present Secretary of the Treasury, had said that the commitment was canceled. Was that correct?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is correct.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would like to ask the Senator further, as I have not read the evidence of the Secretary before the committee, whether that was by mutual consent?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Secretary of the Treasury, I will say to the Senator, in his testimony before the Finance Committee, made the statement that—

Liberia has not withdrawn any claim. Liberia is still requesting that advancements be made, but the Treasury does not regard the request as being one that the Treasury is under any obligation to comply with.

Mr. SHIELDS. In other words, the present Secretary takes the contrary view, that it was not authorized by the law, and he himself canceled it?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not think the Secretary of State has ever requested the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out this obligation, and the Secretary of the Treasury goes on in his testimony to say that unless and until the Secretary of State shall call upon him, as the Secretary of the Treasury, to fulfill that obligation it will not be fulfilled, and I understand that the Secretary of State has said that this will not be done, and in fact that it can not be done until there is legislation authorizing it.

Mr. SHIELDS. How does the Senator get that understanding of the views of the Secretary of State upon the subject?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I had a conversation with Secretary Hughes over the telephone about it. That was at the time Secretary Mellon appeared before the committee. I do not like to repeat the conversation offhand, word for word, but that is simply my recollection of the conversation.

Mr. SHIELDS. I simply wanted the source of the Senator's information, and to know whether there was any record made of the views of the Secretary of State.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. So far as I know, there is no record of it; but my understanding is that because of the conditions existing at the time and the understandings that were had at the time, our State Department believes that there is a moral obligation to discharge that obligation—to pay that money, $5,000,000.

Mr. SHIELDS. That the State Department now thinks there is a moral obligation?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My understanding is that legislation will be asked by and by to permit the payment of that sum to Liberia.

Mr. SHIELDS. That somewhat answers the question I was about to ask, whether this discussion of the matter occurred recently?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No. These hearings on that question were had before the Finance Committee, I think, in July, four or five months ago.

Mr. SHIELDS. Can the Senator give some light upon the subject of the present agitation of the matter?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I can not.

Mr. SHIELDS. Was the statement in the public press a few days ago that this loan would be made, that this commitment would be carried out, correct or not?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My understanding is that there has been no change of view by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator saw in the public press that the matter was being discussed and discussed favorably for Liberia, did he not?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asked this question, speaking to the Secretary of the Treasury:

But suppose the State Department came to you to-morrow and said, "We have had negotiations with Liberia. We have reached an agreement. We told Liberia that they should have this $5,000,000, and we told the Treasury so, and the Treasury put it to their credit." Now, what are you going to do with that case?

Then Assistant Secretary Wadsworth spoke up and said:

I understand, informally, that the State Department has determined not to make any such statement.

Then Secretary Mellon said:

I think that is the situation.

I can not read all of this in the Senator's time, because it would exhaust the time, but my understanding is that the Secretary of the Treasury considers that he is under no obligation whatever to carry out that commitment, and I understand the present Secretary of State has the same view, but that there is a moral obligation to do that, dependent upon the future action of Congress.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator did not seem to catch my inquiry. Did he not read in the public press only last week that the matter of carrying out the terms of that commitment was now being discussed, and discussed favorably in behalf of Liberia?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I read something of that kind in the press.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator know whether or not that is true?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I do not. I can find out in a very little while, if the Senator is anxious to know.

Mr. SHIELDS. In view of those facts, I can not think that this amendment would do any harm, and it might do much good. Certainly no more money ought to be advanced for the prosecution of the war, and I will ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, so far as the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is concerned, it seems to me it ought not to be adopted. It is not necessary. It appears, of course, that on September 19, 1918, the Government extended a credit to Liberia of $5,000,000 in the same form it had extended credits to other countries, on which $26,000 was advanced. President Wilson, in two letters, of which I can not give the dates, stated to the Secretary of the Treasury that he thought there was a moral obligation, and that that money ought to be paid to Liberia, and, so far as I know, that was his position when he went out of office.

I know of no discussion or consideration whatever by any department of the present administration looking to a fulfillment of that moral obligation without an act of Congress, and clearly it requires an act of Congress. The credit was extended to Liberia, Liberia complied with the conditions which were required of her, but before the money was finally paid to her the time elapsed, peace had been made, and there was no legislative authority to carry it out.

What is the use of enacting a piece of legislation providing that the Government shall fulfill its moral obligation when an act of Congress is going to be necessary in any event, and all the facts then ought to be laid before the Congress, and will be? I know that it is the opinion of the Secretary of State, and I believe of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I believe of the President, that if that moral obligation is to be carried out, it must be by legislation of Congress, when all the facts will be furnished, if such legislation is asked for.

As to whether it should be carried out, Congress can pass upon that at the time. There are many circumstances and conditions surrounding this loan which ought to be fully discussed, and which undoubtedly will be, if any legislation is asked; but I see no object in putting on this bill a declaration of what we will do in the future, when we have to have legislation to carry out that moral obligation if we are ever going to do it, and I do not think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very sure that if the distinguished Senator from Tennessee would refresh his mind as to the actual terms of the law under which these loans were authorized, and then apply the terms of the law to the facts in the case of Liberia, he would see that his amendment is wholly unnecessary, and that no loan can now be made to Liberia without further legislative authority. These loans were for the purpose of prosecuting the war, and they could be made to a country then engaged in war with enemies of the United States, and the authority was to purchase obligations of such countries upon the terms named in the law.

If I understand the facts, Liberia never offered, never gave, and the United States never received, any obligations whatever from the Liberian Republic. Certain formalities were to be complied with, which were in fact never complied with by Liberia, and so there can be no possible question that there is no authority at present with the Executive or the Treasury Department to make this loan, and it is my understanding that the credit upon the books of the Treasury Department was canceled, not because they felt there was no obligation but because there was wholly wanting any authority to make any advances to the Republic of Liberia without further legislative authority.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we ought not to get far afield in ascertaining the facts with reference to this matter. We discuss two or three questions at the same time and assume our facts as we go along, and it leads to some confusion. Now, what are the facts?

The Liberty loan act provided that the money should be borrowed from the people of this country, and, speaking of them in the aggregate, $10,000,000,000 could be loaned to foreign countries or credits established for the benefit of foreign countries. Under that provision credits were established for nearly all of the foreign countries, and, among others, a credit was established for Liberia. When the actual war ceased there still remained some $2,000,000,000 of credits established, the money for which had not been drawn down. The Treasury Department proceeded to pay out the money upon these credits to the amount of nearly $2,000,000,000.

When the authority to so do was challenged by Senators who were sitting on the Committee of the Judiciary considering the bill which I had introduced to stop further advances, the argument was made that we had obligated ourselves to these countries during the war and hence we were obliged to carry out our obligations. Liberia was included with the other nations and treated in exactly the same manner as the other countries. There were, in addition to the commitments of which I have spoken made to countries engaged in the war, certain commitments or alleged commitments which had been made to countries after the armistice was signed.

There has been no change in that situation from the day the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary, which was on February 2, 1921, and the present time, except that we have formally declared peace between this country and Germany, Austria, and Turkey. But the formal declaration of peace in no manner changes our obligation to those countries if it was an obligation. The question as to whether the obligations could be legally incurred is not here, because the Treasury has been treating all of these commitments as binding upon the United States, morally and legally. We have of course in many instances arranged that when a country's claims were satisfied or its rapacity was satisfied, no more money would be advanced, but as to Liberia there has been an insistent claim all along by Liberia that she is entitled to this $5,000,000.

Speaking roughly, Liberia's claim is bottomed upon this, that she came into the war at the request of the United States; that by coming into the war she knew she would lose and did lose a large amount of revenue, and, indeed, that she had begun to lose that revenue before she entered the war, though after the war had begun in Europe; and that therefore the United States must come in and advance her $5,000,000, this $5,000,000 being advanced for the purpose of taking up the securities or obligations of a bank which I think is called the Anglo-Liberian Bank, although I may be mistaken in the name, and which had been in some manner guaranteed by England, I think France, and some other country. In fact, Liberia was in a receivership and her revenues were impounded under this agreement to take care of the indebtedness of this bank. That is as accurate a statement as I can make after nearly a year has elapsed since I heard the testimony.

We apparently came in to take care of Liberia's obligations which she owed to English and French creditors, the United States in this instance, as in all others, proposing to be the one that would in the end pay the money.

I have here, and I must make this statement very hurriedly, the testimony of Mr. Kelley, taken before the Committee on the Judiciary. At page 21, speaking of the Liberian loan, I asked Mr. Kelley this question:

Senator REED. I notice Liberia in this table, on page 335. On February 6, 1919, it appears that you advanced $12,000 to Liberia; on September 10, 1919, $6,000; and on September 24, 1919, $8,000, making $26,000 altogether. What was that advanced to Liberia for, to help her conduct the war against Germany?

Mr. KELLEY. The credit was established for that purpose.

Senator REED. Did she draw down any other sums?

Mr. KELLEY. She drew down $26,000.

And, to abbreviate it, that was $26,000 turned over to her to pay the expenses of her delegates to attend the peace conference in Paris.

At page 22 this question was asked:

Senator REED. At that time—September 9, 1918—you had established a credit for Liberia in the handsome sum of $5,000,000. She did not draw any of it until a year after the war was over. That is right?

Mr. KELLEY. No; I will not answer a question a little like that, because I do not express any opinion upon the question of the war being over. I ought not to be asked a question like that.

Senator REED. * * * Before we leave that, the rest of the money stands to-day to the credit of Liberia, does it not—the rest of the $5,000,000?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; the balance of that credit of $5,000,000 has not been withdrawn.

At page 25 it is recited:

Senator KING. You referred to the fact that payments were made in 1919 to Liberia of $26,000; that there was a credit established of $5,000,000; and that there were small payments in 1919. Do you know whether that was paid to Liberia or whether it was paid to Americans for goods sent which they had furnished to Liberia at a prior date?

Mr. KELLEY. No; I think all that was to cover their expenses—

That is, the delegates' expenses—

at the peace conference.

Senator REED. Did we have to pay the freight on these gentlemen to the peace conference?

Mr. KELLEY. Is that a rhetorical question, or do you wish an answer?

At page 26, Mr. Kelley said further:

I think the Treasury could have made just a plain gratuity, an unrestricted advance, to any Government to get them into the war, or to do anything that was thought at the time to be beneficial for the purposes of the war. As a matter of fact, substantially all these loans were made on terms under which it was understood that they would be expended for goods manufactured in this country. But I think that as a means for getting any Government into the war, if it had been thought advisable to just pay—lend—them $5,000,000 and let that be the last of it, we could have done it.

At page 30:

Senator REED. Was there any question of further prosecution of the war by Liberia after the 11th day of November, 1918? Did you propose to give this money to Liberia in order to prosecute the war, or did you give it to her for just what you have said, to pay the way of these gentlemen, and I suppose to pay their entertainment also in Paris? It did not cost $26,000 to transport them to Paris, did it? That went to feed them, did it not, and to house them?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know what it was for.

On page 36 I find this:

Mr. KELLEY. As stated on page 55 of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the balances of credits established in favor of foreign Governments are as follows.

There follows the list and in the list is—

Liberia, $4,974,000. Now, subject to such corrections as I may find, I believe that those are still the balances.

Then, at page 37, Mr. Kelley stated:

Would you mind if I read something into the record in the meantime, Senator, while you are looking that up? I want to call attention of the committee to the statement at the bottom of page 54 of the Secretary's annual report as follows, the last two lines on that page:

"No further credits will be extended under existing legislation by the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of any foreign Government, and consequently no further advances will be made to Governments in favor of which there are no existing balances."

Notice the language—

No further credits will be extended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator from Missouri a question, but I will ask it of the Senator from North Dakota. Did not the present administration make further advances to foreign nations upon commitments made by the former administration?

Mr. McCUMBER. I was going to cover that, but first I wish to say a word with reference to the assumption of the Senator from Missouri that unless we now declare in a law that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make no further advances, there are liable still to be advances made. He bolsters up that argument with the statement that after the armistice we kept on making advances or making payments in the sum of over two billion dollars.

Let us look at that for a single moment. We gave credit to these foreign Governments. We did not advance them any money. We simply gave them credits and they purchased goods in the United States of American manufacturers. Of course, instead of paying the foreign Governments we paid the American manufacturer, and we could not pay the American manufacturer until he had presented his bill and that bill had been O. K'd by the foreign Government.

Inasmuch as only a part of this, or about two-thirds of the entire credits, had been absorbed by the foreign Governments prior to the armistice, of course when the bills came in we made the payments. The payments did amount to more than $2,000,000,000, but they were indebtedness incurred and they were within the credits. Certainly that would not authorize us to assume because we paid in accordance with our then obligations that we shall continue to advance money when there is no obligation.

Let us look at the report of Secretary Houston, the Secretary of the Treasury in 1920. If Senators will turn to pages 54 and 55 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1920, they will find that the Secretary states:

> From April 24, 1917 (the date of the first Liberty loan act), up to November 15, 1920, the credits established after deducting credits which had been withdrawn and the cash advances were as follows.

Then he gives a table of just what credits were given and how much had been drawn against each one of the credits and the balance that was not drawn by the country to which the credit had been given. The only ones which were left at that time which had not been settled were Czechoslovakia, her balance being $6,072,834.36; Italy, $34,921,192.73; France, $50,496,977.24; and Liberia, $4,974,000. The total amount unsettled at that time was $96,465,004.23.

Then following the table the Secretary said:

> No further credits will be extended under existing legislation by the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of any foreign Governments, and, consequently, no further advances will be made to Governments in favor of which there are no existing balances.

Following that up with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to the language he has just read, "No further advances will be made or credits be established"? I think that is substantially the language. The credits had been established. That is the very point. A credit had been established for Liberia. The statement that no further credits would be established cuts no figure, for Liberia had already established a credit. The statement that no further advances would be made except where credits had been established does not help us, for Liberia already had a credit established, and I have just read the testimony to show it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, Mr. President, and I read what the balance of the credit to Liberia was at that time. Of course, Liberia was included, and I gave the amount. The amount of the credit which Liberia had not drawn was set out in the report to be $4,974,000. What became of that? If Senators will turn to pages 37, 38, and 39 of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, they will find that the Secretary gives the date at which the credit was withdrawn in each one of these cases. So there is not a single credit now in existence to any foreign country, and no further advances could be made under the law.

Not only that, Mr. President, but when the present Secretary of the Treasury was called before the Finance Committee again and again he declared that there was no authority to make any further advances; that all of the credits had been exhausted; and that all of them had been withdrawn. So there can be no possibility of any claim that we can still under the old war authority extend credits to Liberia or to any other country; that matter is closed. If we feel at any future time that we have not done entire justice to Liberia, that through some technicality she was not able to secure the amount of her credit, and that it has since been canceled and we want to loan her that money, it will have to be done either by an act of Congress or by a treaty. I do not want to appear to assume by the incorporation of any kind of a prohibitive declaration in this bill that the Secretary of the Treasury or the administration intend still to continue the war authority to extend credits and to make payments. They have no such authority, and they say they have no such authority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it; the "noes" have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to ask what was the decision of the Chair as to the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The decision of the Chair was that the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for a division on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi calls for a division on the amendment.

The question being again put on a division the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in the Committee of the Whole and is still open to amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I now offer the amendment, which I have already sent to the desk, and ask that it be read.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator desire to offer another amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not quite certain as yet, but I wish first to get some information from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Montana for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska withhold his amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I withhold the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I observe that no provision is made in the bill for the salaries of the members of the proposed commission. I inquire of the Senator from North Dakota if there is any general provision of law under which salaries will be paid to the members of the commission, or is it expected that they will serve gratuitously?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me first say that if there is no amendment pending, I suppose that the question which the Senator has asked and his argument are upon the bill itself? I do not want to have the Senator's question and my answer taken out of my time, but I can say very briefly in answer to his question in his own time that there is no provision made for the payment of any salaries; that if there are any salaries or expenses to be paid it will be necessary to have an appropriation for that purpose, and that would come from the other House.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What I want to know is whether it is contemplated that the members of the proposed commission are to serve without compensation or whether it is in contemplation of those pressing the bill that an appropriation will be made for their salaries?

Mr. McCUMBER. The present Secretary of the Treasury certainly would serve without compensation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite likely.

Mr. McCUMBER. And if another member of the Cabinet should be selected, I suppose he also would serve without compensation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McCUMBER. As to who the appointees will be, as to whether they will be judges or men who are already drawing compensation in other branches of the Government, I can not say; but when that matter is settled, then Congress can determine whether or not it is proper to vote an appropriation for their salaries.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not intend to press any inquiry at this time as to who the commissioners were to be. What I wish to understand is whether it is contemplated by those pressing the bill that the commissioners are to serve without compensation or whether it is contemplated that an appropriation bill will be presented later taking care of their salaries?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have given the best answer I can give. I have no contemplation about it, because I do not know who is going to be selected. When I ascertain who is going to be selected, whether officials of the Government now drawing salaries or others, I shall know whether they were to serve without further compensation; but, as I do not know what may be in the contemplation of the President in making the appointments, I can not answer the Senator's question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This is another question in connection with this measure which, apparently, is wrapped up in secrecy. We do not know whether it is intended to appoint men who are now drawing salaries in some position under the Government, or whether it is intended to appoint some persons outside of the Government service who shall serve either gratuitously or depend upon some subsequent action of Congress for their salaries. If they are to serve gratuitously, I am really interested in pressing the further inquiry as to who these highly public-spirited gentlemen are who are going to serve upon this commission without compensation.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have no authority to speak for the President of the United States in this matter, but I happen to know that nobody will be appointed on the commission but members of the Cabinet and Members of Congress, and, in that event, I assume that it will not be necessary to provide additional salaries.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, so far as Members of Congress are concerned, my recollection is that there is a constitutional inhibition against the appointment of any Member of Congress to an office created during the term for which he was elected.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not think that that is entirely correct. Does the Senator consider an appointment on a commission an office within the meaning of the Constitution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Constitution provides that no Member of Congress shall be appointed to any office of emolument or profit, as I recall.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are now serving on a commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They have simply been appointed by the President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly; and that is all the President is going to do under this bill—appoint the members of the commission.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And the President has a perfect right to appoint them to any place he sees fit.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Has not the President the right to appoint Members of Congress on a commission to which no salary is attached.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The President may have the right to appoint anybody he chooses as his representative to negotiate treaties. Such representatives are not officers of the United States at all.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is quite true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They hold no office.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is quite true, but does the Senator hold that under the terms of this bill the President can not appoint a Member of Congress to act on the proposed commission because such action on the part of the President would be violative of the principle of the Constitution which the Senator from Montana has in mind?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know what else the Constitution means when it expressly provides that no Member of Congress shall be appointed to any office, as my recollection goes, of honor, profit, or emolument.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not recall that that is the language of the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the Constitution says that no Member of Congress shall be appointed to any office created during the term of his service.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Montana, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Indiana, as he appears to be informed to some extent as to the personnel of the proposed commission. I should like to know whether it is to be a nonpartisan commission?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, I suppose so, as nearly as a Republican commission could be nonpartisan. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Indiana will pardon me, I will call his attention to the provision of the Constitution, which is as follows:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. There is no inhibition there.

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

Does the Senator claim that this bill in providing for a commission creates an office.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What else is it, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not look upon it as an office in the sense implied in the constitutional provision.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How could it be otherwise than an office? Moreover, it is perfectly plain that it is an office because the appointments have to be confirmed by the Senate under the express provisions of the bill, which is in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution to the effect that the President "shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States."

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, in discussing this matter on a certain occasion the question arose as to the appointment of those who were to constitute the commission, and I know that at that time it was in the mind of the President to select either members of the Cabinet or Members of Congress or both—I should say "both" instead of "either," because under the very terms of the bill the Secretary of the Treasury shall be a member of the commission—but I must confess that it had not occurred to me at that time that there was any inhibition such as that now mentioned by the Senator from Montana, or that their selection would be obnoxious to the provision of the Constitution which has been cited. I am not now prepared to give an offhand curbstone opinion as to that question; I should have to examine it more closely.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I feel that the Senator from Minnesota may enlighten us on this subject, and I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that inasmuch as those who are to be appointed members of the commission are to be confirmed by the Senate that question can be raised when the nominations are sent in. There is no occasion to raise it now. When the President sends in the names that is the time to raise the question that the Senator from Montana raises as to whether these men are competent to serve under the Constitution. It is not involved here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no doubt the men will be competent, but we are trying to find out just exactly why a provision for salaries for these men has been left out. It has always been regarded as the policy of this country, differing from that of other countries, that the public servants, particularly the Members of Congress, ought to be paid. In some other countries the members of legislative bodies are not paid, and consequently men of small means or of moderate incomes can not fill those places, and they are occupied by the gentry and those who are comparatively well-to-do.

We never have followed that policy in this country. Of course, during the war many people were invited to contribute their valuable services to the Government, and they came forward with a display of patriotism that ought to make us all proud of our citizenship as Americans; but when we are creating an office like this in time of peace I submit that we are disregarding the settled policy of our Government, founded, as I think, upon a firm basis, in not providing for the salaries of those appointed to place not holding official position.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana further yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me the Senator from Montana is taking a narrow and technical view. Until we know who the appointees are going to be, we can not determine the question of salary. Besides, that is a matter that is within the purview of the House of Representatives. Under our Budget system, I take it that they must initiate appropriations of this kind. The appropriation must come from them, and they can determine whether any of these appointees are to receive salaries.

Suppose the four men are members of the Cabinet, instead of being Members of the House of Representatives or Senators. Suppose they are members of the Cabinet, like the Secretary of the Treasury. In that case no salaries will be paid—nothing more, perhaps, than their expenses—if they do anything extra; and until the question comes up as to who the members of this commission are to be, we shall not be in a position to determine the question of salary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to say to the Senator that it would be very easy to provide that if persons now drawing salaries from the Government are appointed no additional salaries shall be paid to them under this bill, but that is neither here nor there. Of course, when the appointments come here we will know about them; we will know who they are; but in the meanwhile the point I am making is that probably no man except a man of great wealth or a man who is particularly well to do can afford to give away his time, so that the nominees must be restricted to that class of people.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if there are no further amendments, I offer the substitute which I send to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska proposes an amendment, in the nature of a substitute, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert the following words:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to refund or convert the principal and interest of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration) arising out of the World War into bonds of such foreign Government in accordance with the law providing for the loaning of money to such foreign Government in force at the time such obligation was incurred.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope I may have the attention of Senators while I briefly address myself to the amendment I have offered.

It will be observed that this is a substitute. It strikes out the entire bill, and inserts, as far as the loans are concerned, what is now admitted and conceded to be the existing law, with the possible exception of the deferred interest.

During the war we passed several acts authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to loan money to other Governments that were our allies in the war, and the various acts under which those loans were authorized specifically provided what the terms should be. To sum it up in a word, they were to be on all fours the same as the obligations of our Government to our own people who bought our own bonds. In other words, foreign Governments were to be loaned money by the United States in the same way and on the same terms and under the same conditions that we borrowed money of our own people to prosecute the war. In fact, we borrowed the money of the people of the United States in order that we might loan it to England and France and the other allies to which we did loan money during the war.

Mr. President, when these Governments accepted this money it is my contention that an existing contract was acted on by both Governments, and that contract consisted of the stipulations contained in the acts of Congress authorizing the loaning of the money. Neither we nor any of the beneficiaries of these loans, these other Governments, have any right, either in law or in morals, to change that contract without the consent of the other party to the contract.

This money was loaned to the Governments. The law was not complied with; but we passed a second Liberty loan act, in which the omission of the Government authorities who had failed to comply with the law was remedied, and we recognized what had been done, so that I am not complaining of the disregard of the law itself, but the interest has not been paid. These loans have not been funded in accordance with the law and in accordance with the contract between our Government and the other Governments. I have contended all the time that no law was necessary as far as any of those loans were concerned. I do not believe now that any law is necessary, either as to the principal or as to the interest.

It was said, however, when this bill was brought in by the Senator from Indiana, representing the committee, that he agreed with me that as far as the loans themselves are concerned the Secretary has the authority now to refund them into long-time bonds. In fact, I think he not only has the authority but it has been his duty all this time to do it; but he said the Secretary of the Treasury did not think he had authority to refund the unpaid interest, so I included in this substitute a provision giving him the authority to include the interest. In answer to a question propounded by me, the Senator from Indiana said that the idea of having a bill at all was to reenact the authority, so as to back up the Secretary of the Treasury with an act; that while he had the authority, in order that there might be no possible doubt about the matter, it was desired to reenact the law giving him again the authority.

That is just what I have attempted to do in this substitute. There were some other debts, comparatively small in amount as compared with the amount of money we loaned, that were included in the bill and that it is admitted the Secretary of the Treasury had no authority to refund into long-term bonds, so I included those, and I included them in the very language of the bill. That applies to obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration. I inserted it in exactly the same way that it was included and is included in the bill which the committee have brought in; and I have simply provided that all of this indebtedness, including our loans, both principal and interest, and the obligations that I have mentioned of the Grain Corporation and so forth shall be refunded into long-time loans, according to the law that existed at the time the obligation was incurred.

Mr. President, it seems to me that Congress ought not to go any further than that. That substitute, if enacted into law, will remove all doubts as to the authority and the right and the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury. It will remove all doubts that any one or any government may have as to our willingness to comply with the contract that we made at the time the money was loaned, so that it is honorable as well as legal. It gives complete authority to carry out the law, to make good our contract. We ought not to go further. We ought to remember that we are dealing now with $11,000,000,000, in round numbers, that was contributed by the people of the United States, by American citizens, many of them sacrificing the very necessaries of life to make those contributions. It is not our money. We have authorized the loaning of this trust fund to foreign Governments on certain conditions. They have accepted the money on those conditions, and until some one complains we ought not to enact a new law which in effect gives this commission something that in my judgment is entirely unnecessary, namely, unlimited authority to extend the time of payment of principal and interest, just so they do not extend it beyond 1947. They have the authority under the committee bill to say to these foreign Governments "You can give us bonds, due in 1947, upon which no interest will mature until 1947." They can extend it; they can handle it in any way they please.

Mr. President, the other Governments have not asked it. No Government, so far as we have any knowledge—and I have tried to find out about it—has yet said they could not pay this interest. There is no doubt on earth but what during all this time Great Britain could have paid her interest; France could have paid her interest, and I think Italy could have paid hers. They have paid their interest to their bondholders, the same as we have, and the amount they would have had to pay as interest in addition had they paid interest to us would have been comparatively small.

They say some of these Governments will not be able to pay interest for two or three years, that some will not be able to pay semiannually. They did not say so when they took the money. They have not said so yet. Why not carry out the contract we have entered into with our debtors if we can, and if any one of them is unable to pay the interest, if they need more time, they will say so, and if they can give any reasonable excuse for an extension of the time, then there will be no doubt whatever about Congress readily and cheerfully granting it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to call attention to some of the weaknesses of the amendment which the Senator from Nebraska has just introduced and spoken upon.

One is that he includes in the agreement obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration arising out of the World War, and then he also provides that they are to be converted into bonds of such foreign Governments in accordance with the law providing for the loaning of money to such foreign Governments in force at the time such obligation is incurred.

What law was there in force at that time in relation to the interest, for instance, which was to be collected upon the United States Grain Corporation's debts, upon the advances made by the War Department, or the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration? There is not a word about interest. Neither is there a word about the time in which it could be paid. It was really a cash proposition, but, of course, it was understood that we did not have the cash, and all there could be would be an obligation which would be settled in some way before we finally disposed of the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator have any doubt but that this amendment, if enacted into law, would give authority, the same as the bill does in that respect, to take long-time bonds for the various items the Senator has mentioned?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it would not, because it says, "the law providing for the loaning of money to such foreign Governments." We loaned part of that money to those foreign Governments without any law with reference to what the interest should be. Therefore, so far as respects those particular loans, there is no law fixing the time when they were to be paid, or the interest, and you might just as well say that we were to give them 40 years as to say that we were to give them the same number of years provided in the Liberty loan acts.

Nor is that all, Mr. President. I will not have time to read all of the Liberty loan acts bearing upon this particular subject, but I call attention to some of the provisions in relation to the conversion. I will go back to the beginning:

And containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine, or to make advances to or for the account of any such foreign Governments and to receive such obligations at par for the amount of any such advances, but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which, at the time of the acquisition thereof, shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, and any such obligations shall contain such provisions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine—for the conversion of a proportionate part of such obligations into obligations bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest.

If we loaned $2,500,729,824.56 to Governments under the first Liberty loan act, and then, say, one-third or one-fourth of that Liberty loan issue was converted into the higher bonds, then only that proportionate part of the indebtedness would bear the interest of the higher bonds; and if three-fourths of the first Liberty loan 3½ per cent bonds were converted into 4½ per cent bonds, only three-fourths of the indebtedness owing to us, paid out of the first Liberty bonds, would be converted into the higher rates of interest.

Senators can easily see that instead of arranging to have all of these bonds bear the same rate of interest, as we propose in this bill, we would have to divide and subdivide the several loans until we could determine just what proportion, up to the present time, has been converted from the bonds issued under one act to the bonds issued under another act, and from the lower to the higher rates of interest, and then divide the obligations up accordingly in fixing the several rates of interest.

I think, in the interest of simplicity, we should not attempt that division.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I do not know of a more simple method of procedure in this matter than to require these five commissioners to report their recommendations back to Congress. There is not a thing complicated about that. It is not hard to understand at all. Just simply say to these men, who are to be appointed by the President, that when they come to some conclusion about this thing they shall then submit their conclusion back to Congress for its approval or disapproval. That seems very simple to me.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] seeks to confine the handling of this indebtedness to the provisions of the law as they now exist. Those provisions require that these foreign countries shall pay the same rate of interest which we pay in this country; and I want to ask what would be more simple and straightforward and to the point than to say that foreign countries shall pay to us exactly the same rate of interest that we must pay here at home?

When did we get the right to be so generous with foreign countries when we are not able to be just to the people of our own country? How does it become us to undertake to say to the five commissioners, "We lodge in your hands the absolute power to do as you please with this great question," when we refuse to do justice by 500,000 ex-soldiers out of employment in the United States?

Ill does it become Senators to take such a position, when we stand here and vote to take the taxes off of the profiteers of this country, to now undertake to vote into the hands of five men absolute power in handling $11,000,000,000 and the postponing of the payment of the interest upon it for years and years to come. Senators, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is right. There is going to be scandal connected with this thing. You can not get away from that. The American people are not going to submit to it; they should not submit to it. They should not permit this branch of Congress to take away from the representatives of the American people—435 in the other branch, 96 in this body—the right to say whether or not we approve the judgment of five men to be appointed by the President in handling a foreign indebtedness of $11,000,000,000.

We were told a little while ago by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], "Oh, they have to be confirmed by the Senate." I said then, and I repeat here, "Yes; and when I saw the Senate approve the sale of a seat in this body, when I saw it confirm the sale of a seat that had been bought upon the auction block in Michigan, there certainly will be no doubt about you getting your five commissioners confirmed." These commissioners will, I fear, be closely identified with the Wall Street interests that hold the obligations of the same foreign countries to the extent of $5,000,000,000.

Well, Mr. President, the only thing that we can do is to protest against these outrageous performances and call the attention of the people to the fact that predatory interests are rampant with power in this Republican Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The roll will be called.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. MCKELLAR (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer that I made before, I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to the absence of my pair, I refrain from voting.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former vote as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], which I transfer to the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (after having voted in the negative). Has the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has not voted.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is paired with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 42, as follows:

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk, and I ask the Secretary to read the last section of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read the last section.

Mr. SIMMONS's entire amendment was, to add after section 5 of the bill:

SEC. 1508. That after computing the amount of payment to be made to the veteran under any one of the plans enumerated in section 1502, or after using his adjusted service pay as the basis for any computation under this title, there shall be deducted from the amount thus obtained the amount of any overpayment previously made in respect to the service of the veteran in the military or naval forces.

SEC. 1510. That no sum payable under this title to a veteran, or to his estate, or to any beneficiary named under Part III, shall be subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process.

PART II.—ADJUSTED SERVICE PAY.

SEC. 1520. That as used in this part—

The term "overseas service" means service on shore in Europe or Asia, exclusive of China, Japan, and the Philippine Islands; and service afloat, including the period from the date of embarkation for such service to the date of disembarkation on return from such service, both dates inclusive; and

The term "home service" means all service not overseas service.

SEC. 1521. That there shall be paid to any veteran, upon application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 and in addition to any other amounts due him in pursuance of law, the following sums for each day of active service, in excess of 60 days, in the military or naval forces of the United States after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, as shown by the service or other record of the veteran: $1.25 for each day of overseas service and $1 for each day of home service; but the amount payable to a veteran who performed no overseas service shall not exceed $500, and the amount payable to a veteran who performed any overseas service shall not exceed $625.

(2) Any individual holding a permanent or provisional commission or permanent or acting warrant in any branch of the military or naval forces for the period of service under such commission or warrant after the accrual of the right to pay thereunder;

(3) Any civilian officer or employee of any branch of the military or naval forces, contract surgeon, cadet of the United States Military Academy, midshipman, cadet of the Coast Guard, member of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, member of the Students' Army Training Corps (except an enlisted man detailed thereto), member of the United States Guards, member of a development battalion (except an officer or enlisted man detailed thereto), member of the United States Disciplinary Barrack Guard, Philippine Scouts, member of the Philippine Guard, member of the Philippine Constabulary, member of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, member of the National Guard of Hawaii, member of the insular force of the Navy, member of the Samoan native guard and band of the Navy, or Indian Scout—in each case for the period of service as such;

(4) Any individual entering the military or naval forces after November 11, 1918—for any period after such entrance;

(5) Any individual originally entering the service for special or limited service only—for the period of such special or limited service not overseas service;

(8) Any individual granted a farm or industrial furlough—for the period of such furlough;

(9) Any individual detailed for work on roads or other highway construction or repair work—for the period during which his pay was equalized to conform to the compensation paid to civilian employees in the same or like employment pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919;

(10) Any individual who has been absent from duty on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquors or from other misconduct—for the period of such absence; or

(11) Any individual who has been absent without proper authority for more than one day, or in confinement under sentence or awaiting trial and disposition of his case, if the trial resulted in conviction—for the period of such absence or confinement.

(b) The periods referred to in paragraphs (5) and (6) of subdivision (a) may be included in the case of any individual if and to the extent that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy jointly find that such service subjected such individual to exceptional hazard. A full statement of all action under this subdivision shall be included in the reports of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy required by section 1509.

(c) In computing the payments to any veteran under this part effect shall be given to all paragraphs of subdivision (a) which are applicable.

(d) If part of the service is overseas service and part is home service, the home service shall first be used in computing the 60 days' period referred to in section 1521.

(e) For the purpose of computing the 60 days' period referred to in section 1521, any period of service after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, in the military or naval forces in any capacity may be included, notwithstanding payment for such period, or a part thereof, is prohibited under the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section, except that the periods referred to in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subdivision (a) shall not be included.

(f) For the purpose of section 1521, in the case of members of the National Guard or of the National Guard Reserve called into service by the proclamation of the President dated July 3, 1917, the time of service between the date of call into the service as specified in such proclamation and August 5, 1917, both dates inclusive, shall be deemed to be active service in the military or naval forces of the United States.

SEC. 1523. (a) That the payments authorized by the provisions of this title shall be made in installments, beginning on the 1st day of July or January next succeeding the fifteenth day after the date of filing the application, but not before January 1, 1923, as follows: (1) If the total amount payable is $500 or over, in 10 equal quarterly installments; and (2) if the total amount payable is less than $500, in quarterly installments of $50; except that any installment necessary to complete the payments may be less than $50.

(b) If before the completion of the installment payments the veteran is separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions, or is discharged therefrom on account of his alienage, no further installments shall be paid. Payment shall be made by the Secretary of War if the veteran is serving in, or his last service was with, the military forces; and by the Secretary of the Navy, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the naval forces.

SEC. 1524. That if the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 for adjusted service pay and before receiving all the installment payments, the payments authorized by the provisions of this part shall be made to his estate.

SEC. 1525. That no right to adjusted service pay under the provisions of this part shall be assignable or serve as security for any loan. Any assignment or loan made in violation of the provisions of this section shall be held void. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall not pay the amount of adjusted service pay to any person other than the veteran or his estate or such representative of the veteran as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe.

PART III.—ADJUSTED SERVICE CERTIFICATES.

SEC. 1530. That the Secretary of the Treasury, upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 1504, is hereby directed to issue, without cost to the veteran designated therein, an adjusted service certificate (hereinafter in this part referred to as a "certificate") of a face value equal to the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran increased by 40 per cent, plus (2) interest thereon for 20 years at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually (such amount being approximately equal to three and thirty-eight one-hundredths times the adjusted service pay of the veteran). The certificate and all rights conferred under the provisions of this part shall take effect as of the 1st day of July or January next succeeding the date of filing the application, but not before January 1, 1923. The veteran shall name the beneficiary of the certificate and may from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, alter such beneficiary. The amount of the face value of the certificate shall be payable (1) to the veteran 20 years after it becomes effective or (2) upon the death of the veteran prior thereto to the beneficiary named; except that if such beneficiary dies before the veteran and no new beneficiary is named, or if the beneficiary in the first instance has not yet been named, the amount of the certificate shall be paid to the estate of the veteran.

SEC. 1531. That there is hereby established in the Treasury a revolving fund to be known as the "adjusted service certificate loan fund" (hereinafter in this part referred to as the "fund"). The Postmaster General is authorized to make loans out of such fund upon the certificate of any veteran. The amount of such loans to any one veteran outstanding at any one time shall not exceed—

(a) If the loan is made during the third to fifth years, inclusive, after the certificate becomes effective, 90 per cent of the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran, plus (2) interest thereon, from the date the certificate becomes effective to the time of the making of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually, or

(b) If the loan is made during the sixth to twentieth years, inclusive, after the certificate becomes effective, 80 per cent of the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran increased by 40 per cent, plus (2) interest thereon, from the date the certificate becomes effective to the time of the making of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually.

SEC. 1532. That moneys in the fund shall be available to make all loans upon certificates. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to set aside out of the fund such reserve moneys as may be required to make such loans, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to invest the remainder of the moneys in the fund in interest-bearing obligations of the United States. Such obligations may, at the discretion of the Secretary, be sold and the proceeds reinvested in other interest-bearing obligations of the United States and shall be sold and the proceeds made available for the purposes of the fund whenever the Postmaster General certifies that in his opinion further amounts are required for the purposes of the fund. Any moneys in such fund not deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purposes of this part shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 1533. That no loan shall be made upon any certificate within two years after the certificate becomes effective. Application for loans may be made to any postmaster of a first, second, or third class post office. The veteran shall give a note for the repayment of the loan upon an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual installments sufficient to cover (1) interest on the unpaid principal at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum and (2) such amount of the principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period not exceeding the life of the certificate. The veteran may, however, pay any or all installments of the principal previous to their due date. The Postmaster General shall by regulation prescribe the form of application and the duration, number, and amount of installments, and such other conditions as he deems advisable, of the loan. All payments in respect to the loan shall be made through a first, second, or third class post office. Any moneys received for the repayment of the loan shall be covered into the fund. Whenever the Postmaster General finds that the borrower is in arrears for more than two years in his installments upon the note or has violated any other conditions thereof, he shall certify such fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon declare the certificate of the borrower to be forfeited.

SEC. 1534. That no certificate issued or right conferred under the provisions of this part shall be negotiable or assignable or serve as security for a loan other than one made under the provisions of section 1531. Any loan made in violation of any provision of this section shall be held void. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury finds that any such certificate or right has been negotiated or assigned, or has served as security, in violation of a provision of this section, the rights of the veteran under this part shall be forfeited.

SEC. 1535. That in the case of the death of the borrower or the forfeiture of his certificate or rights under this part, any loan made upon the certificate and the note in respect thereto shall be deemed canceled. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon reimburse the Postmaster General for all unpaid installments upon any canceled loan; and in case such loan has been canceled as a result of the death of the borrower, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deduct the amount of such reimbursement from the amount of the face value of the certificate in respect to which the loan is made.

SEC. 1536. That any certificate issued under the provisions of this part shall have printed upon its face the conditions and terms upon which it is issued and to which it is subject.

SEC. 1537. That if the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 and before the certificate becomes effective, the amount of the adjusted service pay of the veteran shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to his estate.

PART IV.—VOCATIONAL TRAINING AID.

SEC. —. That the Federal Board for Vocational Education (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "board") upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 1504, is hereby directed to pay to the veteran designated therein (if he is not receiving the benefits of the vocational rehabilitation act, as amended) the sum of $1.75 for each day of his attendance (on or after Jan. 1, 1923), on a course of vocational training previously approved by the board as suitable for such veteran. Such payment shall be made without deduction for Sundays, holidays, or vacations not exceeding two weeks in duration, or for absence for other cause which the board deems justifiable; but the total payment shall not exceed 140 per cent of the amount of adjusted service pay which the veteran would be entitled to receive if he had chosen that plan.

Payments under this section shall be made monthly, or at more frequent intervals, as the board may determine generally or in special cases.

SEC. 1541. That the board shall establish such regulations as will insure the regular attendance of the veteran on his course of training, and no sum or sums shall be payable under this part unless the board has been furnished proof of such regular attendance. For each day of unjustifiable absence the veteran shall forfeit the sum payable for that day, and shall receive no reimbursement for it in any other form.

SEC. 1542. (a) That if the payment under section 1540 plus the amounts forfeited under section 1541 is less than 140 per cent of the adjusted service pay, either by reason of the duration of the course approved or by reason of the veteran's discontinuing, with the approval of the board, his attendance on his course of training, he shall be entitled to receive an amount equal to the difference between (1) his adjusted service pay and (2) that proportion thereof which the payments made or accrued under section 1540 plus the amounts forfeited under section 1541 bear to 140 per cent of his adjusted service pay: Provided, That from the amount thus computed there shall be deducted an amount equal to the sums forfeited under section 1541.

(b) Such amount shall be paid to him by the board in such installments and at such times as will place him upon the same basis as if he had originally chosen to receive adjusted service pay as provided in Part II.

SEC. 1543. That if before the completion of the payments under this part the veteran is separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions, or is discharged therefrom on account of his alienage, no further payments shall be made under this part.

SEC. 1544. (a) That if the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 and before any payments have been made or have accrued under this title, the amount of the adjusted service pay of the veteran shall be paid by the board to his estate.

(b) If the veteran dies, after the course of training has begun, his estate shall be paid by the board the same amount as would have been paid to the veteran under subdivision (a) of section 1542, treating for such purposes the date of his death as the date of discontinuance of attendance on his course of training.

(c) The amounts payable under this section shall be payable in the same manner as provided in subdivision (b) of section 1542.

SEC. 1545. (a) That the board is hereby authorized to cooperate with State boards for vocational education in such manner as will secure their assistance in the approval of courses of training for veterans, and other assistance in carrying out the provisions of this part.

(b) Whenever any State provides funds for assistance to veterans in attendance upon approved courses or provides for free tuition in approved educational institutions, the board is authorized and directed to cooperate with the State board for vocational education of such State in securing the maximum educational opportunities to veterans entitled to the benefits of this part.

PART V.—FARM OR HOME AID.

SEC. 1550. That the Secretary of the Interior upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 1504, is hereby directed, on or after January 1, 1923, to pay to the veteran designated therein, in one payment or in installments, an amount equal to his adjusted service pay increased by 40 per cent.

Such payment shall be made for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of enabling the veteran to make improvements on a city or suburban home, or a farm not selected under Part VI, or to purchase or make payments on such a home or farm.

SEC. 1551. That no such payment shall be made unless and until the Secretary of the Interior has approved the purpose for which it is desired by the verteran, and has suitable assurance that the money will be expended for such purpose. The Secretary of the Interior may, at the option of the veteran, or on his own motion, make the payment directly to the vendor or other persons to whom such payment is due from the veteran.

SEC. 1552. That for the purpose of enabling him to pass upon the desirability of the investment he may make use of the services of land bank appraisers of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to be designated by such board.

SEC. 1553. (a) That if the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 for farm or home aid and before a contract has been entered into with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the amount of his adjusted service pay shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior to the estate of the veteran in such installments and at such times as will place the beneficiaries thereof upon the same basis as the veteran would have been if he had originally chosen to receive adjusted service pay as provided in Part II, but no such payment shall be made if the veteran has been separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions or discharged therefrom on account of his alienage.

(b) If before the veteran's death a contract has been entered into with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and payments under this part on such contract are still due, such payments shall be made by the Secretary of the Interior to the vendor or other person to whom such payments are due from the veteran.

PART VI.—LAND SETTLEMENT.

SEC. 1560. That on the opening of public or Indian lands to entry, or the restoration to entry of public lands theretofore withdrawn from entry, such opening or restoration shall, in the order therefor, provide for a period of not less than 60 days before the general opening of such lands to disposal, in which period veterans who have chosen the benefits of this part shall have a preferred right of entry under the homestead or desert land laws, if qualified thereunder, except as against prior existing valid settlement rights and as against preference rights conferred by existing laws or equitable claims subject to allowance and confirmation.

Such preference right for such period shall also be accorded on all reclamation projects now in existence or hereafter established, whether such reclamation is made by irrigation, drainage, or other method.

Upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 1504, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, there shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, on or after January 1, 1923, to the veteran designated therein, in one payment or in installments, an amount equal to his adjusted service pay increased by 40 per cent. Such payment shall be made for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of enabling the veteran to make payments in connection with the lands as to which preference has been given under this section, or for the improvement of any such land, and shall be made only if the Secretary of the Interior has suitable assurance that the money will be expended for such purpose.

PART VII.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

SEC. 1570. That the officers and boards having charge of the administration of any of the provisions of this title are authorized to appoint such officers, employees, and agents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and to make such expenditures for rent, furniture, office equipment, printing, binding, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, stationery, motor-propelled vehicles or trucks used for official purposes, traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4 for officers, agents, and other employees, for the purchase of reports and materials for publications, and for other contingent and miscellaneous expenses, as may be necessary efficiently to execute the purposes of this title and as may be provided for by the Congress from time to time. With the exception of such special experts as may be found necessary for the conduct of the work, all such appointments shall be made subject to the civil service laws, and preference shall, so far as practicable, be given to veterans.

SEC. 1571. That whoever knowingly makes any false or fraudulent statement of a material fact in any application, certificate, or document made under the provisions of Parts I, II, III, IV, V, or VI, or of any regulation made under any such part, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 1572. That there is hereby appropriated such amount as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title, to be paid out of, and to be a first charge upon, the interest received by the United States on obligations of foreign Governments. If at any time the amount of such interest is not sufficient to meet the appropriation hereby made, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue certificates of indebtedness under section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, to be redeemed, so far as practicable, out of interest payments on such obligations of foreign Governments, or, with the consent and approval of the President, to sell, with or without the indorsement of the United States, such of the bonds of foreign Governments then held by the United States as he may deem necessary and apply the proceeds as far as required to the payment of such deficiency.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope that the gentlemen's agreement, reached in the Republican conference among those who attended that conference, to vote against all amendments to the pending bill does not include the bonus amendment. That was not in the bill at the time, and it is a different subject. If we can have a fair expression of the Senate upon this question, unbiased by previous caucus committals, I have strong hopes that the amendment will be agreed to.

Of course, I can not under the rules detain the Senate long. I shall not undertake to discuss the merits of the bonus proposition. It has been fully discussed. So far as the country is concerned and so far as the ex-service men themselves are concerned, I think the main opposition to the measure has passed away. There has now come a crystallization of sentiment that this proposed legislation sooner or later must be adopted.

Mr. President, this question came before the Congress on the 20th day of May, 1920. It has been pending ever since. The Finance Committee, after mature deliberation, investigation, and hearings, reported the measure which I have just introduced as an amendment to the pending bill. This was done without any dissenting voice in the committee. It was before the Senate, and we were about to vote upon it. The consensus of opinion was that the vote would be overwhelmingly in favor of the measure. But the Secretary of the Treasury then issued his famous interview opposing the bonus and declaring that if it were adopted the large sum of money which would have to be paid would break the Treasury, and he at the same time insisted that the condition of the country was such that no additional taxation should be imposed upon the people.

The President came before the Senate and, while not opposing the bonus proposition, asked that it be recommitted to the committee upon the ground, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, that to enact it then would endanger the Treasury, and upon the further ground that the financial distress which existed among the people ought not to be increased by additional taxation even for so great a purpose.

The bill was recommitted with the assurance that there would be speedy action and some other method than that of taxation devised for the payment of the obligation. Nothing was ever done, however, in the committee.

When the revenue bill came before the Senate I offered the bonus proposition as an amendment to that bill and provided for payment out of the interest on our foreign loans, and provided that if that were not sufficient the balance should be paid by certificates of indebtedness to be redeemed by subsequent interest paid upon the obligations. That amendment was voted down, and, as I understood it at the time, voted down upon the suggestion that as that was a revenue bill, it was the desire of the majority that it should be continued a purely revenue bill, and that no extraneous matter should be attached to it. That was an excuse framed and accepted, as I understood it, by those on the other side of the Chamber as a sufficient justification for their votes in opposition to the amendment.

The bonus matter went back to sleep. Nothing further was done in the matter. Nothing further has been done about it to this good hour, and now I offer it again and offer it under different circumstances from those under which it was first offered. I offer it after a suggestion has been made by the White House, about which an authorized statement appeared in the press that a plan was seriously under consideration to pay the bonus by the sale of $4,000,000,000 of bonds that we would secure upon a settlement with Great Britain. It was made after I had assurances that this very refunding bill was being held up in the Committee on Finance, because it was seriously considering the advisability of providing both for the refunding and the bonus proposition. I had reason to believe that the former reason for recommitting and voting down the proposition had disappeared, and that in offering this amendment I was simply carrying out a thought and a purpose that existed in the mind of the President and in the mind of the committee. The committee, however, for some reason decided to postpone the matter and did not bring in a provision for the payment of the bonus out of the proceeds of the foreign debts due the United States or from any other source.

I now offer the amendment, Mr. President, and to the original proposition I propose to add that, with the approval of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be authorized to sell so many of the bonds due us from foreign Governments as may be necessary to pay any deficit that may exist after the interest has been exhausted.

Mr. President, what is the situation when that amendment comes here? Immediately a caucus is called between the majority leaders of this Chamber and those of the other branch of Congress, and that caucus decides that no action shall be taken in reference to the soldiers' bonus in connection with the funding bill, but that legislation looking to the payment of a bonus must be initiated in the House of Representatives. That is the excuse to be offered at this time for voting down the amendment which I now offer; that is the excuse which has been manufactured at the meeting of the majority leaders of the two bodies for postponing for the third time the consideration of this deserved legislation in behalf of the ex-soldiers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I speak upon the bill? I desire now to address myself to the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I raise the point of order that it has already been decided by the Chair that while an amendment is pending a Senator may not speak upon the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a very remarkable decision.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, and I ask that the Senator from North Carolina may address himself to my amendment. I will later address myself to the same amendment.

I offer an amendment to strike out Part VI of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, which is entitled "Land Settlement," and to substitute therefor Title VI, which is entitled "Land Settlement—National Veterans Settlement Board," as it appears in House bill 14157, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, commencing on page 23 of that bill and ending on page 35.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand that the Senator from Nevada is offering his amendment at this time?

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer the amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I think it is in order to perfect his amendment before it is acted upon.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I insist that, under the unanimous-consent agreement, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina will still be the same amendment, and that no Senator's time could be extended beyond the 10 minutes to speak upon an amendment by reason of another Senator proposing a slight change here and there in a pending amendment. If that could be done, of course, it would entirely nullify the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the amendment I have offered does not make merely a slight change, nor is it a subterfuge, a conclusion which might be drawn from the intimation of the Senator from North Dakota. It is an entire new provision. It deals with land settlement on projects to be created by the Government for the exclusive benefit of soldiers, and under a board to be composed of the Secretary of the Interior and four others, three of whom shall be soldiers or ex-service men. The amendment is an entirely different provision from that which I have moved to strike out.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, plainly the pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order which has been raised by the Senator from North Dakota. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has offered an additional amendment, which is in the nature of an amendment to the pending amendment, and on that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is technically entitled to speak for 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as I was stating when interrupted, the agreement entered into between the majority leaders of the two bodies to the effect that the bonus legislation should originate and be initiated in the House of Representatives is the excuse which it is now proposed to offer to the country for again voting down a proposition to pay the soldiers a just and fair compensation. In the light of the facts, that is one of the most remarkable propositions ever suggested in a legislative body. Where did the bonus bill originate? I hold in my hand the bill, almost word for word, as it passed the House of Representatives by an overwhelming majority some time, I believe, during the month of May or June of last year. That bill was introduced in the House after weeks and months of hearings in the Committee on Ways and Means of that body. I have here in my hand a volume containing the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means upon the bonus bill, which it is now said must be sent back to the House of Representatives, because that House is the proper body to originate the legislation. This volume comprises 700 pages of printed matter.

Not only that, Mr. President, but when the bonus bill came over here, the Senate Finance Committee devoted days and weeks to hearings upon it. The hearings of that committee I have here, and they comprise a volume of 140 pages. Now, it is announced in the public press that this matter must go back to the House of Representatives; that it must originate in the House; that that House must initiate the legislation, and it is further stated in the press that the other House is preparing to hold additional hearings upon the bonus bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. REED. I hand to the Senator from North Carolina Senate bill 506, being the adjusted compensation bonus bill which was introduced in the Senate by the Senator from North Dakota himself on April 12, 1921. It was an original bill introduced in the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. The original bill was introduced in the House in May, 1920, and it is now stated, by way of excuse for voting down this amendment, that that body is now to have additional hearings and is to originate legislation upon this subject.

Mr. REED. The answer to the excuse is that a similar bill was also introduced in the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I will get to that. The Senator from Missouri now hands me an original bill, I understand, which was introduced in the Senate.

Mr. REED. Yes; it is a Senate bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it is a Senate bill which was introduced in the Senate by Mr. MCCUMBER on April 12, 1921, subsequent to the time a similar bill was introduced in the House.

However, Mr. President, my point is that in the light of these facts, the excuse that the House must again take the bill up and again have hearings is a very flimsy one and is on a par with the other excuses that have been offered from time to time for not taking speedy action in behalf of this proposed legislation.

What is proposed by the House, Mr. President? Secretary Mellon said in his first statement that the people could not stand the taxes necessary to pay the bonus, while in his last statement he said that it will be absurd to apply the proceeds of the indebtedness due us from foreign Governments to the payment of it. How, then, are we to pay it, if we are not to pay it through taxes or by the sale of our foreign securities? Secretary Mellon seems to be the power that controls the Republican Party; he seems to be able to overrule the President of the United States and have his will. Why? Because Secretary Mellon, more distinctly than any other man in America to-day, represents the people who are opposed to this legislation because it would increase taxes and who are opposed to the use of the proceeds of our foreign obligations because that will take money out of the Treasury which otherwise might be used to reduce taxes.

How is it proposed to pay the bonus? What is the suggestion? Secretary Mellon now says that if it is to be paid it must be paid by taxation. What sort of taxation? Taxation in the nature of a sales tax, and I believe it has been suggested in the House that it should be by a tax of 3 cents a gallon upon gasoline. That will raise $1,500,000,000, and that is sufficient. That is Mr. FORDNEY's plan; that is doubtless the plan of the Secretary of the Treasury; but is it not evident that if we raise the money by a 3-cent tax upon each gallon of gasoline it will impose the whole burden of this bonus upon the producers and the consumers of gasoline? And yet, Mr. President, that proposition comes from a party that has been inveighing against and anathematizing the suggestion of class legislation.

Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong this discussion, but I wish to ask the representatives of the Republican Party, if they are unwilling to provide for paying the bonus by an increase of taxation, as they have said they are, and if they are unwilling to pay for it by the use of the proceeds of our foreign indebtedness—and they have said through Mr. Mellon that they are—how do they propose to pay it? Why have you waited so long? Did you not say to the soldiers of this country when you first sent the bill back to the pigeonhole of the Finance Committee that it should not sleep long, but would soon be revived? Yet if you have made any motion to revive it it was only the other day, when you were discussing the wisdom of attaching it to the funding bill. It is pertinent to the funding bill. You have said once that you would not pay it by taxation. You have said, through your President and through the sentiment that existed in the country, that you were willing to pay it in this way. If you are, why vote down this amendment?

If the amendment does not quite suit the Senator from North Dakota, if he thinks he can improve upon it—I mean that part of it with reference to raising the money—I shall be glad to accept any reasonable suggestion of amendment that he makes. If you want to extend this bounty to the soldiers, there is no reason under God's sun why we should not right now, without waiting another hour, so adjust the amendment I have offered with reference to the methods of payment as to meet the situation and the views of both sides of this Chamber and avoid the unseemly necessity of the Republican Party having again to say to the soldiers: "You must wait a while longer for your pay."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I had hoped, and the hope was very close to my heart, that any bill for compensation to the American soldiers would be looked upon as an American bill and not as a partisan proposition, and I regret that any Senator upon either side of the Chamber would attempt to make it a partisan question and talk Republicanism and Democracy upon a bill of this importance.

We fought the Great War as Americans. We voted the supplies as an American Congress. Our soldiers fought as American soldiers and not as Democrats or as Republicans. It seems to me, therefore, that if there is any one thing that we ought to do it is to dispose of that question as an American proposition without attempting to make this bill a football for some partisan advantage on either side of the Chamber.

Of course the Republican Party, as we all know, is in power in both branches of Congress and in the executive department, and therefore we, of course, recognize that that party must be responsible for any legislation that goes through or for the failure of any legislation; but do we not all agree that we will put through a soldiers' compensation bill? We all understand that the House conference has submitted the matter to the Ways and Means Committee to formulate a bill, and on that committee are both Democrats and Republicans.

When that bill comes over to the Senate it will be acted upon. I am absolutely certain that a soldiers' compensation bill will pass, and pass very soon, so it is not necessary that it be attached to a bill to which it has no reference and which we all know is entirely for another and a different purpose; and as our whole expectation and our hope is to put that bill through, and put it through very soon, why attempt to take time to attach it to this bill?

I think the administration—the President, if you see fit——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment, because I am afraid my 10 minutes will be up before I get through, and the Senator has taken 20 minutes. I think the President expects that the bill is to go through, and I think it is very proper for me to say at this time that he expects that provision will be made for its payment. He does not think it is certain that the pending bill can be gotten through and the matter settled in time so that the interest can begin to apply to this purpose, so he wants provision made that will take care by proper revenue of other necessary requirements of the bill for the first year at least, and possibly the second year.

Now, the Senator proposed to get the revenue in a certain way—that is, by applying interest if we get it, and, if we do not, by selling bonds. That is raising revenue, is it not? If we sell the bonds of a foreign country and use the funds, we are raising the revenue in that way. I have grave doubts as to whether the provision of the Constitution to the effect that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives is not violated when we raise the revenue by another system, because the law does not say "by taxation." It says, "bills for the purpose of raising revenue"; and while I would not want to speak absolutely on that question without further consideration, I desire to say that I doubt very much our constitutional right to originate the matter in the Senate.

The bill for compensation for the soldiers, however, is going through. The House committee is already considering the bill and considering the method of raising the revenue to meet it. Let us take the proper way of handling the subject, namely, through the House, bring it before the Senate, and concur in the House bill or make any amendments we see fit. We shall have time to do it; and we ought not to attempt to tie up that proposition to this bill, which is for the purpose of settling our foreign indebtedness.

I do not want to jeopardize the soldiers' compensation bill by any attempt to tie it up to another bill when I do not know whether or not that bill would receive the approval of the Executive if it were attached to it. I am certain that if we pass the bill through the Senate, as we certainly will, under the proper method of originating a bill which will raise revenue, it will receive the approval of the President, with whatever taxation we may attach to it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Dakota a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, in view of the statement made——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desired to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator has taken his seat, and I have been recognized.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was appealing to the Chair before the Senator from Indiana said anything.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Have I not been recognized?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, in view of the statement that has been made by the chairman of the committee, which we all know to be true, in view of the fact that everybody understands that a bonus bill is going to be passed within the near future, and in view of the fact that this debate is therefore purely of a dilatory and desultory character, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a point of order. The unanimous-consent agreement specifically gives every Senator 10 minutes on every amendment.

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But the unanimous-consent agreement does not prevent a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; but that was the very purpose of it, if the Senator will pardon me. Every Senator is guaranteed 10 minutes, or the unanimous-consent agreement could not have been obtained.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is not my construction of the unanimous-consent agreement. I think we have a right to move to lay any amendment on the table and prevent any Senator from having 10 minutes on this or any other question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if what the Senator from Arizona says were not true any Senator could make a speech on an amendment and then some other Senator could move to lay it on the table and cut off debate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the unanimous-consent agreement was made for the purpose of limiting debate, and not for the purpose of preventing debate. I have offered an amendment, and I am at least entitled to 10 minutes on my amendment. If unanimous-consent agreements are to be treated in this manner, it is obvious to every Senator here that the minority in this body will never again enter into a unanimous-consent agreement. We are bound at the present time to discuss the amendment before the Senate by reason of the unanimous-consent agreement. If it were not for the unanimous-consent agreement I might discuss any subject that I saw fit for any length of time.

It seems to me entirely unethical for the Senator from Indiana to induce the minority Senators to engage in an unanimous-consent agreement that limits them to 10 minutes on an amendment and 20 minutes on the bill, and then after that violate or attempt to violate the agreement by denying them the exact amount of time that it is agreed that they shall have, and the accomplishment is exactly the same. I think the Senator should withdraw his motion.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, clearly upon principle this motion is in order, and the unanimous-consent agreement certainly could not have been considered by any Senator as precluding a motion to lay upon the table. Fortunately, however, the Senate has passed upon this identical question; and if the Chair will refer to the first volume of the Precedents, upon page 549, under the heading "Not a violation of unanimous-consent agreement to lay amendments on the table," he will find the two precedents that I shall read.

In May, 1906, the bill for regulation of railroad rates being under consideration—

On motion by Mr. Tillman to lay on the table the amendment of Mr. Elkins, together with the other amendments proposed thereto,

An objection was raised to the motion being entertained as being a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement of April 30, limiting debate on amendments to 15 minutes until discussion thereon should be concluded.

The Vice President (Mr. Fairbanks) submitted the question to the Senate, Is the motion in order? Yeas 51, nays 29.

Which is exactly this case.

On May 14 of the same year, and while the same bill was under consideration, the question again came up:

On motion by Mr. Hale to lay the amendment on the table—

Mr. Bacon raised a point of order, viz, that a motion to lay an amendment on the table before the same has been discussed, or when a Senator has expressed a desire to debate it, is in violation of the unanimous-consent agreement of April 30, which declares that discussion upon amendments shall proceed under the 15-minute rule until discussion is concluded.

The Vice President (Mr. Fairbanks) stated that in the opinion of the Chair this question was settled by the Senate in its interpretation of the rule on the 8th instant, and decided that the motion to lay on the table was in order.

That, of course, is just as nearly like this question as any question could be; and, Mr. President, a unanimous-consent agreement with reference to limiting debate certainly on the merits, aside from these precedents, should not be considered or construed as setting aside a general rule of the Senate which makes a motion to lay upon the table in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is no doubt in my mind that they can take advantage of their agreement. There is hardly any unanimous-consent agreement which can not be violated. I think we might agree that a vote should be taken on or before a certain hour, and, if there were no limitation to the number of hours for debate, any Senator could take the floor and hold the floor until after the hour fixed and violate the agreement. I am not discussing the rule, I am discussing the ethics of the proposition. I ask the Senator from Indiana to withdraw his motion so that there might be an opportunity to explain an amendment which has been offered which has not been explained. I think any other course will be a violation of the ethics of this body; and I assure the Senator that if he does not withdraw the motion I shall object from now on to unanimous-consent agreements. The Senator may use his own judgment in the matter.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I want always to be good-natured and accede to requests made by my colleagues, but I do not intend to be flattered or coerced into receding from a position which I think is correct. I am absolutely satisfied as to the parliamentary situation. I believe that my motion is entirely in order, except that I want to modify it——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana is already speaking to a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator is debating the motion to table.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Not at all, because——

Mr. ROBINSON. A motion to table is not debatable, and under the rules of the Senate it must be determined without debate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. To that I agree; but the Senator from Nevada asked me a question, and I was simply trying to answer him.

Mr. ROBINSON. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I only want to modify my motion by moving to lay on the table the proposed amendment and the amendment to that amendment, and on that I insist.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there can not be any question, in my opinion, about the right of the Senator from Indiana to make a motion to lay on the table. I made the point of order, which the Chair, in my opinion, should have sustained, that the motion to table is not debatable. The Chair having declined to pass upon the point of order when it was made, I do not think there is any debate in order at this time. I should like to speak to the merits of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will rule in accordance with the former decision of the Senate, that it is not a violation of a unanimous-consent agreement to make a motion to lay an amendment on the table. The question is on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made before, I vote "yea."

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] and I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCORMICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). Under the arrangement I have with my pair, the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], I have a right to vote on this question, and I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer that I made on the former vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McKELLAR. Making the same announcement I have heretofore made as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL], and to state that if he were present and not paired he would vote "nay."

Mr. BROUSSARD. Under the arrangement I have with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] I have a right to vote on this question, and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 28, as follows:

So Mr. SIMMONS's amendment, together with Mr. PITTMAN'S amendment, was laid on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, having the floor, I presume I can hold it in spite of the motion to lay on the table.

I have no desire to take the 20 minutes allotted to me, but there are two or three things I want to say in regard to the amendment which has just been laid on the table. It is now something like a year and a half since we heard the statement made that our friends on the other side of the Chamber were going to put through a bonus bill "right away." All that they wanted was time to shape it up, and the cry was made then, as it was made to-day, that it was a shame to make a bonus bill a partisan measure.

Mr. President, if it is a partisan measure, or ever becomes a partisan measure, it will be because one party keeps postponing and the other keeps pushing. It will be because the great majority of the Republicans have insisted upon postponing the measure, and a great majority of the Democrats have insisted upon passing it. It will be because a Republican Secretary of the Treasury has been fighting the bill from its inception. It will be because a Republican President ordered the bill back to the committee at the request, if not the command, of his Republican Secretary of the Treasury. It will be because there were not enough Democratic votes, plus the 8 or 10 Republicans who have been voting their convictions upon this question, regardless of party action or party whip, to force the measure through.

Now we are told that the matter is again being considered in the House. We were told by the chairman of the Finance Committee, when the bill was referred back to that committee, that it would receive all proper and speedy consideration. That, if I recall correctly, was six or eight months ago. The bill has slept a long sleep. We are now told that it is never to be brought out of the committee, but that a new measure is to be introduced in the House of Representatives. The former chairman of the Finance Committee whom we all regret, has gone to the great beyond, and still the bill sleeps.

There is one other proposition to which I wish to refer. We are told that the measure must originate in the House of Representatives. We are told that by the chairman of the committee, and that there would be grave doubts about its legality if it were to be originated in this body. Yet the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the pending bill is the bill introduced in the Senate by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] in substantially the same language. Here is the bill introduced by the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make one suggestion, which is that I had reference entirely to the matter of the funds to meet it.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes. Senate bill 506 was introduced in the Senate April 12, 1921. Before we can scarcely stop to think it will be a year since it was introduced. It was reported out of the committee on June 20, 1921. It was brought here as a substantive measure for the relief of the soldiers. It did not expressly carry an appropriation. In that respect and in that respect only is it distinguishable from the present bill. This statement was made at that time in the committee report:

> Without attempting the allotment of any prospective receipts, but merely as a suggestion of one means of meeting the obligations of this measure, the committee beg to remind the Senate that there will undoubtedly be funded into long-time bonds the debts due this country for money advanced our associates in the World War.

And now the Senator from North Carolina attempts to adopt that exact suggestion in a bill dealing with the funding of those debts, a bill which originated in the House of Representatives, and which has to do with the collection of that interest, and consequently the distribution of the interest can be dealt with in the same measure when it comes to the Senate.

No man will be permitted to hide behind that sort of a smoke screen. The Constitution has often been used for that purpose, but it will not be successfully used at this time. The cold fact of the matter is that this is another postponement, and it is a postponement made essentially at the dictation of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has stood with his back to the wall and a knife in each hand and one in his teeth, fighting this bonus measure from the first.

I do not think it ought to be a partisan measure. I do not think the present bill ought to be a partisan measure, but when a party determines that it will have no bonus, when a party determines that it will pass the refunding bill in the terms dictated by the Secretary of the Treasury, when it determines to do that by party vote and party action, although the members of the committee of that party sitting in committee resisted the very thing they are now attempting to put through—when that sort of thing is going on, measures become partisan because party lines are drawn by those who manage and control parties.

In all that I say I of course except the gallant Senators who have voted their sentiments, one of whom has to-day been removed from our midst to the bench, I presume because his conduct was so pleasing to the President that he saw nothing in the world to do but to advance him to a high judicial position. It is a thing I am glad occurred, but sorry. I am glad for the judiciary but sorry for the Senate.

There is one other thing to which I wish to call attention: I am going back to discuss the question which would have been discussed awhile ago except for the limit on debate. I refer to the claim that there was no reason for the amendment proposing to limit the authority to pay out more money under the Liberty loan act. We were cited to the fact that in the case of Liberia the credit had been withdrawn. When was it withdrawn? It was withdrawn on November 4, 1921, about six months after the Secretary of the Treasury had appeared before the committee and his attention had been sharply challenged to this commitment; and, moreover, six months after he had failed to make a direct statement upon the matter.

But let us see as to the broader question where we are: We are told there is no necessity for placing any limitation upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out further money or to limit his authority to juggle this indebtedness between different countries. Mr. President, the present Secretary of the Treasury has already done that thing.

As preliminary to what I was about to say, I call attention to the fact that when the bill was first presented by the Secretary of the Treasury it was so drawn that he could have accepted German bonds in lieu of Belgian bonds. He could have accepted in lieu of Italian or English indebtedness the bonds of Germany or the bonds of Czechoslovakia, or the bonds of any other of the countries with unpronounceable names. It was his purpose so to do, and he has already done it. What he would have done if we had not put some bridle upon him in this bill, God and himself only know.

I read from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, but which was written at a much later date:

The balance of the credit of $34,921,192.73 in favor of Italy was extended for the purpose of enabling the Italian Government to make such reimbursements in dollars to the British Government as should be found due.

That is to say, Italy owes Great Britain over $34,000,000 and we extended the credits to Italy in order to enable Italy to pay Great Britain.

I continue reading:

In the purchase of certain classes of commodities in this country for war purposes, and in certain other transactions in connection with the war, the British Government acted for France and Italy, who periodically reimbursed the British Government out of the proceeds of advances from the United States Treasury. In settling these accounts, which must be extended over many months, it was found that the amount of reimbursements still to be made by the Italian Government to the British Government was $16,695,063.91, and that the French Government had overpaid the British Government in excess of this amount. On March 20, 1921, an advance of $16,695,063.91 was made to Italy for the purpose of making said reimbursement to the British Government. The indebtedness of Italy to the United States Government was increased by this amount.

In other words, we take Italy instead of Great Britain as our debtor. We swap accounts, exactly the thing that was intended to be done under this bill.

I continue reading:

In accordance with an agreement, the British Government, at the time of the advance of said sum of $16,695,063.91 to the Italian Government, simultaneously paid a like sum to the Secretary of the Treasury to be applied upon obligations of the French Government held by the United States. As a result of this application the indebtedness of France to the United States Government was reduced in a like amount, by applying $15,265,504.26 as a payment on account of the principal of the obligations of the French Government held by the United States and $1,429,559.65 as a payment of the accrued interest to the date of payment on said sum of $15,265,504.26. It will be noted that in carrying out this transaction no funds passed out of the United States Treasury, but that its effect was to adjust accounts as between the United States, the Italian, the French, and the British Governments.

But the difference to us was that instead of having France or Great Britain for our debtor, we got Italy for our debtor. That has been done since the war was long over. That is the very power the Secretary of the Treasury is asking to-day. That is exactly what he intended to do under the bill, and in so far as we have limited him we have merely balked him in his purpose.

Then states the Secretary of the Treasury:

The remaining $18,226,128.82 of the balance of credit in favor of the Italian Government, above mentioned, was withdrawn on March 30, 1921.

There is also clearly indicated here that there may be further sums demanded by Czechoslovakia.

I call attention to this statement:

The credits in favor of Greece were established pursuant to a special agreement made early in 1918, under which the United States, Great Britain, and France undertook to lend to the Greek Government for specified purposes, in equal shares in their respective currencies, up to the equivalent of 250,000,000 francs each. It is not contemplated that any advances will be made on this account by the United States.

But I understand that large advances have been made in the past, and that they were made to purchase arms for Greece, and that Italy and France refused to carry out their part of the agreement.

So when we talk about intrusting these powers to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has already proceeded in this way, who has seen fit to substitute Italy as our debtor where Great Britain was our debtor, and who has engaged in similar operations with France, when we already have that sort of thing before us, as sensible men we ought to place limitations upon the power of such a man.

Mr. President, nothing I have said will change a vote. I am well aware of that. We are all well aware of it. All we can do is to stand here and protest. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, that this thing, which is already consummate in agreement, shall be wrought out by the Republican vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] a little while ago, in giving a reason why this matter should go back to the other House and be worked over again, said there was some doubt about our right to act upon it and to appropriate the money. I find upon examination of the bill which has passed the House that it did appropriate the money and that it provided how the money should be obtained. Of course, when the House sends a bill to us with an appropriation provided, the Senate may by amendment change the method provided in the appropriating section of the bill and appropriate the money in a different way if it sees fit. There can be no question about that. So there is nothing in the excuse which has been made by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, by reason of a violation of the spirit of the unanimous-consent agreement I was prevented from addressing myself to the amendment which I offered to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I asked the Senator who made the motion to table—which motion cuts off debate—to withdraw it, but he would not do so. The Senator making the motion knew well what both amendments were. He did not want the amendments debated.

My amendment which was tabled just now on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] embraced the land settlement provisions of House bill 14157, which passed the House of Representatives May 31, 1920. Now, let me see what the American Legion thinks of that amendment. I will read to the Senate a resolution which was passed by the executive committee and officers of the American Legion in convention assembled at Indianapolis on January 23, 1922. It is incorporated in a letter which is addressed to me:

MY DEAR SENATOR: The national legislative committee of the American Legion desires to call to your attention the following resolution, adopted at Indianapolis on January 20, 1922:

The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the question of adjustment of compensation for the men and women who served the country during the late World War was carefully considered by the American Legion in convention assembled at Minneapolis in 1919, Cleveland in 1920, and Kansas City in 1921; and

Whereas it was the almost unanimously expressed sentiment of these conventions that Congress should immediately enact legislation to equalize the economic handicap suffered by service men and women upon their return to civil life, such adjustment embodying the optional features—

1. Land settlement,
2. Home aid,
3. Insurance,
4. Vocational training,
5. Cash adjustment, all of which were incorporated in the so-called adjusted compensation bill, passed by the lower House of Congress in May, 1920; and

Whereas the press of the country has stated that the President and his Cabinet have expressed the belief that the bill should be considered and passed immediately: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the national officers and executive committeemen of the American Legion and the department commanders and adjutants in convention assembled in Indianapolis, Ind., on January 20 and 21, 1922, representing the full membership of the American Legion, do hereby commend the President and his Cabinet for the stand which they are now taking in recognizing the merits of the Legion's optional adjusted compensation bill as a constructive measure of prime importance, and now look forward with confidence to its immediate enactment into law by the present Congress.

Sincerely,

NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
DANIEL F. STECK, Chairman.
JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR, Vice Chairman.

The optional feature referred to in the resolution as No. 1, "Land settlement," is the amendment that I offered. It is the amendment that the American Legion has fought for at all times. It is the optional feature that passed through the other House almost by a unanimous vote; it is the optional feature that was recommended by the committee of this body and reported to the Senate by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] on February 28, 1921. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is, of course, well understood.

Mr. President, I want to read into the RECORD the unanimous-consent agreement in reference to the pending bill, because I intend to refer to it afterwards. I read from the calendar of this date as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that from and after 3 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, January 30, 1922, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes upon the bill H. R. 8762, an act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and, further, that at the conclusion of business of the Senate this day the Senate will take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday, January 30, 1922. [Jan. 25 (calendar day, Jan. 28), 1922.]

It can not be successfully contended, it can not be honestly contended, that it was not the intention of the Senators consenting to that agreement that each Senator should have the opportunity of making at least one speech on an amendment, and should be allowed to speak for at least 10 minutes. Do Senators suppose for one moment that it was the thought of any Member of the Senate that the numerous amendments of great importance which have been offered to this bill could be deprived of the benefit of debate? Yet under the stand taken by all of the Republican Senators, except the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], in sustaining the motion to table my amendment, which motion cuts off debate, it has been held that such an agreement does not insure an opportunity to speak for 10 minutes on any amendment. By that action the Senators on the other side have adopted a procedure which means that no Senator ever again dares to give consent to such an agreement as that.

They could move to table every amendment which has been offered to this bill, and as such a motion is not debatable they could absolutely shut off debate on every amendment, as they did cut off debate on the amendment intended to aid the ex-service men and women of this country.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield; yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think that the unanimous-consent agreement was intended by any Senator to extend any right of debate? Was it not a limitation?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly, it was a limitation.

Mr. LENROOT. And does not the Senator know that if there had been no unanimous-consent agreement a motion to lay every amendment on the table would have been in order and would have cut off debate?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; undoubtedly. But does the Senator suppose for one moment that the Senator from North Carolina would have ever helped to facilitate the passage of this bill by agreeing to the request for unanimous consent if he had thought it was the intention of Senators on the other side not to permit any debate upon his amendment? Does the Senator think for one moment that the Senator from Nevada would have ever accommodated the other side by giving his consent to this agreement if he had thought for one moment that it was not the intention to allow 10 minutes' debate on every amendment? No; because if we had not entered into any agreement we could have stood here and talked for hours if we desired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. If the agreement had not been entered into at all, debate could have been cut off on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina as well as on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, yes; but if we had not relied upon your word, we would have debated our amendments first and then offered them subsequently and let them then be killed by a motion to table, if that was the desire of the majority. In the future that is what I intend to do; I intend not to enter into any agreement on which such a construction can be placed as has been placed upon the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are now operating. There is not a Senator here but knew, and in his heart expected, that every Senator would be allowed to speak once on an amendment and for not longer than 10 minutes, but the majority party have resorted to a technical rule to violate that agreement, and they have done so because they are afraid to discuss the soldiers' cause here; they are afraid to talk about the delays which they have caused in connection with this much-desired legislation.

I have the utmost respect for those Senators who opposed the soldiers' bonus on principle; that is their right; but I have a different sentiment toward those Senators who cringe in their seats every time the bonus bill is mentioned because they have promised the soldiers for over three years that they were going to do something for them, and because they know in their hearts that they are not doing the right thing in not taking action on the measure now, and they have not done the right thing in not acting upon it in the past.

We have heard the same old song for three and a half years coming from the other side of the Chamber, "We want to pass a bonus bill; oh, yes; we are going to do it pretty soon." Away back yonder, when the House passed the bonus bill, nearly two years ago, and it came over here, when charges of delay were made on the floor of the Senate, we heard the same old song, "Give us a little time; we are going to pass it very soon." So, along in May, when it passed the House and came over here, and Senators on this side of the Chamber urged action on it, it was kept in the committee as long as it could be kept there, and then when it came out of the committee it was referred back to the committee. Again, on the day that the Republican Senators stultified themselves, when nearly all of the Republican majority bowed to the whip of Secretary Mellon and killed the bonus bill, as an excuse they said to the soldiers of the country, "Wait just a little while; we are going to give you a good bill." They have been deceiving the soldiers every hour during which they have ever discussed this bill, and in their hearts they know it. They have been corralled and cajoled and whipped into line by the Secretary of the Treasury and the great interests of this country, which are antagonistic to paying out any money except to the barons of Wall Street, and they know it. I tell Senators on the other side of the Chamber now that they can not cut off debate. It was a foolish, cowardly thing to move to table the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and it has not accomplished anything, and never will accomplish anything.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I will ask the Senator to wait a moment, please. I do not care to make a speech on this subject. There is no use in attempting to make a speech on any subject when all except three Senators on the other side will vote to close the brief 10 minutes of debate allowed under the unanimous-consent agreement on amendments which may be presented.

Cowardice is a thing that drives men to more misdeeds than all the criminal intent that is born in the lowest thug that ever skulked in the dark alleys of our great cities. When a man suffers from cowardice, when he trembles under the whip of his boss, God knows there is no opportunity to appeal to him with reason; sympathy for soldiers does not appeal to him; his mind is absolutely oblivious to the sufferings and hardships those men have undergone.

Senators on the other side now say a bill is being prepared in the House of Representatives, and they add "We are trying to find a way to supply the money." How do they propose to supply it? They talk about a sales tax, and I think they will attach a sales tax provision to the bill, because they know that this body overwhelmingly voted against the sales tax, and they will attach anything to it that they think will kill it; they will attach anything to it that they think will delay it for years and years. Oh, yes; they have been looking for something they can tie on to it that will give Senators an excuse to vote against it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada if he can give the Senate any estimate as to how long it will take to pass the next bill that comes to the Senate from the House?

Mr. PITTMAN. If it takes as long to pass the next bill as it did to pass the other bill that came over from the House, it will not be passed until about a week before the next presidential election. It will run about that length of time.

You Republicans know the condition of your calendar. You publish it in the papers. You have not come in with your tariff bill after months and months of dodging and ducking. You are coming in with it. Your leaders know that it is going to take you two or three months to discuss the hundreds of revolutionary items that are contained in it. As a matter of fact, it will take Senators on the other side three months to learn their own bill. How on earth can you expect Senators in this body to know anything about the bill when it has taken over a year for the members of the Finance Committee to find out where they stood on it? I do not know.

You have these treaties coming in, I suppose, unless you intend to duck the issue. You can not duck all the issues. You have been ducking the tariff issue now for months, but you will have to come through. You hoped that the Senate and the House would adjourn before you had to report that bill, but you have got to act soon; and you talk now, through the press, about your treaties possibly not coming up at this session. Why not? You will have to come in with those treaties, and you will have to debate them upon the floor of the Senate. You know now that you have enough business before Congress to keep Congress busy until away along in the middle of the summer, and you know in your hearts that you have not any intention of ever taking up for consideration and action any bill that will give any benefit to the ex-service men and women of this country.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has ably covered the point that I had in mind, and the one I had expected to ask him about.

When this unanimous-consent request was submitted by the other side, if any Senator on the other side had risen in his place and given notice that he reserved the right to move to lay upon the table any amendment that might be offered, the unanimous-consent agreement never would have been entered into. I do not believe that there is a Senator here who thinks it would have been. When a unanimous-consent agreement is made that debate shall be had, and that no Senator shall speak more than 10 minutes or more than 20 minutes, or whatever amount of time is allotted, it means that any Senator can have that much time if he wants it. That is what it means. If the English language means anything, the unanimous-consent agreement means that; and I submit, as does the Senator from Nevada, that it is not keeping faith with the Senate for any Senator to rise on the other side and move to cut off debate, and to take away from the Senate the proposition that is being discussed and lay it upon the table. It is not fair. It is not living up to the spirit of the unanimous-consent agreement. Not only that, Mr. President, but such a thing should never have been done on an occasion like this. When the Senator from North Carolina was seeking to provide by his amendment that the interest upon this foreign debt should be paid to the distressed ex-soldiers of the United States, the same side that voted to deny the American Congress the right to pass upon a settlement suggested by five commissioners to handle this $11,000,000,000 indebtedness stood for a proposition that put upon the table an amendment that sought to give relief and common justice to the ex-soldiers of the country.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	McLean	Sheppard
Borah	Gooding	McNary	Shields
Brandegee	Hale	Moses	Simmons
Broussard	Harreld	Nelson	Smoot
Bursum	Harris	Nicholson	Spencer

Fernald	McKellar	Reed	Watson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate for any great length of time; but I desire to say just a word regarding the press reports pertaining to the so-called bonus bill.

We have been informed that it is the purpose of the President and the administration to pass a bonus or an adjusted compensation bill which will embody some provision for raising revenue with which to make payments under the bill. I want to announce now that in my judgment the burdens of such a bill should be treated in precisely the same way as the burdens of any other obligation of this Government, and that I do not believe that the bonus bill or the adjusted compensation bill should be used as a means for foisting upon the people of this country obnoxious taxation laws; and yet that seems to be what is proposed. They are going to use this adjusted compensation bill as a means of raising revenue in a way which it is known would not be tolerated by this country if the money were to be used for any other purpose. I want to express now the thought that if the Government owes any debt to the ex-service men it should be treated in precisely the same way as any other indebtedness of the Government, and that there should not be coupled with it obnoxious provisions for the purpose of raising revenue; and I take it that that is the excuse which is offered here now for delay in the passage of this bill.

The chairman of the Finance Committee, in making his objections to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, undertook to suggest that the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina was a provision for raising revenue, and that it must originate in the House. I do not believe there is anything in the objection made by the Senator from North Dakota. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina was well within the rule and within the Constitution.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico to the fact that the amendment which I have offered was the House bill as revised by the Senate committee, and the bill that has been before the Senate all the time is the House bill. That bill provides an appropriation of money and provides the way of raising the money; so there can be no contention that this legislation did not originate in the House. There can be no contention that it is not now competent for the Senate to provide for an appropriation and the method of payment, because in the bill that is before us now the House provides an appropriation and the method of payment. The Senate has the right to amend any bill that comes from the House carrying an appropriation, providing a way of raising the money, by substituting a different amount of appropriation, or a different method for raising the money.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think the Senator from North Carolina is absolutely right in the views which he has expressed, and the objections raised to it, it seems to me, are urged for the purpose of conjuring up some excuse to prevent the passage of this legislation which has been before the Senate and which has been discussed time and again, and which we are assured will become a law at some time; but it is being held back, as I believe, for the purpose of attaching to it provisions for raising revenue which would be obnoxious, and giving it out to the country that those means for raising revenue would not have been provided except for such a laudable purpose.

I give notice now that such proceedings will not be tolerated, and will meet with the earnest protest of everybody who is honestly in favor of this adjusted compensation legislation. I do not believe you can camouflage the situation any longer, or that you can attach to it amendments which will meet with such condemnation as to defeat the entire measure.

In order that it may be distinctly understood, so far as I am concerned, that if there is an indebtedness due these men it should be paid out of the funds in the Treasury precisely as any other indebtedness is paid, I intend to propose an amendment to the bill, offering the adjusted compensation amendment precisely as it was offered by the Senator from North Carolina, except that I propose to change the last section of it so that there shall be no appropriation of the interest from the European indebtedness or no application of any specific fund whatever, but that it shall be passed as it was reported by the Senator from North Dakota from the Finance Committee and with an appropriation out of the Treasury to meet the expenses of the bill.

That is the only forward, open, and, it seems to me, frank and honest way to meet the situation. If you are not in favor of paying the ex-service men adjusted compensation, then you have a perfect right to vote against it; but I do not think you have any right to tack onto it a provision to raise money in a special way, laying a special burden upon the American people, or upon certain classes of them, for the purpose of paying it, and doing a thing which you would not suggest or propose if it were not coupled with a meritorious measure such as this.

So the amendment which I propose is the adjusted compensation bill, adding section 1572, as follows:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amount as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he does not know in advance that a motion will be promptly made on the other side to lay his amendment on the table? Three times the Senate has been offered an opportunity to put a soldiers' compensation measure on the statute books, to grant to these men what they have been asking, and what we have all said we are ready to give. Three times that bill has been throttled; three times a direct vote upon the proposition has been prevented by a resort to questionable legislative tactics.

Why have Senators on the other side done that? Why will they treat the Senator's amendment in the same way in which they treated mine a few moments ago, and in the same way they treated my amendment when I offered it as an amendment to the revenue bill? Because they know that they dare not permit this body to vote directly upon the question of an adjusted compensation act. Those who control legislation in this Chamber know that there are not Senators enough on the other side of the Chamber who will dare cast a direct vote against the adjusted compensation bill, taking into consideration the votes on this side for it, to defeat it. They do not intend that the legislation shall be passed, and they do not intend that an opportunity shall be given to the Senate to vote upon the question, whether it is for or against the soldiers' bonus.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I was of the opinion that the dire results just predicted by the Senator from North Carolina would occur, but I felt it to be my duty to present my views to the Senate and let the Senate act upon them. Some one on the other side of the Chamber may move to table the amendment if he wants to; they may vote against it if they want to; but I want it understood what my views are regarding such legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was interested in some of the observations of the Senator concerning the statements that are abroad to the effect that additional taxes are to be levied, and his objection, as I understand it, to the levying of any additional or special taxes. Does the Senator believe that the soldiers' bonus can be paid out of the current revenues of the Government?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I believe that if Congress says any payments shall be made out of the Treasury, Congress will take some means of providing the money; but what I wanted to impress was that it should not single out this indebtedness and pass special legislation to raise the revenue any more than it should pick out the indebtedness which we have authorized to be incurred for the support of the Army or the Navy or any other department of the Government. If this is a proper measure at all, it stands upon the same footing as any other indebtedness of our Government, if not on a higher plane, and I submit that no just reason can be given for singling out this indebtedness and imposing unjust, obnoxious, or class legislation for the purpose of raising money with which to meet it.

Why not provide the sales tax to pay the expenses of the Army and the Navy? Why not raise the revenue in a special way to pay the expenses of the Agricultural Department or any other department? If this is a just indebtedness, it is quite as just, and ought to be paid with as much ardor and with as much cheerfulness, as any other debt of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that the measure which he is now discussing before the Senate providing for the soldiers' bonus is one which received practically the unanimous support of the Finance Committee, and nobody has objected to it up to this date as a proper method of providing for that bonus.

Why not permit us to-day to adopt the amendment which the Senator has offered, pass the soldiers' bonus bill now, and put it on the statute books? Congress is in session. We have just commenced the session. We expect it to run well into the summer, and we have abundant time. Can we not, before the present session of Congress adjourns, provide a method for raising the money, if it is not in the Treasury now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield for a single question?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Could there be any method of keeping it from the knowledge of the people that whatever additional tax we impose is imposed for the purpose of paying the bonus?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I do not believe that the people of the country should or could draw any such distinction; but the provision for raising the additional money should not be added to this bill. Revise your revenue law and raise your money in a proper way, precisely as you raise additional funds to pay any other indebtedness of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would not every one know that it was done for the purpose of paying the bonus, and that if it were not for the bonus it would not be done?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have no objection to that if a measure for raising additional revenue can be passed upon its own merit. I have no objection to whatever means may be adopted for the purpose of raising additional revenue. If the means adopted should be investigated and should be approved as a proper method of raising revenue generally, all well and good. The fact that the money would be ultimately applied as well to this indebtedness would make no difference. It is true the necessity for the additional revenue might be occasioned by this bill; yet it would be raised in a way which the Congress would recognize as right and proper, and would not be tacked upon a meritorious measure simply because it could not pass in any other way. I think there is a broad distinction. Let the revenue law be revised. Let the revenue be provided which is necessary to pay all the expenses of the Government which the Congress shall say by legislation should be paid. Let the adjusted compensation bill be passed. Let it become a common charge upon the Treasury, and then let the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee revise the revenue law so as to raise additional revenue, the additional revenue not necessarily being for this specific purpose, but for the purpose of meeting the Budget of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, I offer this amendment and, as I said, any Senator may move to lay it on the table if he so desires, or we can take a vote upon the amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made before, I vote "nay."

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of New Mexico was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there are a number of merely formal amendments, just to correct the phraseology, to which I think there will be no objection.

The general term that is used in the law is "held by" and not "owing to." On page 2, line 2, I move to strike out the words "owing to" and insert "held by," so it will read, "held by the United States of America."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, strike out the words "owing to" and insert the words "held by."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the same page, line 11, after the word "or" and before the word "obligations" I move to insert the word "other," so that it will read, "or other obligations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. In line 23, before the word "obligations," I move to insert the word "other," so as to read, "any such bonds or other obligations."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SIMMONS. On the passage of the bill I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. JOHNSON's name was called). The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] was called from the Chamber about an hour ago. The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent, and I promised to take care of him with a pair if he had to be away. However, I understand that I can transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON], which I do, and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SWANSON]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. KING. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] on account of his duties in connection with the Disarmament Conference. So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes."

ASSOCIATIONS OF PRODUCERS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that that motion is so important that the Senator ought to give us a day's notice before moving the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I gave notice a week ago that I would call up the bill at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill which has just been passed and asked to have it made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS BY GUY D. GOFF.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a memorial address on "The Americanism of McKinley," which was recently delivered by Hon. Guy D. Goff, assistant to the Attorney General, at Niles, Ohio.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

MEMORIAL ADDRESS BY HON. GUY D. GOFF, ASSISTANT TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, ON THE AMERICANISM OF WILLIAM M'KINLEY, DELIVERED AT THE M'KINLEY BIRTHDAY EXERCISES, HELD IN NILES, OHIO, JANUARY 28, 1922.

"It is God's way. His will—not ours—be done." Thus in the noon of his manhood, resplendent in life, and reverential in death, honored of all men, William McKinley, with the hallowed accents of God on his lips, passed beyond the worship of friends and the calumny of foes. He died in the beautiful autumn, in the golden glow of his greatness, beloved by the brave, patient, nameless people—the real heroes of his State and his country. "He showed in his life how a citizen should live, and in his last hour taught us how a gentleman could die." His administration has taken its place in history, and under his magnificent initiation the United States is respected throughout the civilized world, because whether in Europe, Asia, or the islands of the sea, his policy—

President's Harding's policy—was and is that of justice and fair dealing in all international affairs.

Every epoch in history has its master mind, its man of destiny. Nature always keeps her great workmen for great crises. They have been marked by four great characteristics: Conviction, purpose, preparation, and patience. They have been men with ideas born of moral vision, men of action who dared to fight for the realization of their ideals, men who could work and wait. And so through the silent, solemn march of the centuries, fraught with conflict and with change, with strife and with peace, has come the imperishable fabric of democracy. Governments are not created, they grow out of the past. Constitutions are not struck off in a single convention; they are the slow, deliberative work of the ages. The fabric of human institutions is a texture that can be woven only in the loom of time.

Great deeds are the offsprings of great ideas. Thought is the most potent force in the world. Empires are never built until men dream them. As Carlyle said:

"Man carries under his hat a private theater wherein a greater drama is acted than is ever performed on the mimic stage, beginning and ending in eternity."

With all great men it is not so much what they intend to do but rather what the qualities of their natures impel them to do that determines their careers. The strength of this Nation depends on something greater than its Army and Navy. It rests on the sentiments and the ideals that inspire our people. This Nation to-day rests not on material achievements of men but on the homes of our country, where the privileges of citizenship are learned at the mother's knee, where love and generosity are made the maxims of youth, and where the family life is a miniature of the broader life of the world. The forces responsible for our development have been composite, the blending in one of the best in many races, and the Master Spirit that could ride the whirlwind and direct the storm has alone survived.

There have been marked differences between the sections of our country, due not only to the people who first made their homes here but largely to existing conditions. The God-fearing Puritan settled in New England that he might worship according to the dictates of his conscience. The cavalier made his home on Virginia's soil, and the blue-eyed Saxon, proud of his race and eager for liberty, marched daringly into the great Northwest, there to live and die unrestrained, save by the law of the sovereign people. The story is familiar, so familiar that it needs no repetition, that such were the men who early came to Ohio when she was but bare creation. And what rugged, splendid men they were. They were nature's kings, for the men and women of that day were possessed of a tireless energy, an undaunted spirit, a courage that achieved fine and marvelous results. They wrote their history upon the minds and breathed their power into the hearts of their fellow men. They read their Bible and prayed to their God. They lived clean, honorable, and manly lives. The children of such men inherited their father's grit and their mother's worth; the blending formed their characters and molded their lives. It instilled into them principles from which they have never wavered, by the light of which they have never feared to live. Each for himself confronted the problems of the hour, and in their solution developed the forces with which he was endowed. We can little appreciate their undertaking, and all it cost at such a time. We can follow them in fancy, look back and see them clearing the forest, building a home or a shrine where some loved one died, or hopefully moving on to where the voice of valor called. They left home and ease just as sweet as any we have or enjoy. They were made of sturdy stuff. They were great because they could serve, and their characters and habits some future historian, whether he do things with the pen or the brush, will lay as the corner stone of all that is lasting in this land of equality and equal opportunity, the home of all that is enduring of the democracy of Greece and Rome.

It has been said that Ohio has given the Nation men whose grasp on the ax handle of the pioneer was no firmer than their grasp on affairs of State. This is true, but back of it all was the heroism of the pioneer farmer, merchant, miner, and sailor struggling against unconquered nature with its setting of wild beasts and savage men. All of these obstacles they overcame. Nature was conquered with her own weapons. The wilderness gave way to the hamlet, villages sprang up everywhere. The measure of the country's growth was expansion, its limits the pioneer citizen extending the frontier. Thus upon the solid foundation of all that is durable and vital has come Ohio—the Empire State of the West. She early wrote into her creed the philosophy of liberty, equality, fraternity. There is nothing to add, nothing to retrench. They are the three steps of the supreme ladder. Liberty is right, equality is fact, fraternity is duty. All the man is there. These are and were the vital forces working beneath the surface of our American life.

But what is America? Emerson answers: "America is another word for opportunity." He also says: "It is not free institutions, it is not a Republic, it is not a democracy, that is the end—no—but only the means." This may not be a perfect Government, and simply because it can not reach a plane higher than the average plane of the people. And yet it is the best, the most equitable, and the most progressive civilization which it has ever been possible to establish.

At Cleveland, Ohio, July 4, 1894, at the dedication of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument, Mr. McKinley said:

"We are the freest Government on the face of the earth. Our strength rests in our patriotism. Anarchy flees before patriotism. Peace and order and security and liberty are safe so long as love of country burns in the hearts of the people. It should not be forgotten, however, that liberty does not mean lawlessness. Liberty to make our own laws does not give us license to break them. Liberty to make our own laws commands a duty to observe them ourselves and enforce obedience among all others within their jurisdiction. Liberty, my fellow citizens, is responsibility, and responsibility is duty, and that duty is to preserve the exceptional liberty we enjoy within the law and for the law and by the law."

But, after all, the important question is: What of you; what of me; what of us all? Will we measure up to the full stature of our responsibility? Can our country rely on us to do our full share of the task before us? Are we patriots to the core, or will our services be grudgingly and hesitatingly rendered? Are we truly freemen—or have we a sneaking, skulking, leaning toward the creed that despises the marriage vow, industrializes the virtue of women, and degrades the family life to the level of an African ape? Are we worthy of the land of the free, and are our homes the homes of the brave? These are the questions which everyone of us must answer.

Ohio stood for an independent statehood. She contained a people who demanded that society and justice should equalize and protect all that they had won from the wilderness. She stood for democracy militant, while she preached and practiced republicanism industrial. Such a people amid such conditions did necessarily bring forth a race strong, practical, and wedded to the gospel of labor, love, and activity. Such was Ohio January the 29th, 1843, when the gray light of a new-born day stole through the window of her soul in the birth of William McKinley. Patriotism and duty received him, courage and truth attended him. He belonged to the most crucial period of our history—the period when Abraham Lincoln wrote the New Testament of our independence in the emancipation proclamation. The securing of the Magna Charta was a great achievement, but the Magna Charta of man's freedom and equality was secured by our fathers, and while the price was high they paid it ungrudgingly, that this Union of States might become a nation and the greatest charter of human liberty be forever the heritage of the children of men.

In all American history there is no name that touches the heart like that of William McKinley. He was a rare combination of such admirable qualities, with so many claims upon our sympathies, that he stands absolutely without a parallel. He was the product of his conditions, and he typified always the aspirations of Ohio. He possessed an inborn might that elevated him to heights supreme. He ruled himself and called no man master. He was equipped with all the effective weapons of intellectual strife, and with such perfect speech that he commanded alike the applause of "applauded men" and waiting multitudes. He was a graduate of the remorseless school of experience, and he had little respect for mere formality. He thought truly upon every subject to which he turned his well-trained mind, and his eloquence has fed a Nation's hunger. He lived truly, and his life has become a noble creed. Nothing could buy the good faith that filled his heart. The granite fiber of his manhood stood in unbought majesty—true emblem of his character and his native land. He always did his best—the sublimest thing in the world—and went onward and upward without a change of purpose. Men with such qualities become the founders of government and the saviours of system and policies. Such men are leaders, not through the intrigue of craft and cunning or the power of wealth, rank, or family traditions, but from an innate and rightful sovereignty in human nature. His was a wonderful career. Wonderful because no obstacle, either defeat or apparent failure, retarded his onward and upward march. The Civil War interrupted his college course, and, though letters attracted him, he answered the call of duty, and at the age of 17 enlisted as a private in the Twenty-third Ohio Volunteers, and for 14 months, with a rifle on his shoulder, as a volunteer soldier of the Union, "not for himself but for his country," he engaged in many of the minor and major battles of the war. The war over, enriched by the lessons of experience, he returned to take his place and do his best to build up again. He possessed the tremendous forces of self-reliance, frugality, and progress. And in all he did and wherever he went he took with him all the rights of personal manhood and respect—serious, reverent respect—for the great problems of human life, because he had felt its pinch, suffered its tragedies, and lived its joys. His life at the bar was successful, and just as he was entering upon a great career in the profession he was called to the Congress of the United States. As a soldier, a lawyer, a statesman, as governor, and as President he was great in everything he did, because in every position he filled his life was full of study and thought. He was so faithful in little things that he was worthy to succeed in big things. Such unswerving loyalty was destined to play an important part in the sublimest period of his whole career.

It was my great privilege to know Mr. McKinley as an intimate family friend. He and my father were in the Union Army together, and Mrs. McKinley and my mother were schoolmates at the same seminary. I recall distinctly a day I spent with him at my father's home in Clarksburg, W. Va. We took a walk through the town and over the range of hills that surrounds the valley. He was stationed there during the war. It was an interesting ramble through the woods. He had completed his second term as governor of Ohio. He expected to be nominated for the Presidency, and of all men he had earned the right to indulge this hope. He, of all men, had been disciplined by the unpleasant and unprofitable experiences of life, and when prosperity and popularity came it was merely the tribute which a grateful people paid to him who had performed the labors and endured the fatigues of the journey. He spoke about his ambition, and the wonderful possibilities that were opening to the young men of the country, and especially to those who were moving West. I was then on my way to settle in Wisconsin. I recall further his affectionate regard for Gen. Tecumseh Sherman. He quoted him as saying that in all his experience with men he had come to the conclusion that it makes little difference where a man lives, whether in city, town, or hamlet, but it makes all the difference in the world how he lives. Then, in explanation, he shared with me some of his philosophical views. He said that the individual is always responsible for what he is and what he does; that he must have patience and do his very best wherever he may be placed; that the reason so many people fail is that they tire long before the real test comes—that they surrender to their imaginary fears. I remember this reflection: Every defeat is a victory, if you view it constructively; and that while ambition is becoming, we must never let it drive us or teach us to want what we can not have. He then impressed upon me that men make their places in life by the quality and character of the work they do; that if they show ability their enemies will harvest the crop and forgive their sins merely because they are capable of competent service. How true these reflections were and are. If a man becomes efficient, the world seeks him in response to its helplessness and its selfishness; it measures and selects him by the hard, cold standards—can he deliver the message and return with the answer?

It has been said that war had little attraction for a man like William McKinley. This is true, and yet war taught him this fact: That the men who contend on the field of battle are brave and worthy, or else they would not die for their convictions. When Mr. McKinley became President, it may be said with all candor that no President since Lincoln did so much to reunite the South into the friendly councils of the North as did he. At Atlanta, Ga., he said:

"The time has now come in the evolution of sentiment and feeling under the Providence of God when in the spirit of fraternity we should share with you in the care of the graves of the Confederate soldiers. * * *

"Reunited. One country again and one country forever! Proclaim it from the press and pulpit, teach it in the schools, write it across the skies. The world sees and feels it; it cheers every heart in North and South, and brightens the life of every American home. Let nothing ever stain it again."

At Montgomery, the first capital of the Confederacy, he said:

"The governor says he has nothing to take back. We have nothing to take back for having kept you in the Union. We are glad you did not go out—and you are glad you stayed in."

At the dedication of the great monument on Riverside Drive April 27, 1897, Mr. McKinley said:

"A great life, dedicated to the welfare of the Nation, here finds its earthly coronation. Even if this day lacked the impressiveness of ceremony and was devoid of pageantry, it would still be memorable, because it is the anniversary of the birth of the most famous and best beloved of American soldiers. * * *

"To-day his memory is held in equal esteem by those whom he led to victory, and by those who accepted his generous terms of peace. The veteran leaders of the Blue and Gray here meet not only to honor the name of Grant, but to testify to the living reality of a fraternal national spirit which has triumphed over the differences of the past and transcends the limitations of sectional lines."

In the House of Representatives on the 2d of April, 1886, he had this to say on arbitration:

"I believe, Mr. Chairman, in arbitration as in principle; I believe it should prevail in the settlement of international differences. It represents a higher civilization than the arbitrament of war. I believe it is in close accord with the best thought and sentiment of mankind; I believe it is the true way of settling differences between labor and capital: * * *."

Speaking before the Home Market Club, of Boston, on the 18th of February, 1899, on the future of the Philippines, Mr. McKinley said:

"No imperial designs lurk in the American mind. They are alien to American sentiment, thought, and purpose. Our prices, as principles, undergo no change under a tropical sun. They go with the flag. They are wrought in every one of its sacred folds and are inextinguishable in its shining stars. * * *

"I have no light or knowledge not common to my countrymen. I do not prophesy. The present is all-absorbing to me, but I can not bound my vision by the bloodstained trenches around Manila, where every red drop, whether from the veins of an American soldier or a misguided Filipino, is anguish to my heart; but by the broad range of future years, when that group of islands, under the impulse of the year just passed, shall become the gems and glories of those tropical seas; a land of plenty and of increasing possibilities; a people redeemed from savage indolence and habits, devoted to the arts of peace, in touch with the commerce and trade of all nations, enjoying the blessings of freedom, of civil and religious liberty, of education and of home, and whose children and children's children shall for ages hence bless the American Republic because it emancipated and redeemed their fatherland and set them in the pathway of the world's best civilization."

In an apostrophe to the American flag at Cleveland, July 4, 1894, he said:

"Is it any wonder that the old soldier loves the flag under whose folds he fought and for which his comrades shed so much blood? He loves it for what it is and for what it represents. It embodies the purposes and history of the Government itself. It records the achievements of its defenders upon land and sea. It heralds the heroism and sacrifices of our Revolutionary fathers who planted free government on this continent and dedicated it to liberty forever. It attests the struggles of our Army and the valor of our citizens in all the wars of the Republic. It has been sanctified by the blood of our best and our bravest. It records the achievements of Washington and the martyrdom of Lincoln. It has been bathed in the tears of a sorrowing people. It has been glorified in the hearts of a freedom-loving people, not only at home, but in every part of the world. Our flag expresses more than any other flag; it means more than any other national emblem. It expresses the will of a free people, and proclaims that they are supreme and that they acknowledge no earthly sovereign but themselves. It never was assaulted that thousands did not rise up to smite the assailant."

And on the 21st of April, 1900, at Carnegie Hall, New York City, in what is known as his missionary address, he said:

"I am glad of the opportunity to offer without stint my tribute of praise and respect to the missionary effort which has wrought such wonderful triumphs for civilizataion. * * *

"The noble, self-sacrificing, willing ministers of peace and good will should be classed with the world's heroes. Wielding the sword of the spirit, they have conquered ignorance and prejudice. They have been among the pioneers of civilization. They have illumined the darkness of idolatry and superstition with the light of intelligence and trust. They have been messengers of righteousness and love. They have braved disease and danger and death, and in their exile have suffered unspeakable hardships, but their noble spirits have never wavered."

The closing words in his last and greatest public speech, delivered in the city of Buffalo, September 5, 1901, embodied his political thought and outlined his policy:

"Let us ever remember that our interest is in accord, not conflict, and that our real eminence rests in the victories of peace, not those of war."

These words epitomize all that he lived for and tried to see adopted as the guiding principles of his country. He spoke of commerce, the Panama Canal, economics, trade wars, art, science, and philosophy. He recognized that our splendid "isolation is no longer possible or desirable"; that "the period of exclusiveness is past." He admonished that our capacity to produce had exceeded our markets, and that "only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have." And then, as though he was looking into the commercial present, he emphasized and stressed the self-evident fact that—

"We must encourage our merchant marine; we must have more ships. They must be under the American flag, built and manned and owned by Americans. These will not only be profitable in a commercial sense, they will be messengers of peace and amity wherever they go."

In his relations with Congress he was as sympathetic and generous as he was in his relations with his friends. He was natural and true in everything he did. In accepting the statue of Gen. Garfield, which was presented by Ohio and placed in Statuary Hall, Mr. McKinley said, January 19, 1896:

"He was brave and sagacious. He filled every part with intelligence and fidelity. Distinguished as was his military career, his most enduring fame, his highest renown, was earned in this House as a Representative of the people. Here he won his richest laurels. Here he was a leader and master, not by combination or scheming, not by chicanery or caucus, but by the force of his cultivated mind, his keen and far-seeing judgment, his unanswerable logic, his strength and power of speech, his thorough comprehension of the subject of legislation.

"In personal character he was clean and without reproach. As a citizen he loved his country and her institutions, and was proud of her progress and prosperity. As an orator he was exceptionally strong and gifted. As a soldier he stood abreast with the bravest and best of the citizen soldiery of the Republic. As a legislator his most enduring testimonial will be found in the records of Congress and the statutes of his country. As President he displayed moderation and wisdom."

How true in this description are the facts of his own life.

Mr. McKinley showed great foresight in the selection of his Cabinet. The country knows that the Cabinet constitutes the most important part of the administration. The gentlemen called upon must not only be men of high rank as statesmen, but they must be eminently fitted for the respective departments for which they are selected. It is a difficult task and one not to be envied. And yet, in the discharge of this duty he showed the same wonderful foresight that has characterized him in all of his public relations. It has been said that Mr. McKinley was a yielding man. He was deferential, but not yielding. He was deliberate and cautious, and his conclusions were meant to be judicial rather than popular. Those who knew him recognized that there was never a more fearless man than he, after he had proved in his own mind that his course was right. Let me cite the testimony of President Schurman, of Cornell University, who said:

"Strong as he was, and firm to the point of obstinacy, yet he was so deferential to the judgment of others, so willing to listen to everybody, so truly democratic in his search for truth and wisdom, that his very lack of dogmatic self-conceit and even the deliberateness of his methods were at first construed as signs of weakness, and in the early days of his presidency it was not uncommon criticism that he had no mind of his own.

"Never was there a greater mistake, as the men who came closest to him will universally testify. His Cabinet was made up of strong men, but the President dominated the Cabinet. He saw everybody, heard everybody, but followed nobody.

"Yet, somehow, he was the leader of all, and all fell into line and marched behind or beside him. He acquainted himself with all the facts of a given case, listened to all manner of advice from those who might be supposed to know all about it, even suffering fools gladly, and then reached a decision or adopted a policy of his own, which, being well considered, was sure to command general assent. It was his own views, yet it was the quintessence of the public mind. He was the greatest inductive philosopher who ever experimented with American politics, and it did not take the American people long to discover his method, or to show their appreciation of it."

In retrospect, his was a wonderful life, and he was a truly great philosopher. His belief taught him that God, in his plan of development, has appointed each man to walk forth in the world and find his alloted task, and then as a righteous warrior to meet the common enemy of the race. Frequently he saw his hopes fail, things the world holds dear fall from his grasp, yet he kept the faith and trusted self. He did not murmur nor lose confidence in man. He was patient when the world ignored him and calm and unspoiled when it brought him its praise. In the congressional campaign of 1882 he was returned to Congress by a very small majority. One of his Democratic confreres, referring to his meager majority, said:

"Your constituents do not seem to support you, Mr. McKinley."

His instant reply was worthy of the man:

"My fidelity to my constituents is not measured by the support they give me. I have convictions I would not surrender if a ten-thousand majority were entered against me."

He did his best and went onward without a change of purpose. He did not compromise with expediency, and he practiced always the principle that nothing can be politically right that is morally wrong. And so, when the hour and the man met in him, he lead the van and died as he had lived, an honored and trusting spirit, embalmed in the affections and indelibly stamped on the will of the whole American people. After he had finished what he had intended to accomplish, after he had stolen forth and done his beautiful work, he was willing to go into the shadow and great enough to seek the repose of the silence. In life William McKinley was obedient to the beckoning finger, and he struck his colors only to Eternity. How sublime the lesson, how exalted the sacrifice.

For whether on the scaffold high,
Or in the battle's van;
The fittest place where man can die
Is where he dies for man.

For what greater measure of praise can be given a man than to steal away honorably and quietly, and be remembered lovingly for what he has done? After all, he only is great who floods the world with a great affection—stirs it with a great thought, and shapes it to a great career. And how different with Napoleon on the barren shores of St. Helena. He found no satisfaction in his victories, or in his belief that the battle's glory justified the cruelty and carnage of war. He had lacked the moral strength to throw away ambition, and, too late, he learned that his creed, "Might makes right," could not bless his memory in the sight of man and God. And so he died, remembered for the evil he did—the good was interred with his bones.

It is worth a great deal in this life to catch such voices as McKinley's calling from the past and to hear the thunder of the unknown sea. His imperishable spirit and influence tell us that a nation is not worthy to be saved if in the hour of its travail it can not gather up the jewels of its manhood and go down into the conflict, however bloody and doubtful, resolved on measureless ruin or complete success. This country must harbor no pariahs. Mere profession of loyalty without acts of devoted patriotism is despicable hypocrisy. There must be no halting, no hesitating, no shrinking, no harking to a rotten public opinion. We must perform to the full measure. We must help the world back to happiness and peace, that fruitful effort and not a bolshevik blight may prevail. We can if we wish and if we will, for after all we are our father's sons, as we so gloriously proved when we were drawn into the World War. If we do not, because we wish not and will not, then let us confess our degeneracy and, like the lictors of old, clear the way, that ruin, death, rapine, and red-handed anarchy with torch and bomb may have their sway. But before we do it let us turn the martyred face of Lincoln to the wall, throw the sword of Grant into the sea, and write upon the flag that McKinley lived and died a lie. Charles Sumner said, "The true grandeur of nations is in those qualities which constitute the true greatness of the individual." William McKinley was the kind of man out of which to make a State. He was a man with a single face, a single eye, a single tongue. He could stand still and take the storm. He was afraid to kill but not to die. A man who has no patriotism can never be a good citizen. He is just so much flesh and his heart a muscle. He has no past for reverence nor future for reliance. McKinley and his generation were refined in the great crucible of war and schooled in the priceless lessons of American liberty. Not mere love of country, which is commonplace, not mere willingness to fight and die, which is sweet, but the mighty emotion of patriotism, which is love of home and country as the place of our birth or adoption, as the land where our fathers rest, the spot where the gentle and the brave of our blood and our race sleep their last hallowed sleep, until as immortals they awaken to the glories of the life to come.

Men to-day call hard names and resort to threats. They stab in secret with tongue and pen. They are not the men to make a State, and neither are they fit to be American citizens. There is to-day too much "fireside" criticism, too much insidious anarchy. It dwells apart in the seclusion of its own self-importance and would not soil its dainty fingers by contact with public affairs. Such people through envy and discontent attack in others the possession of those qualities which they lack themselves and which they covetously crave. They exclaim that the world is to be made safe for democracy, but they purposely shut their eyes to the fact that if their preachments be practiced democracy will not be safe for the world. Mankind is justified in seeking its rights, but not in seeking them blindly. There must be no betterment of class at the expense of humanity. Such an attitude is not only antidemocratic and vulgar, but it is fatal to society, to liberty, and to civilization. It is wrong—willfully and maliciously hurtful—for if one fact stands reflected in the mirror of time, it is the sincerity of character, the nobility of purpose, and the integrity of action of those whom a former generation thought well to excoriate and abuse.

McKinley was made of the stuff that makes democracy, and was trained with the discipline that shall preserve it. There was something about him, either his splendid intellect or his indomitable will, that fascinated men and bound them to him. He possessed the magic gift of touching and leading the minds of men. He came to the rescue in a great crisis and started the impulse that made us a world power. What he did was transacted on a stage of which all the world was spectator; what he said was transmitted in echoes that will never cease. What he was has an immortality that nothing can destroy.

Courage is not synonymous with leadership, although necessary to it. Learning, eloquence, courage, talent, and genius, altogether, do not make a leader. There is a great and glorious courage found least in those admired for bravery, and McKinley had it to a superlative degree. It is the courage that dares to do right in the face of scorn, rather than violate a duty or surrender a conviction. It is the courage of the soul, which was so conspicuously emphasized in his last speech. It was great, majestic, equable, coherent, and persuasively prophetic. Why was it great? Why was it lasting? It was great because it came from a heart overflowing with eloquent truth. It was lasting because it said with power the things that touched his hearers and will always move his readers. Eloquent as it is, it did not and could not express all that he felt. The spirit that attuned his heart and annointed his tongue with the grace of speech on that occasion is ineffable. As the poet so beautifully puts it:

I wonder if ever a song was sung
But the singer's heart sang sweeter;
I wonder if ever a rhyme was rung
But the thought surpassed the meter;
I wonder if ever a sculptor wrought
Till the cold stone echoed his ardent thought,
Or if ever a painter with light and shade
The dreams of his inmost mind portrayed.

In the afternoon of September 6, 1901, William McKinley faced death with fortitude and Christian serenity. He believed that death never comes too soon—if in defense of principles and country. He had found the truth, and for him who seeks and finds and loves the truth there is neither fear nor bondage in this or any other world. The assassin struck him as he extended the hand of generous and encouraging welcome. For a moment he stood erect, his head thrown back, as if lost in thought; but the mists were gathering about him. He was thinking of the most precious experiences of his life, of his wife, of his boyhood, of his country, and then, like the soldier he was, he gave his life to his country and his soul to God.

He lived and he died an American, and always he did his best, just where and as he was. Charity was the beautiful trait of his character. It enabled him to divine the opinions, the faults and the foibles of others, and to realize that men could differ from him and be just as honest as he himself. He gave to life the best he had and the best of the ages came back to his people. He was greater than a patriot. He was a genius consecrated to a purpose, and he will live in history's iron memory by the side of the world's seers, so long as personality asserts its charm and the human soul is in sympathy with its own. His memory is secure, and a grateful posterity will always cherish his name. He deserves a monument—he does not need it. His career will always remain an enduring monument of human purpose. His name will always warm the marble with the memories and the deeds that the world can never forget. Tears and glories will bathe its granite shaft, and all the sacrifices that were demanded and all the sorrow that was felt will exempt from oblivion the great truths for which he lived and died.

His life and the glory of his death are each an inspiration. His spirit tells us: That in the quiet, unassuming American will be found the same qualities of heroism, devotion, stability, and self-control as are found in those whose careers loom large to inspire the dreams of youth, and guide the steps of resolute manhood. It tells us that we are too indifferent; that from the clutch of the self-interested leader, we have fallen into the hands of the so-called reformer, equally self-interested, who tells us that the fault is with our system of Government, and that we need a new Constitution or perhaps none at all. It reminds us that the fault is not with our Constitution, but in the indifference of the average American absorbed in his own private affairs. It admonishes us—there is need of self-criticism, lest confusion may be mistaken for accomplishment. It tells us in no uncertain terms that it is our duty to substitute for the machinations of the wily reformer, the simple fact that loyalty to State and Nation demands explicit obedience to the voice of reason and conscience, and the constant discharge of the nearest duty without regard to the remote or the immediate wishes of any man or combination of men who for mutual self-interest ignobly seek success. It warns us that the war has brought many changes, and in every phase of life we shall meet new problems, not separate and detached conditions, but aspects of fundamental changes that have brought us to where we find ourselves to-day.

May I leave with you a picture and a thought. There in the shadow of history rise Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley, with truth as their watchword and eternal justice as their guide, facing peril and fearlessly taking their stand in the van, until their message, your message, democracy's message, "Let us have peace," becomes an everlasting psalm, a melody for those who live and feel that victory is but a power in trust. And there, incomparably splendid, with soul undaunted and eye undisturbed by doubt, amid the wreck of empires and the decay of civilizations, with the sword beaten into the red cross of mercy, and the spear a staff for the homeless and the weary, stand these United States of America, glowing like a mountain peak purpled by the rising sun, ministering to a tottering world, even as did the Prince of Peace minister to pagan sick humanity. And here with us, crowned and mitered by the hands of invisible consecration, dead at the post of duty, strong in every virtue, true to every trust, responsive to every demand, an ornament to his State, an inspiration to his Nation, stands him whom we honor to-night, the embodiment of all that is just, impartial, loving, and true in American liberty.

KNICKERBOCKER THEATER DISASTER.

Mr. CAPPER. I move that the resolution (S. Res. 229) submitted by me on yesterday and which is now on the calendar, having been reported yesterday afternoon from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, providing for an investigation of the Knickerbocker Theater disaster, be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee, I understand, will have a meeting to-morrow and will probably desire to make some changes in the wording of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, before action is taken upon the motion of the Senator from Kansas I desire to urge in connection with his motion that the Committee on the District of Columbia take up the question involved for consideration at an early date. I do not know whether that committee will determine to make the proposed investigation themselves, but, unless some other governmental agency in the District shall do so, I hope they will conduct a complete and thorough investigation. I think it is exceedingly important that a prompt inquiry should be made as to the cause of that terrible disaster.

I have taken the trouble to-day to make some inquiry, and I have found that the safety-load requirement for the roofs of buildings of the character of that theater is just about one-half of what it is in my own city of New York. The present building code in the District was adopted some years ago, before the era of great moving-picture theaters with a wide span between walls.

Consideration and revision of the building code ought to come within the purview of the investigation. It seems to me of great importance not only for the moment but for the future, and that we should set an example here in the District of Columbia by providing a building code which will insure, particularly in connection with the erection of buildings of public assembly, the safety of the people.

I might add in connection with this matter that I find that the man who passes upon plans for the great structures where thousands of people assemble every day is a young man—a fine young man, I may say—a recent graduate from college, whose salary is the munificent sum of $2,000 per annum. Furthermore, I find that in the District of Columbia for all of the field inspection work there are but five inspectors.

I think it is worth while for the Committee on the District of Columbia to inquire into all of these matters, with a view of placing the building code of the District of Columbia on a basis that will insure proper safeguards and protection to the lives of our people. Now that great theaters and other buildings where many people assemble are being erected, we ought to have a building code here which will insure the erection of buildings which may be used without any risk of having such a terrible accident again occur as that which shocked and horrified the city and the country at the Knickerbocker Theater on Saturday night. I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the resolution (S. 229) be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENT OF SENATOR KENYON.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this morning the President appointed one of our Members to a high judicial position—the highest in his gift, save a place upon the Supreme Court of the United States. The Senate paid to Senator KENYON the compliment of a rising unanimous vote of confirmation, without reference of the appointment to the committee which is usually charged with considering judicial appointments. Late as is the hour, I think we may pause a moment to pay our tribute to Senator KENYON.

His selection for this position under the circumstances may be taken as nothing but a recognition of his sterling integrity, his independence of character, and his devotion to public duty. He has been recognized in this body as one man who always placed the public interest above party service. He has pursued an independent course during the 10 years he has sat in this Chamber. I believe that it will be the unanimous verdict of his colleagues that at no time in his career has he varied from the straight line of duty as he saw it. I believe it will also be the unanimous verdict that with a rare devotion to principle, and rare and almost unexampled industry, he has labored to serve the State and the people of the State. I predict for him upon the bench a long and useful career. I am sure he will bring to the duties of the high office he assumes the same probity of character, the same independence of judgment, the same sentiment of love for humanity he has so often manifested upon the floor of this body. His separation from the Senate is a distinct loss which will be felt upon both sides of the Chamber; his elevation to the bench will, in my judgment, be fully justified by the career he will follow.

Mr. President, I wanted to say this much. We grow a little casehardened here with departures through elections, resignations, and deaths, but a man of Senator KENYON'S ability and Senator KENYON'S devotion to the public service in leaving the Senate ought at least to be entitled to a few words of just commendation.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the last offer which was made and approved by Mr. Ford on the 25th day of January, 1922, relative to the purchase of the plant at Muscle Shoals.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPOSAL OF HENRY FORD FOR THE COMPLETION AND LEASING OF THE DAMS AND HYDROELECTRIC POWER PLANTS AT MUSCLE SHOALS AND FOR THE PURCHASE OF NITRATE PLANT NO. 1, NITRATE PLANT NO. 2, THE WACO QUARRY, AND THE GORGAS WARRIOR RIVER STEAM PLANT, ALL IN THE STATE OF ALABAMA.

Whereas the United States, through the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, invited the undersigned to submit an offer for the power to be developed at the Muscle Shoals Wilson Dam (hereinafter referred to as Dam No. 2); and

Whereas the undersigned did, under date of July 8, 1921, submit to the Chief of Engineers an offer for the consideration of the President, the Secretary of War, and Congress, which offer proposed a lease based upon the completion of Dam No. 2, and the construction of Dam No. 3 (as designated by the U. S. Engineers in H. Doc. 1262, 64th Cong., 1st sess., and hereinafter referred to as Dam No. 3) and of their power houses, by the United States, and the payment by the undersigned of a fixed annual rental therefor, and proposed to purchase nitrate plant No. 1, at Sheffield, Ala.; nitrate plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Waco quarry, near Russellville, Ala.; and the Warrior steam plant, at Gorgas, Ala., and all transmission lines connected with said plants; and

Whereas the undersigned, at the invitation of the Secretary of War, did, on January 11, 1922, submit a modification of his former proposal, based upon the construction and completion by a company to be formed by him, of all the work referred to in the offer of July 8, 1921, aforesaid, the actual cost of said work to be borne by the United States, and agreed on behalf of said company to pay 4 per cent of the total actual cost of completing said plants, structures, works, and improvements as annual rental for the lease thereof.

Now therefore, in lieu of said offer of July 8, 1921, and in accordance with said modification of January 11, 1922, the undersigned hereby submits to the Secretary of War, and through him for appropriate action by the President and Congress, the following offer, which shall become a binding agreement upon approval of same by Congress:

1. For the purpose of carrying out the terms of this agreement the undersigned will form a corporation (hereinafter referred to as the company), to be controlled by the undersigned, which company will immediately enter into and execute all necessary or appropriate instruments of contract to effectuate this agreement.

2. The company shall complete for the United States the construction work on Dam No. 2, its locks, power house, and all necessary equipment, all in accordance with the plans and specifications prepared or to be prepared or approved by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and progressively install the hydroelectric equipment in said power house adequate for generating approximately 600,000 horsepower, all the work aforesaid to be performed as speedily as possible at actual cost and without profit to the company, it being understood that the necessary lands and flowage rights, including lands for railway and terminal connections, have been or will be acquired by the United States.

3. The company will lease from the United States Dam No. 2, its power house, and all of its hydroelectric and operating appurtenances, except the locks, together with all lands and buildings owned or to be acquired by the United States connected with or adjacent to either end of the said dam for a period of 100 years from the date when structures and equipment of a capacity of 100,000 horsepower are constructed and installed and ready for service, and will pay to the United States as annual rental therefor 4 per cent of the actual cost of acquiring lands and flowage rights and of completing the locks, dams, and power-house facilities (but not including expenditures and obligations incurred prior to approval of this proposal by Congress), payable annually at the end of each lease year, except that during and for the first six years of the lease period the rentals shall be in the following amounts and payable at the following times, to wit: Two hundred thousand dollars one year from the date when 100,000 horsepower is installed and ready for service and thereafter $200,000 annually at the end of each year for five years.

4. The company will further pay to the United States during the period of the lease of Dam No. 2 $35,000 annually, in installments quarterly in advance, for repairs, maintenance, and operation of Dam No. 2, its gates and locks, it being understood that all necessary repairs, maintenance, and operation thereof shall be under the direction, care, and responsibility of the United States during the said 100-year lease period, and the company at its own expense will make all necessary renewals and repairs incident to efficient maintenance of the power house, substructures, superstructures, machinery, and appliances appurtenant to said power house and will maintain the same in efficient operating condition.

5. At all times during the period of the lease of Dam No. 2 the company will furnish to the United States, free of charge, to be delivered at any point on the lock grounds designated by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, electric power to an amount necessary for the operation of the locks, but not in excess of 200 horsepower.

6. As soon as the release of suitable construction equipment and labor forces at Dam No. 2 will permit, or at an earlier date if desired by the company, the company shall construct and complete for the United States Dam No. 3, its lock, power house, and all necessary equipment, all in accordance with plans and specifications prepared and to be prepared by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, or by the company at its option, and approved by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and progressively install the hydroelectric equipment in said power house adequate for generating approximately 250,000 horsepower, all the work aforesaid to be performed as speedily as possible at actual cost and without profit to the company, it being understood that the necessary lands, flowage rights, and rights of way shall be acquired by the United States.

7. The company will lease from the United States Dam No. 3, its power house, and all of its hydroelectric, and operating appurtenances, except the lock, together with all lands and buildings owned or to be acquired by the United States connected with or adjacent to either end of the said dam, for a period of 100 years from the date when structures and equipment of a capacity of 80,000 horsepower are constructed and installed and ready for service, and will pay to the United States as annual rental therefor 4 per cent of the actual cost of constructing the lock, dam, and power house facilities, payable annually at the end of each lease year, except that during and for the first three years of the lease period the rentals shall be in the following amounts and payable at the following times, to wit: One hundred and sixty thousand dollars one year from the date when 80,000 horsepower is installed and ready for service, and thereafter $160,000 annually at the end of each year for two years.

8. The company will further pay to the United States during the period of the lease of Dam No. 3, $20,000 annually, in installments, quarterly in advance, for repairs, maintenance, and operation of Dam No. 3, its gates and locks, it being understood that all necessary repairs, maintenance, and operation thereof shall be under the direction, care, and responsibility of the United States during the said 100-year period; and the company at its own expense will make all necessary renewals and repairs incident to the efficient maintenance of the power house, substructures, superstructures, machinery, and appliances appurtenant to said power house, and will maintain the same in efficient operating condition.

9. At all times during the period of the lease of Dam No. 3 the company will furnish to the United States free of charge, to be delivered at any point on the lock grounds designated by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, electric power necessary for the operation of the said lock, but not in excess of 100 horsepower.

10. For the purpose of enabling the Government to create and provide a sinking fund to retire the cost of Dam No. 3 at the end of 100 years the company will at the beginning of the fourth year of the lease period and semiannually thereafter for the remaining term of the lease pay to the United States Government the sum of $3,505, and for the purpose of enabling the Government to create and provide a sinking fund to retire the cost of Dam No. 2 at the end of 100 years the company will at the beginning of the seventh year of the lease period and semiannually thereafter for the remaining term of the lease pay to the United States Government the sum of $19,868.

11. The company agrees to purchase from the United States and the United States will sell the following properties, namely:

(a) All the property constituting nitrate plant No. 2 (as officially known and designated), including lands, power plants, buildings, material, machinery, fixtures, equipment, apparatus, appurtenances, tools, and supplies, and the right, license, and privilege to use any and all of the patents, processes, methods, and designs which have been acquired and may be transferred or assigned to a purchaser of nitrate plant No. 2 by the United States, together with the sulphuric acid units now in storage on the premises.

(b) All of the property constituting nitrate plant No. 1 (as officially known and designated), including lands, power plants, buildings, material, machinery, fixtures, equipment, apparatus, appurtenances, tools, and supplies, and the right, license, and privilege to use any and all of the patents, processes, methods, and designs which have been acquired and may be transferred to a purchaser of nitrate plant No. 1 by the United States, but the company shall not be obligated to operate nitrate plant No. 1 as an air nitrogen fixation plant.

(c) All of the property constituting the Waco Quarry (as officially known and designated) including rights of way and buildings, material, quarry tracks, machinery, railroad tracks, appurtenances, tools, and supplies.

(d) All of the property constituting the steam-power plant, built and owned by the Government at Gorgas, Ala., on the Warrior River, including lands, rights of way, buildings, machinery, material, fixtures, apparatus, appurtenances, tools, and supplies, and the transmission line from the Gorgas steam plant to Nitrate Plant No. 2 at Muscle Shoals, and all other transmission lines belonging to the United States and connected with any of the aforesaid Government properties. The United States shall acquire all necessary easements or titles for right-of-way lands along all transmission lines, and convey same to the company, and the United States shall acquire the title to the land and site occupied by the said steam plant and by all Government buildings and other Government structures at the Gorgas plant, which will be conveyed to the company.

12. As the purchase price for the foregoing plants and properties to be conveyed to the company by the United States, the company will pay to the United States $5,000,000 in five installments, as follows: One million dollars upon the acceptance of this offer, and $1,000,000 annually thereafter until the purchase price is fully paid, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on deferred payments, with the privilege of anticipating any or all such payments, possession to be delivered upon payment of the first of said installments, and deeds of conveyance to be delivered when full payment for said property has been made.

13. This proposal contemplates and it is agreed that the purchase price for the property aforesaid shall not be diminished by reason of depreciation due to use or wear of buildings, machinery, and equipment or to the action of the elements, nor shall any claim be made for losses in or diminution of quantity of tools and supplies due to upkeep and maintenance during the period between the date hereof and the date of delivery of possession of said property; it being further understood that no inventory of the property need be taken, but that due care will be exercised by the United States in preserving and safeguarding the aforesaid real and personal property intact until possession thereof passes to the company. If any part or parts of the aforesaid plants necessary for proper operation of same have been removed by the United States, said part or parts shall be returned when possession of said plants passes to the company. Deeds of conveyance of real property shall warrant the title to be good and unencumbered.

14. The company agrees to operate nitrate plant No. 2 at the approximate present annual capacity of its machinery and equipment in the production of nitrogen and other fertilizer compounds (said capacity being equal to approximately 110,000 tons of ammonia nitrate per annum) throughout the lease period, except as it may be prevented by strikes, accidents, fires, or other causes beyond its control; and further agrees:

(a) To determine by research whether by means of electric-furnace methods and industrial chemistry there may be produced on a commercial scale fertilizer compounds of higher grade and at lower prices than fertilizer-using farmers have in the past been able to obtain, and to determine whether in a broad way the application of electricity and industrial chemistry may accomplish for the agricultural industry of the country what they have economically accomplished for other industries.

(b) To maintain nitrate plant No. 2 in its present state of readiness or its equivalent for immediate operation, in the manufacture of materials necessary in time of war for the production of explosives.

15. In order that the farmers may be supplied with fertilizers at fair prices and without excessive profits, the company agrees that the maximum net profit which it shall make in the manufacture and sale of fertilizer products at nitrate plant No. 2 shall not exceed 8 per cent of the actual annual cost of production thereof. In order that this provision may be carried out the company agrees to the creation of a board of not more than nine voting members, chosen as follows: The three leading representative farm organizations, national in fact, namely, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, or their successors, shall each designate not more than seven candidates for said board. The president shall nominate for membership on this board not more than seven of these candidates, selected to give representation to each of the above-mentioned organizations, said nominations to be made subject to confirmation by the Senate, and there shall be two voting members of said board selected by the company. A representative of the Bureau of Markets, Department of Agriculture, or its legal successor, to be appointed by the President, shall also be a member of the board serving in an advisory capacity without the right to vote. The said board shall determine what has been the cost of manufacture and sale of fertilizer products and the price which has been charged therefor, and, if necessary for the purpose of limiting the annual profit to 8 per cent as aforesaid, shall regulate the price at which said fertilizer may be sold by the company. For these purposes said board shall have access to the books and records of the company at any reasonable time. The said board shall also determine the equitable territorial distribution of fertilizer products produced at nitrate plant No. 2. If and when said board can not agree upon its findings and determinations, then the points of disagreement shall be referred to the Federal Trade Commission or its legal successor for arbitration and settlement, and the decision of said commission in such cases shall be final and binding upon the board.

16. Whenever, in the national defense, the United States shall require all or any part of the operating facilities at nitrate plant No. 2 for the production of materials necessary in the manufacture of explosives or other war materials, then the United States shall have the immediate right, upon five days' notice to the company, to take over and operate the same, and the company will supply the United States with hydroelectric power necessary for such operations, together with the use of all patented processes which the United States may need which the company owns or has the right to use. When required for national defense any of the company's personnel and operating organization necessary for operating any part of nitrate plant No. 2 in the manufacture of materials for explosives, or other war materials, shall be at the disposal of the United States. For the facilities and services aforesaid the United States shall protect the company from losses occasioned by such use and shall return the said property in as good condition as when received and reasonably compensate the company for the use thereof. All duly authorized agents and representatives of the United States shall have free access at all reasonable times to inspect and study all of the operations, chemical processes, and methods employed by the company at nitrate plant No. 2, provided that such agents and representatives shall not use the information and the facts concerning any of the company's operations, except for the benefit and protection of the United States.

17. In order that said company may be supplied with electric power and the farmers with fertilizers after the termination of the said 100-year leases, should the United States elect not to operate said power plants but determine to lease or dispose of same, the company shall have the preferred right to negotiate with the United States for such lease or purchase and upon such terms as may then be agreed upon. If the said leases are not renewed or the property covered thereby is not sold to said company, its successors or assigns, any operation or disposal thereof shall not deprive the company, its successors or assigns, of the right to be supplied with electric power at reasonable rates and in amount equal to its needs, but not in excess of the average amount used by it annually during the previous 10 years.

18. As a method of procedure in the event of the violation of any of the terms of this proposal or any contracts made in furtherance of its terms, the company agrees that the Attorney General may upon the request of the Secretary of War institute proceedings in equity in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Alabama for the purpose of canceling and terminating the lease of Dam No. 2 or Dam No. 3, or both of them, because of such violation or for the purpose of remedying or correcting by injunction, mandamus, or other process, any act of commission or omission in violation of the terms of this proposal or any contract made in furtherance thereof.

19. The above proposals are submitted for acceptance as a whole and not in part. Upon acceptance, the promises, undertakings, and obligations shall be binding upon the United States, and jointly and severally upon the undersigned, his heirs, representatives, and assigns, and the company, its successors and assigns; and all the necessary contracts, leases, deeds, and other instruments necessary or appropriate to effectuate the purposes of this proposal shall be duly executed and delivered by the respective parties above mentioned.

Approved and signed by me at Dearborn, Mich., this 25th day of January, 1922.

HENRY FORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a petition to the Congress from the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion of the United States of America touching the application of Henry Ford for the Muscle Shoals Plant. I should like to have it follow the statement containing the offer of Henry Ford printed in the RECORD by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], if I can get that permission. This is an important matter to the people of the South and West, and I am hoping that the Secretary of War will accept the Ford offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is, as follows:

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS PRIVATE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' LEGION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., January 18, 1922.

PETITION BY THE PRIVATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS LEGION TO THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion of the United States of America, an organization composed entirely of enlisted men who served in the military and naval forces of the United States during the World War in the years 1917 to 1919, inclusive, hereby respectfully petition the Congress of the United States for the enactment at the earliest possible date of legislation looking to the sale of the Muscle Shoals plant in Alabama to Mr. Henry Ford.

The honorable the Secretary of War, Mr. John W. Weeks, will undoubtedly present to the Congress the proposition of Mr. Henry Ford within the next few days.

We believe that this legislation will not only do a measure of justice to the unemployed ex-service soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States, who bore the burdens, hazards, and losses of the war, but will promote in the highest degree the welfare and prosperity of the people of the United States.

The Government for the past three years, or ever since the signing of the armistice, has failed to make any use of this valuable plant, although the need so to do has been apparent.

Experience justifies the conclusion that the Government will not develop this plant for the manufacture of fertilizers to the benefit of the public service as we believe the demonstrated business ability of Mr. Henry Ford will enable him to do.

We believe that under the plan proposed by Mr. Henry Ford this project will provide productive and essential employment for thousands of ex-service men and other citizens of this country now unemployed.

We, therefore, urge prompt action by the Congress with reference to this matter.

Respectfully submitted.

PRIVATE SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' LEGION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.
MARVIN GATES SPERRY, National President.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the conference report on the Treasury Department appropriation bill, which was presented to the Senate on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report referred to by the Senator from Wyoming.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9724) "making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 14, 19, 24, and 25.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 22, and 23; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "$4,000,000: Provided, That for purpose of concentration, upon the initiation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and under regulations prescribed by him, distilled spirits may be removed from any internal-revenue bonded warehouse to any other such warehouse, and may be bottled in bond in any such warehouse before or after payment of the tax, and the commissioner shall prescribe the form and penal sums of bond covering distilled spirits in internal-revenue bonded warehouse, and in transit between such warehouses"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 20, and 21.

F. E. WARREN,
W. L. JONES,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

MARTIN B. MADDEN,
WALTER W. MAGEE,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WARREN. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator what are the differences between the conferees representing the two Houses on this appropriation bill, if there are any?

Mr. WARREN. If the motion which I have made is carried, I shall then explain the matter to the Senator, for I then shall have another motion to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. There are some matters still in disagreement between the two Houses. I therefore move that the Senate further insist on its amendments still in disagreement, request a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not understand when I withdrew my objection that that carried with it the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. CURTIS. It is only a partial report.

Mr. WARREN. What is the wish of the Senator from Utah in reference to the matter?

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming what items have now been agreed to?

Mr. WARREN. That is what I was about to tell the Senator and that is why I wished to have the motion put before the Senate.

The conferees on the part of the Senate have receded as to five different items, while the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives have surrendered on about 25.

There are four matters still in disagreement. One of them is the item with reference to the Undersecretary of the Treasury; another is as to an employee who is an assistant to the Secretary; another is as to the erection of the archives depository; and the fourth is as to the erection of a vault in the Treasury Department.

Mr. KING. Then the amendments upon which the conferees have agreed are the less important amendments?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I so consider them.

Mr. KING. They are not items which led to controversy when the bill was under consideration in the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. As I recall, there was no controversy in the Senate except as to the items which are still in disagreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. HARRIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF REVENUE ACT OF 1921.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, sections 214 and 800 of the late revenue act extend certain benefits to the posts of the American Legion, but not to the posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Spanish War Veterans, and so forth. These organizations feel that they are unjustly discriminated against. I am satisfied that there was no intention to do that. I have conferred with some members of the Finance Committee, and they say that there was no intention to discriminate against these posts; and so, Mr. President, I ask permission out of order to introduce a bill covering that matter, and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (S. 3096) to amend certain provisions of an act entitled "An act to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved November 23, 1921, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LETTER BY OTTO H. KAHN.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to the secretary of the committee of American business men by Hon. Otto H. Kahn on "The farmer and the business man."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

THE FARMER AND THE BUSINESS MAN.

(By Otto H. Kahn.)

NEW YORK, January 21, 1922.

HON. GEORGE HENRY PAYNE,
Secretary The Committee of American Business Men, 354 Fourth Avenue, New York.

DEAR SIR: Under date of November 21, 1921, in accepting the invitation of the Committee of American Business Men to join their ranks, I wrote you a letter, in which, among other things, I said that business stood in need of a spokesman and an organizer to enable it to play its proper part in public affairs. That letter met with a considerable measure of public notice and comment, which I am far from having the immodesty to attribute to any merit of either the writer or the presentation, but in which I do discern affirmation of the fact that the subject possessed "news value," i. e., that it was timely and of interest to many people.

Strangely enough, many of the press comments, especially in western papers, were introduced by headlines, such as "Kahn attacks agricultural bloc" or "Kahn summons business to organize bloc," etc.

That is how legends come to be made. As a matter of fact, in the letter to which reference is made, I did not even mention the "agricultural bloc," and I particularly advised business not to attempt to organize a bloc, as I consider all "bloc" activities as pernicious and not compatible with our system of government.

It would be very regrettable if the impression were to take root that the Committee of American Business Men was to be organized against anything or anybody, except against misinformation, ignorance, and demagoguery, and those who serve that unlovely trinity. As far as my own attitude toward the interests and problems of the farmer are concerned, I can not indicate it better than by reference to an open letter which I wrote to Senator MEDILL MCCORMICK in October, 1920, i. e., long before the agricultural bloc had become a reality. In that letter I called attention to the fact that the farmer was discontented and under a sense of grievance with the existing order of things. I pointed to the immense social value to the State of the existence of a contented farming population, engaged as it is in a calling of vital necessity, toilsome and none too well requited at best, and involving inevitable hardships. I said that the just grievances of the farmer called for immediate, intelligent consideration and for effective redress, even though that might require the adoption of methods which were new and somewhat unpalatable to the established ways of business, and that if there was one calling which had a higher claim than another upon the helpful consideration of the State among those which made up the sum total of the Nation's activities, it was that of the farmer. "Our whole system of two-party government is on trial," I concluded. "If the Republican Party, too, fails him (the farmer) he will turn in self-protection to other and new political instrumentalities, and then the grave evil of parties or factions constituted on class lines will menace the Republic."

However, my own attitude, or a correct understanding of that attitude, is of very small importance. What is of great importance is that the attitude of business toward the farmer should be correctly taken and correctly understood.

The most essential thing for all our people to recognize is that, in the last analysis, we are all in the same boat and sink or swim together.

The most helpful thing to set prosperity going again is to carry that recognition into practice by broad-minded and well-conceived cooperation, instead of blaming our adversity on the other fellow and trying to get even with him.

There is no adequate economic reason, notwithstanding the huge waste and destruction wrought by the late war, why the world, and particularly this favored country, should not now resume the road of prosperity, but in order to do so we must take a hard pull all together, we must give full and free scope to the forces of energy and enterprise instead of cramping, shackling, and hampering them, and we must let ourselves be guided by the tested lessons of economic truths instead of giving ear to plausible fallacies or permitting ourselves to be led into precipitate actions under the influence of temporary conditions.

Every right-minded business man must be desirous to have the legitimate grievances of the farmer—and he has and long has had such—redressed and remedied. Justice demands that this should be done. The larger interests of the Nation demand it, for it is harmful and menacing to the Commonwealth that so numerous and so valuable a portion of the population should feel discontented and resentful and be without prosperity. The enlightened selfishness of business requires it, for not only does the material well-being, or the reverse, of the farmer largely react upon business, but experience has shown that when the farming industry is in the throes of depression the farmer is very apt to blame business and to hit out at business and to get himself in a frame of mind which the well-meaning, self-deceived purveyor of political and economic nostrums or the cunning demagogue are only too ready to take advantage of.

It is manifest that the representatives of farming communities and States must know better than most business men, and particularly business men of the East, what ails the farmer. These men are not only not to be criticized; on the contrary, they are to be commended for using their votes and their influence to get remedial measures enacted into law and to obtain for the farmer a square deal. To the extent that we business men are in disaccord with the agricultural leaders in and out of Congress, it is not because of their efforts to promote the welfare of the farmer, which efforts we cordially approve and indorse, but because not a few of them seem to be acting under the impression, in certain respects at least, that it is possible to aid some sections and callings of our common country by hurting others.

Granted that it be true that business in the past has not been sufficiently considerate of, and interested in, the needs of agriculture, is that any reason why agriculture should now take the same regrettable and harmful attitude toward business? While "turn about is fair play," it is by no means always the wisest and most effective play. In the present stage of this Nation's and the world's affairs, it is a kind of play which can be indulged in only to the grave detriment of all concerned.

Among the things which, as I understand it, the farmer most needs are more adequate financial facilities and broader markets. Business can and should help to attain these things for him, but the accomplishment of these objects has been rendered more difficult and uncertain by the attitude which the legislative leaders of farming constituencies in the last Congress took in respect of tax revision against the advice of President Harding, one of the truest and wisest friends the farmer ever had, and will be further impeded and retarded if certain measures now urged upon Congress come to be enacted. I am far from questioning the ability, the worthy purpose, and well-meaning intent of those men. I do venture to question whether, in their righteous zeal to aid agriculture out of its present depression, they have given sufficient study and reflection to economic laws and economic history.

An apparent short cut is not always the surest or straightest road to the aim in view, especially in matters of legislative enactments concerning business, with their complex effects and countereffects. A monkey wrench is a useful tool, but it is proverbially apt, if wielded by insufficiently practiced hands, to be dropped into the machinery, with troublesome consequences.

If it happens that adversity befalls a great branch of our national activities or particular sections of our country, whether due to factors of an avoidable character or to an unfortunate combination of uncontrollable circumstances, the remedy is not to get even by striking angrily at other callings or other sections or to base hasty legislation on temporary conditions. The remedy is to sit down together and by calm and well-meaning comparison of views diagnose the case, determine the causation of the trouble, and act in unison in finding and applying antidotes for the present and preventive measures for the future.

Statistics over many years have demonstrated strikingly that agricultural prosperity and business prosperity, and agricultural depression and business depression, run on parallel lines and are largely interdependent.[1] Unfortunately, that truth has not been sufficiently recognized as yet by either party. On the contrary, they have usually been at loggerheads and pulling in divergent directions, when, as a matter of fact, they are natural allies and both have much to gain from sympathetic understanding and cooperation.

So far from counseling an attitude of antagonism toward the farmers and their representatives, I would advise that your committee endeavor to get into touch with the leading farm organizations and representatives of agriculture, with a view to establishing opportunities for comparisons of views, leading, it may be hoped, to an endeavor to agree upon wise and effective lines of policy and action so as to promote the essential and legitimate interests of agriculture in the only way in which they can be promoted lastingly. That way does not run along the lines of class-selfishness or of antagonizing, and doing hurt to, other interests equally essential and legitimate. The true road can only be found by following the signposts of steadfast adherence to tested principles of economic soundness and broad, enlightened consideration for the general welfare.

Very truly, yours,

OTTO H. KAHN.

[1] In a recent article, published in the New Republic, Prof. David Friday gives the following table:

[In millions of dollars.]

Year.	Value of all farm products.	Value created by manufacture.
1899	$4,717	$4,831
1904	6,122	6,293
1909	8,558	8,529
1914	9,895	9,878
1919	24,982	25,509

The professor adds: "It is hardly believable that the correspondence between these two sets of figures prepared by two different Government departments entirely independent of each other should coincide by mere accident over a period of more than two decades. * * * There seems to be much sound sense in the farmer's statement that there is an interdependence between the purchasing power of the agricultural community and the sales of the manufacturer."

The following interesting and significant set of statistics was published a few months ago by Mr. E. T. Meredith in the North American Review, comparing the value per acre of crops realized by the farmer with the number of business failures in the year after ("the effect of a good or poor year in agriculture being always reflected in business the following year"):

	Value per acre (10 crops combined).	Failures, years following crop years (number per each 1,000 in business).
		Per cent.
Best 10 years	$22.36	7.2
Second best	13.71	8.3
Third best	10.80	11.0
Fourth best	8.99	11.1

Or, taking the best five and poorest five years of each decade, we have:

	Best.		Poorest.
	Value per acre.	Failures.	Value per acre.	Failures.
		Per cent.		Per cent.
1880-1890	$12.05	10.8	$9.64	11.2
1890-1900	10.40	11.4	8.64	11.5
1900-1910	14.56	7.9	11.94	7.9
1910-1920	28.62	5.7	15.98	8.9

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 31, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord God, beneath Thy mighty hand we humble ourselves and turn imploringly to Thee. We ask for succor and help to strengthen all weary and strickened ones. While these hours are trembling with such prevailing sorrow, yet may it not oppress us. Thou art a Father to be trusted through all circumstances, through all lives, and through all deaths. With this trust and assurance, may we go about our work unafraid. Help all of us to lift unto Thee our fairest offering, which is an honest and a contrite heart. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MADDEN, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted for printing under the rule the conference report and accompanying statement on the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1923, and for other purposes.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10101, being the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ascertain from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], the ranking Democratic Member, what his ideas are on the time for general debate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What has the gentleman from Minnesota to suggest?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Well, I will say that I have over two hours promised now, and I think it will extend to fully two and one-half hours; that is, I do not think I can hold them down to less than two and one-half hours on my side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman consent to five hours' general debate in all, to be equally divided? That will be satisfactory to this side.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to five hours, one-half to be controlled by each side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] will please take the Chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10101, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10101, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to proceed for at least 30 minutes without interruption. I may want to talk longer than that, but I desire for the first 30 minutes to proceed without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish the Chair to remind him of the time?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; to remind me of the time.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I will say, to begin on, that this appropriation bill carries the least amount of money of any bill that will be reported from the Committee on Appropriations during this session, but at the same time it contains a vastly greater number of items to be considered, and some of those items are exceedingly intricate. It will be impossible almost for any man or any committee to carry all of those hundreds—yes, thousands—of items in his head.

Again I wish to say that the subcommittee, composed of five members, have had more exhaustive hearings on this bill than has ever been known on District of Columbia affairs, and I think beyond anything that ever happened before in the Congress. The hearings consist of between 1,400 and 1,500 pages, and consumed the time of the subcommittee for several weeks, for five or six weeks, to say nothing about the time consumed in writing up the bill. Heretofore while I have been chairman of the committee and part of the time when I was on the committee we had two very valuable members, consisting of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. By the new arrangement they were left off this committee. But I will say in addition to that, that the two new members who were placed thereon, namely, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], have admirably succeeded in taking their places, and I wish to give them, as well as all the other members of the committee, credit for the untiring labor that they have performed in trying to perfect a bill that will be satisfactory not only to the people of the District of Columbia and to Congress, but to the people of the United States, and I congratulate the new members on their work and diligence in this connection.

I was in hopes that this bill could have been brought out several weeks ago, but owing to the exhaustive and extensive hearings that was impossible. This bill contains 100 pages, and if I had the time and the proper authority—the proper legislative authority—I believe that, with a small committee of this House, I could reduce the number of pages of this bill at least half; in other words, taking every branch of the District government, the subheads and divisions are very frequently 10 or 15 or 20 or 30, when they could easily be consolidated into 3. But that is apart from the question.

Up to two years ago the appropriations were made and the expenditures were made upon what was known as 50-50 basis, but beginning with the appropriation of 1920-21 that was changed to the so-called 60-40 basis, and I believe but very few citizens of Washington and very few Members of Congress are opposed at the present time to the 60-40 basis, because I believe it is more just and more equitable to the people than the 50-50 plan. We have carried in this bill for quite a number of years the question of taxation, real and personal, tangible and intangible personal property. The present rate of tax on real estate and tangible property is 15 mills on the dollar. That is the minimum. The maximum is 20 mills on the dollar, but I do not think that the maximum has ever been reached, and I hope it will not have to be reached on this occasion. We carry the same rate of taxation in this bill that we have carried heretofore. As the older Members know, the tax on intangible property was put on only a few years ago, and is three-tenths of 1 cent. I thought at the time it was put on that that was rather modest, and I have not since changed my mind; but this bill makes no change whatever in the intangible personal property tax, so we leave the method of taxation in the bill which is now before you the same as it was before.

I wish to speak about this fact, that we have kept within the Budget. We have kept within the Budget estimates in every item except one, and that one we have raised $700. That is for the Minimum Wage Board. There may be controversy about it hereafter. Heretofore the sum of $5,000 has been carried for the Minimum Wage Board.

The Budget cut it down to $3,300, and they gave their reasons, some of which were good; but the committee, of whom I am one of five, voted to raise that, with my approval, to $4,000. That is the only instance in which we have exceeded the Budget estimates, and that by only $700.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry, or does he prefer to finish his statement?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have already made the statement to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union that I desire to proceed without interruption for 30 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then I will not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. When we come to the 5-minute rule, no matter if it takes a week or a month, we will endeavor to answer all questions, and I think what I can not answer other Members of the committee will be able to answer; but the items are so very numerous that if we started in now on the smaller items we would never get through with the bill.

I think the first item that ought to be touched upon in this general statement is what I term the money phase of it. Your committee have had in mind all the time that we ought to economize; and while every member of your committee is greatly in favor of beautifying the Capital of the Nation, keeping it up to the peak, so to speak, yet while all the balance of the United States are having to submit to a diminishing of the funds appropriated to them, we did not think it was very unfair that even the residents of the Capital of the Nation should submit to at least some reductions in some items, and not branch out in too many new projects at this particular time. In the bills that have come before you thus far you will have noticed that the estimates have been cut down very considerably. We have cut them down somewhat in this bill, but I wish to say now that after 20 years' experience in the House, a great portion of that time having been connected with the Committee on the District of Columbia, I firmly believe that the bill which now lies before you will adequately take care of all the necessities of the District of Columbia.

You may many of you disagree on certain items, and when it comes to the five-minute rule I am going to be very liberal. I am not putting up my judgment against the judgment of others, but when Members want to change these items I want to ask them upon what they base their information, whether newspaper accounts or idle gossip of the streets or the testimony of parties who knew what they were talking about.

The last regular District act—keep in mind the word "regular"—containing the items for the year 1922, under which we are now operating, amounted to $19,414,412.99. That was the last regular bill. Under the old system, before the Budget plan came into effect, many, many thousands of dollars, running almost into the millions, were carried in other bills. The sundry civil bill, for instance, carried $1,829,000, and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill carried many thousands of dollars for the District of Columbia. The deficiency bill of last year carried $1,500,000 or more. As best we could we have tried to consolidate nearly, if not all, of those items in this bill. Including all of these other items the last bill, under which we are now operating, carried a total of $21,241,472.99. The regular bill carries virtually the same amount as the regular bill under which we are now operating, namely, $19,286,439.80. Of the other items carried in these outside bills, we have included in this present bill $1,111,340, so it makes the total of the present bill $20,397,779.80. So there is very little difference between the ultimate results of the two bills.

We had a large deficiency bill last year of $1,760,093.75 that was chiefly made up of one item for new school buildings. I am going to have something to say on the subject of new school buildings. Of that deficiency bill the sum of $1,546,893.75 was for new school buildings.

I am in favor of ample schools, as much so as any living man. I want ample room and enough competent teachers to take care of the pupils in all ways and of all grades, from the feeble-minded up to those 80 years of age. We have some as old as 80 years of age, but I am in favor of taking care of all of them. But I want to explain a little bit what has been done for school buildings, regardless of what you see in the public prints, because there is much of it that I know is not according to the facts. Let us see what we have done.

In our act of February 22, 1921—I wish you would remember that date, for that is the current law, under which we are now operating—your committee appropriated for the construction of eight new school buildings. At that time, with the knowledge we had, we thought that was quite enough additional ones for a city of this size—eight additional new school buildings which had a capacity of 64 rooms. Now, on the subject of rooms, until within the last few years every building that was put up in this city—and there were 154 buildings of that kind, to say nothing about the 78 portable and 18 rented buildings—had a seating capacity of 48 children in each room, with 50 the limit.

But lately, within the last few years, they have cut down the seating capacity of the more recent buildings to about 43 per room. The older buildings, about 140, all have a seating capacity of 48 per room. That is what these first buildings have, and that is the standard of capacity in most cities of the United States—15 square feet to each pupil. But they have cut that down, and while they do not limit the 15 square feet, they have put less children in a room, so they figure on 42 or 43 to a room for the later buildings.

As I say, after we had appropriated in the 1921 bill $980,000 for new buildings the deficiency bill was passed in June of that year.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If I yield to the gentleman from Texas, which I would like to do more than any other man living except the gentleman from Iowa who asked a moment ago, there would be no limit to the number of questions asked. All these questions will be answered when we get under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I was wondering how we would get the information if we did not ask questions.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. After I get through with this general statement I will answer any question I can. Now, in addition to the 8 buildings which we put in the 1921 bill, which is operative now, the deficiency bill in June, 1921, had 9 buildings additional with 96 new rooms. So there are 96 rooms plus 64 rooms, making 160 new rooms, all within a year, to say nothing about $150,000, which we appropriated for a new tubercular school, the location of which is not yet settled. Then, there were 17 parcels of new land for which we appropriated about $332,000, and all of which I do not think have been selected yet. So that the deficiency bill carried $1,544,000 for new buildings in June, 1921, when the February bill just previous carried $980,000. If we pass this bill between now and the 1st day of March, this will be added to what I have already told you. We have included in this bill for the completion of buildings now under construction $1,400,000. These figures are pretty large. So that in this bill we add $1,711,000 for new buildings. If this bill passes in the next 30 days, the total appropriation available for new school buildings will amount to $4,235,000 in one year. Of course, we have had to take care of the additional buildings when they came along, and before the 1st of July there will be about 108 new rooms ready. Your committee did not stop with that; they appropriated for 108 new teachers, as we are bound to provide a teacher for every room. In other words, within the last year in the two bills I have spoken of and the present bill we take care of 8,976 additional pupils, only figuring 42 to a room. When we get under the five-minute rule I will be pleased to answer questions as to whether the children of this District are amply provided with school privileges.

On the subject of salaries, this bill carries specific appropriations for salaries, exclusive of schools and the police and fire departments, totaling approximately $1,669,863. For school salaries alone this bill carries $4,198,810.

We did not raise the salaries of anybody, although about $250,000 was asked for. It was the policy of the chairman of the full committee, and I think properly so, not to raise any salaries in any of these bills at this time, because of the $240 bonus and other matters where salaries ought to be equalized. Hence we followed the same rule and let the salaries alone, except we have added 108 school-teachers and a lot of new employees, putting them on the same basis of salary as other employees of a like character. But for schools alone the salaries amount to $4,198,810. For the fire department $1,120,595.44. The salaries of the police department amount to $1,658,286.36. In all the appropriation for salaries in the District of Columbia amounts to $8,547,554.80.

I may not be a good judge, and I do not wish to say that there are more people employed in the District than should be, but if you could cut down the various subdivisions where the activity is so much subdivided that they have to have a new head, many employees making the overhead charges simply enormous, you would save much money. But I suppose the people of Washington want everybody employed that can be employed, and I do not blame them at all.

Eight million five hundred and forty-seven thousand five hundred and fifty-four dollars and eighty cents a year is a good deal for salaries in a city of this size, but it will be increased when we add the $240 bonus, which we probably will, and several other items when the reclassification bill becomes a law.

There is one item here that I must speak about. I hold here a clipping from a newspaper, and I vouch for its correctness and can prove it. Some one said that the school-teachers of the District of Columbia had received no substantial increase in salary for years. I say with the author of this newspaper clipping that that does an injustice to the Congress and to the District of Columbia. Pretty nearly four years ago I started in in an endeavor to increase the salaries of the teachers.

I wanted to begin at the kindergarten and the lower grades and put them up, and after two or three years I succeeded, and a teacher who was receiving the basic salary as a kindergarten teacher of only five or six hundred dollars at that time now receives $1,440, and other teachers have been increased in proportion. I say that the following statement is correct:

School-teachers have received an increase in salaries within three years of an average of 65 per cent, ranging from 140 per cent increase in class 1 to 26 per cent in class 5, besides the bonus of $240 a year. A teacher in class 1 who received $500 in 1918, in 1921 received $1,440; class 2, in 1918, $600; in 1921, $1,440; class 3 in 1918, $650; in 1921, $1,440; high school in 1918, $1,000; in 1921, $1,640, and so on through the various classes.

The salaries of the policemen have been raised by special legislative act, and the same is true of the firemen.

I wish I had time to go into the playground business in full, but I expect to answer many questions under the 5-minute rule in respect to that. We have 26 municipal playgrounds, 1 bathing beach, 2 swimming pools, 4 concert tennis courts, aside from 78 school playgrounds fully equipped, and we are providing for more in this bill.

The number of policemen we have left as they are, at 804. I wanted to increase the number and our subcommittee wanted to increase the number. However, we provided only for the automatic advance of 126 of them, which raises their salary considerable. The reason why we did not add to the number of policemen chiefly is that down at the White House there are 55 of the Metropolitan police on guard. We do not object to that, but I have heard it intimated from the very highest source that soldiers from Fort Myer and other places could take care of that duty and would like very much to do it, and thus relieve 55 of the municipal police who now guard the White House for active service in the District of Columbia. Your committee therefore decided to not increase the number now.

We have 449 privates in the fire department. In addition to that, however, we added one lieutenant and 12 privates and provided for the advancement of 146, and for additional pieces of motor fire-fighting equipment, including one chemical engine, costing in all $44,000.

So far as charities are concerned, invariably, where we could, we have increased the amount for the charities board. There is only one case where I think we cut it down, eight or ten thousand dollars, being for the employment of a lot of physicians who were absolutely unnecessary. They were employed at a dollar a day, and we could not find out that they ever did anything. Other than that we have increased the amount pretty generally on all subjects of charity.

I come now to the Gallinger Hospital. We have all heard of that. In this bill we have made the final appropriation for the full completion of that hospital. The bill carries an appropriation amounting to $246,410 for that purpose, and on the 1st of July next there will be 200 beds ready to receive the patients in the Gallinger Hospital, and it will thus relieve the old asylum and jail of every patient that it has—60 in number—and will take 140 from St. Elizabeths. The Gallinger Hospital will ultimately have 300 beds altogether. It is one of the most magnificent institutions, although it cost only a million and a half dollars. It will relieve the congestion of this kind of patients in many other hospitals in the city. This will enable us to dispense in a short time with this old asylum hospital, which has been a disgrace to the District for many years.

I think we have given St. Elizabeths too much. We have added $50,000 to the $800,000 for taking care of those patients, and if we had considered it a little more carefully, knowing that 160 patients were going to the Gallinger Hospital, I think that they could have gotten along with $800,000, the amount we allowed them last year. However, the amount is carried in the bill, and I shall not object to it.

I now come to the water service. We appropriated last year $866,350. This year we propose to appropriate $1,028,020, an increase of $161,000, and we have given them $153,000 for the laying or extending of water mains. Another matter I desire to spend a few minutes on. Of course we have cut the estimates, but the greatest cut in the estimates is $3,000,000 for increasing the water service by constructing new conduits in connection with the aqueduct which they think would cost $9,523,000. In connection with that I want to read from my views as stated in the report of the committee:

The estimates included a proposal to appropriate $3,000,000 for extending work on the project for an increased water supply for the District of Columbia, for which the Army appropriation act approved June 30, 1921, carried an appropriation of $200,000 "for the preparation of plans" and "the initiation of work." This bill contains no appropriation on account of that project. The committee developed the information that, in the event of any serious break in the tunnel conveying water across Rock Creek to the present and only filtration plant or between the District line and said filtration plant, the plan for this project, specifically designated in the Army appropriation act cited, and the work under which is estimated to cost $9,523,000, has not been so prepared as to afford relief to that section of the city receiving water by gravity from the reservoir adjoining the existing filtration plant, and such section consumes about 50 per cent of all the water used. In other words, the proposed project will be an auxiliary to the present system to the District line, at which point the water flowing down the proposed new conduit will be filtered and pumped to the higher levels of the northwest section of the District, and—without modification of the project and an appropriation in excess of the present estimated total cost thereof—would not be of assistance, should any serious difficulty arise between the District line and the present filtration plant, to the gravity-supplied area referred to.

They have spent $22,000 of the $200,000 referred to there. In other words, we did not think, after spending days and days upon this matter, that the plan that they had prepared would be sufficient, and in addition to what I have just read I want to emphatically say that this bill, it will be observed, makes no appropriation for providing increased water supply for the entire District. I think, and can safely say, that this committee is open-minded on this appropriation for this subject, but it did not feel at liberty to propose legislation on a plan which seems to have been adopted so as to have made it a thoroughly complete relief system in the event of any trouble with any part of the entire existing plan, and perhaps also to have authorized the acquisition of certain parcels of land which the committee was told it would be necessary to acquire to carry the project to completion in accordance with the plan referred to in the Army appropriation act. Rather than bring in an appropriation for further work on a plan which I really believe was not generally understood, as not being a complete substitute for the existing project, in case of need, I submit that the committee has been fair with the House in its course in bringing this matter to the attention of the proper legislative committee for appropriate action. Mr. EVANS and Mr. BUCHANAN, members of the subcommittee, have made very careful study of this matter. I think they will substantiate every word that I have said if this matter is brought up for discussion. These gentlemen have almost become experts on this subject. We all want plenty of water, and I will say that the hearings show in the 1,500 pages that at the present time they have the best water in the United States and the best filtration plant in the United States, and that at no time, with one or two exceptions, have they ever come up to capacity, and at no time has there ever been a break anywhere in that aqueduct or distribution plant.

Recently a notice came out in the papers that something serious had happened, the insinuation being that it was a breakdown. When we came to examine into it, the engineer reported that it was simply a little break of a shaft in one of the engine rooms. The engineer, Maj. Gordon, said there had been no break anywhere, but he said they anticipated that sometime in the future there might be. I do, too. Even without an increase, sometime in the future there will be a break, and I, for one, am willing to start with five, ten, or twelve million. I would like to secure it so as to affect the whole District instead of 40 or 50 per cent, as it is now. The estimates are cut $3,000,000 on that account alone.

Now, gentlemen, there is much more to this, but I am going to stop talking now; but when you get under the 5-minute rule you will find some member of the committee who will gladly and ably answer any questions propounded.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. McSWAIN. The gentleman referred to this engineer commissioner—is that Col. Charles Keller?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Is that the same Col. Keller who gave out an interview the other day criticizing Congress because the men came from small towns and therefore were unappreciative of the beautifying and magnifying of the metropolitan city of the Nation?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Well, I can not say whether it is true or not, but if it was Col. Keller it is no doubt the engineer commissioner. I am not going to criticize him.

Mr. McSWAIN. Does the gentleman know from what big town Col. Keller came when he was sent to the United States Military Academy and educated at public expense?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No; I do not know that. The gentleman knows there are lots of us who came from small towns——

Mr. McSWAIN. So do I, and I am proud of it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have sometimes thought I have lived in Washington and other places so long that possibly my mind has been a little broadened in the last few years.

Mr. Chairman, there is one item in my general statement that I overlooked, and I want to speak of it now and leave it until we come under the five-minute rule. But I wish to correct a false impression in the minds of some District residents. A few days ago one of the local papers in a general statement set forth what I construed as meaning that only $113,000 was appropriated in this new bill for streets. Of course, it may have used language that was not according to the bill, but that was the impression given, that only $113,000 was appropriated for streets. Even if the words "for paving new streets" were used that would not be sufficient for all the people, because they got the idea that all we have given is $113,000 for streets. The bill contains several items. For assessment and permit work, which is used for improving the streets, curbs, alleys, and so forth, alone, the amount is $225,000. For paving new streets, $113,600. I presume that is what led up to the impression that that is all that they would get. Streets, avenues, alleys, and repairs, $431,000. Sidewalks, curbs around public reservations, $15,000; dust prevention; cleaning, and snow removal, which is very proper at this time, $350,000. Repairs to suburban roads, $200,000; grading alleys, streets, and roads, $35,000. In other words, the total amounts to $1,369,850. I want the public to know this committee is not skimping them at all on the streets.

Mr. WALSH. How much less for new streets than was appropriated last year?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Very little, if any, for new streets. Our committee decided not to go into anything that was not in the budget.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The improvement on the west side of Connecticut Avenue is in the budget.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I know that.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. And that leads out into Maryland?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. And connects up with the Maryland road system?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Can the gentleman tell the House why that was cut out of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have a written statement on that; and I will put it in exactly as it is, so that I will make no mistake.

The largest one of the deferred projects was for paving the west side of Connecticut Avenue from Chappell Road to Chevy Chase Circle, at a cost of $58,500. This roadway is paved at present, although it is true the surface is more or less in need of repairs; but it should be borne in mind that Chevy Chase Circle may be reached via Rock Creek Park over some very excellent roadways, and it did seem to the committee that this rather costly improvement might give way for another year to much-needed improvements in other localities.

I have looked over the same thing for eight or ten years, and it is a good road. One side of it has been repaved. This occasionally needs a little repair, but I wish we had as good a road as that in the city in which I live.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. You do not contend that people who want to go to Chevy Chase should go through Rock Creek Park?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They can go that way.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Is it not true that the gates in the park close at 8 o'clock?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If you should take the entire membership of Congress out there and let them see it, they would say that it is the least thing that has been needed for the present, because all that it requires is a little repair.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The appropriations were cut. The estimates of the commissioners for new streets were, in round figures, about $800,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am not talking about the commissioners, but the Budget.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The commissioners, who are the governing body of the city, stated the needed street improvements would be about $800,000. As appropriated for new improvements it is only $113,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. But I say that the Budget cut them in half, and more, too.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I want to ask the gentleman this: The gentleman said in his opening statement that we could secure information as to why these cuts were made by the Budget. Where can you find that?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I did not say that. I did not say that I could give you information as to why the Budget cut anything.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. How was the budget made up on this matter of street improvement?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will have to refer you to the chairman of the general committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. Perhaps he knows more about it than I do. If he made the statement, it would be correct. I might be mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman stated that the tax rate on intangible property was left at the old rate of three-tenths of 1 per cent. I find there is a good deal of confusion in the minds of a number of Members as to what property is designated as "intangible property" that comes under this low tax of three-tenths of 1 per cent. Can the gentleman tell us what property is so designated?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Not having any of it myself, perhaps I would be poor authority on the subject.

Mr. BLANTON. Many of us are in the same situation. I had hoped the gentleman might tell us what the property is that is so taxed.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman is fortunate enough to have a lock box in one of the depositories down town, and he would go in there and find $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 worth of bonds, mortgages, or things of that kind, and did not include them in his property assessment returns, I think he would be guilty of violating the three-tenths of 1 per cent regulation on that so-called intangible property.

Mr. BLANTON. Would it also include cash that is in the box?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Well, I think so.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order. I think the gentlemen from the small towns to which allusion has been made ought to be here to attend to business, and I make the point of order of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-five Members are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10101, finding itself without a quorum, he directed the roll to be called. Whereupon 291 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he presented a list of absentees for entry upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 25, 1922, on page 1732, shows the following proceeding on the floor of the House during the general debate on the anti-lynching bill:

> Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANSORGE].
> The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for one minute.
> Mr. ANSORGE. Mr. Chairman, the House has already heard me for 10 minutes. I merely ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

It is true the House had already heard the gentleman on the subject, but not on that same day. He had spoken with reference to the bill when the resolution making it in order was before the House for consideration. That was on the 19th day of last December, and his speech is in the RECORD at pages 546 to 548.

In the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the extension of remarks of the gentleman from New York, January 26, 1922, appears. It is duly and properly labeled "Extension of remarks," but passing from the label to the contents we find a very unexpected and genuine surprise awaiting us. Just hear the gentleman extend:

> Mr. ANSORGE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I thank the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the House for its unanimous consent that I may have this further opportunity to speak on this important measure.

Note his expression, "To speak." And how does he speak? Listen:

> In the first place, I want to answer the question just propounded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Observe the phraseology, "The question just propounded." As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Texas had propounded to the gentleman from Wyoming a question which had elicited considerable applause on the Democratic side of the Chamber. Note the statement of the gentleman from New York in his extension, "I want to answer the question just propounded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]." The truth is that the colloquy between the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Wyoming had already passed into the history of the debate. A dozen or more Members of the House had spoken since that occurrence. Then the gentleman from New York arose in his place and in his one-minute grant of time said, "I merely ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks." But he proceeds in this extension of remarks to deliver himself of an answer, complete and satisfactory to himself, to the argument and question of the gentleman from Texas and, mirabile dictu, he is hardly launched upon the subject when he assures his readers that the House broke into applause. [Laughter.]

This first offense in this regard is followed by four others of similar nature, making a total of five designations of applause in the gentleman's extension of remarks.

Now, what is the picture, gentlemen, that he thus seeks to present to the country in general and to his own district in particular? In the first place, he paints the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, having charge of the bill, and the House of Representatives, burdened with the responsibility of its consideration and realizing that a crisis in the deliberations has just been reached, as bowing meekly and deferentially and gratefully to the gentleman from New York as the one white hope in a dark cause, and as saying to him, admiringly and with unprecedented unanimity, "After you, my dear ANSORGE." [Laughter.]

Then he represents the gentleman from Wyoming as being ruthlessly pressed in a fierce and unequal combat of wits by the able gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], and he leaves the inference that the despairing majority leader is utterly unable to reply. It is possible that in that he is correct. [Laughter.] And then he endeavors to make the country believe, and especially his particular part of it, that in accordance with a general popular expectation, growing out of his own profound erudition and parliamentary power, he very naturally comes promptly and boldly and invincibly to the rescue of his fallen chief. [Laughter.] And he pictures the House as bursting into applause at his visionary accomplishment. [Laughter.]

I fancy he must think, gentlemen, that this erroneous impression will add cubits to his political stature in a campaign at home, where a great deal of local color will probably be incidental to the situation. [Laughter and applause.] He depicts himself as having vindicated completely the majority leader and as having routed irretrievably, horse, foot, and dragoon, my distinguished colleague from Texas in charge of the opposing forces, all to the flattering accompaniment of the thunderous applause of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Was it confined to the Republican side?

Mr. LANHAM. Oh, no; it was general. Notwithstanding the fact that the subject was not properly a partisan one, it was approached, nevertheless, largely along partisan lines, but here we Democrats sacrifice our respect for and confidence in the man who is leading our forces and join in the applause with the Republicans. It is a colossal accomplishment. And yet the gentleman had only one minute in which to speak, one minute in which to deliver these three columns of printed matter. Is it not strange that such a wonderful achievement, which, according to his version of it, hardly has a parallel in the annals of our legislative history, was not heralded broadcast to the world by the representatives of the press who sit in the gallery above?

Now you know and I know that nothing of the kind happened on the floor of this House. The gentleman from New York did not come to the rescue of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]; the speech which he has so liberally sprinkled with applause was not delivered in this Chamber and the House did not applaud it. The fact of the matter is that his extension of remarks was prepared in his own office, without the knowledge of this House further than the leave which had been granted to extend, and it was by him liberally punctuated with applause without the consent of this House. The only applause came from the clicking of his own typewriter. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman perhaps had his stenographer with him, and it may be the stenographer applauded when he was dictating his extension of remarks.

Mr. LANHAM. Well, it may be that under the duress of employment that possibly could have happened. [Laughter.]

The Members of this body are not deceived by this abuse of this privilege, but the people back home, untrained perhaps in parliamentary procedure, may be fooled by it, and they may actually believe the gentleman's superlative recommendation of himself, and they may think that he actually gave this manifestation of feigned forensic power and prowess and preeminence.

In my judgment, gentlemen, the practice of inserting "applause" in the extension of remarks which were never in fact delivered in the Chamber should not be permitted. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER. It is not usually done.

Mr. LANHAM. Fortunately it rarely occurs. I recall an instance in the first session of the Sixty-second Congress. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] then rose and asked unanimous consent that the erroneous insertions of references to applause be stricken from the RECORD. [Applause.] Objection was urged, and then a motion was made that the matter be referred to the appropriate committee, and on a yea-and-nay vote it was so referred.

It occurs to me, gentlemen, that in this present case we ought to protest against this species of involuntary servitude which makes us all slaves to the vivid imagination of the gentleman from New York and keeps us here in our seats applauding his utterances long after the House has adjourned. [Laughter.] In the light of his own delineation of his visionary triumph—as remarkable surely as any of which Don Quixote himself ever dreamed—in view of his own representations of his myth of might in defending a helpless leader even against overwhelming odds and vanquishing the foe as valiantly as ever the dashing Launcelot did in the tilts of old, in memory of the laurels of Webster and Clay and Calhoun, now threatened by this self-assertive wise man of the East, it seems the part of kindness and of caution to say to him as Bassanio once spoke to his friend Gratiano—

> Pray thee, take pains
> To allay with some cold drops of modesty
> Thy skipping spirit.

[Applause and laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, what I have to say might well be entitled "The progress in crime, social disintegration, or degeneracy of the capital of a great nation."

The District of Columbia in 1910 had a population of 331,069 people and in 1920 a population of 437,571, an increase in the 10-year period of 32.2 per cent. It has been estimated that there has been a decrease in the population since the 1920 census of about 40,000 persons to January 1, 1922.

In the District of Columbia there are two courts where crimes are recorded. One is the police court of the District of Columbia, which has two branches, one known as the United States branch and the other as the District branch, each having concurrent jurisdiction. The other court is the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to which reports are made by a grand jury after indictment. This is the court where major crimes are recorded.

The official records show that in 1910 the total number of cases recorded in both branches of the police court of the District of Columbia was 22,779, and in 1920, 42,308, or an increase of 85.7 per cent, whereas in the same period the population had increased only 32.2 per cent.

The total number of cases recorded in both branches of the police court of the District of Columbia in 1921 were 47,736, an increase of 12.9 per cent over the number in 1920, the previous year, with an estimated population of 40,000 less than in the previous year, this latter number of cases being an increase of 100.9 per cent over the number of cases recorded in both branches of the police court of the District of Columbia in 1910.

As traffic cases are recorded in the District branch, some of the increase of cases in that branch may be so accounted for between the cases recorded in 1910 and 1920, but that can not account for the increase in cases between 1920 and 1921.

The total number of recorded cases in each branch of the police court of the District of Columbia has been kept and a classification of recorded cases in the United States branch from 1910 to date, but a classification of recorded cases in the District branch was not begun until December, 1920.

In 1910 there were 5,723 recorded cases in the United States branch of the police court of the District of Columbia, and in 1920, 6,949, which is an increase of 1,226 cases, or 18 per cent.

In 1910 there were 17,056 recorded cases in the District branch of the police court of the District of Columbia, and in 1920, 35,359, which is an increase of 18,303 cases, or 107 per cent.

In 1920 there were 6,949 recorded cases in the United States branch of the police court in the District of Columbia, and in 1921, 7,536 cases, which is an increase of 587 cases, or about 8½ per cent, although the population has been estimated to have been 40,000 less in 1921.

In 1920 there were 35,359 recorded cases in the District branch of the police court in the District of Columbia, and in 1921, 40,200 cases, which is an increase of 4,841 cases, or about 14 per cent, although the population has been estimated to have been 40,000 less in 1921.

An analysis of the cases in the United States branch of the police court of the District of Columbia for 1910 and for 1920 is as follows:

Crime.	1910	1920	Increase or decrease (—), 1910–1920.
			Per cent.
Simple assault	3,459	1,566	—38
Assault to kill	5	15	200
Assault with dangerous weapon	76	147	93
Simple larceny	1,659	1,110	—33
Grand larceny	104	272	161
Forgery	21	36	71
Housebreaking	111	108	— 3
Robbery	52	62	19
Receiving stolen property	4	28	600
Destroying private property	48	91	89
Permitting gaming on premises	80	266	232½
Threats	183	332	81
Assault to rape, attempted rape, and rape	14	7	—50
Adultery	43	65	51
Carnal knowledge	23	30	30
Fornication	131	445	232
Disorderly house	15	50	233

It will be seen from this analysis that although the cases of simple assault were 3,459 in 1910 and 1,566 in 1920, a decrease of 38 per cent, assault to kill increased from 5 to 15, or 200 per cent, and assault with dangerous weapon increased from 76 to 147, or 93 per cent.

It will be seen from this analysis that although cases of simple larceny were 1,659 in 1910 and 1,110 in 1920, a decrease of 33 per cent, and the number of cases of housebreaking were 111 in 1910 and 108 in 1920, a decrease of 3 per cent, that grand larceny increased from 104 in 1910 to 272 in 1920, or 161 per cent, and forgery increased from 21 in 1910 to 36 in 1920, or 71 per cent; robbery increased from 52 in 1911 to 62 in 1920, or 19 per cent; receiving stolen goods increased from 4 in 1910 to 28 in 1920, or 600 per cent.

It also will be seen from this analysis that although the cases of assault to rape, attempted rape, and rape were 14 in 1910 and 7 in 1920, a decrease of 50 per cent, that adultery increased from 43 in 1910 to 65 in 1920, or 51 per cent; carnal knowledge increased from 23 in 1910 to 30 in 1920, or 30 per cent; fornication increased from 131 in 1910 to 435 in 1920, or 232 per cent; and disorderly houses from 15 in 1910 to 50 in 1920, or 233 per cent.

It will be seen from an analysis of the recorded cases in the United States branch of the police court of the District of Columbia for 1921 that there has been the following increase over the recorded cases in 1920:

Simple assault in 1920 was 1,566 and in 1921, 1,897, or an increase of 21 per cent; assault to kill in 1920 was 15 and in 1921, 17, or an increase of 13⅓ per cent; forgery in 1920 was 36 and in 1921, 50, or an increase of 39 per cent; housebreaking in 1920 was 108 and in 1921, 93, or an increase of 50 per cent; destroying private property in 1920 was 91 and in 1921, 106, or an increase of 16 per cent; threats in 1920 was 332 and in 1921, 455, or an increase of 37 per cent; assault to rape, attempted rape, and rape in 1920 was 7 and in 1921, 24, or an increase of 243 per cent.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will, for a very simple question.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman has presented a very clear statement of a deplorable increase in crime. I want to know if he understands that to mean that the power of Congress to maintain peace and good order has not been properly exercised, and that some other power ought to discharge that duty?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will reach that point and answer the question of the honorable Representative a little later in my statement, as he will see. Adultery in 1920 was 65 and in 1921, 92, or an increase of 42 per cent; and disorderly houses in 1920 was 50 and in 1921, 74, or an increase of 48 per cent.

Yet the estimated population of the District of Columbia was 40,000 less in 1921 than in 1920.

An analysis of recorded cases in the District branch of the police court of the District of Columbia—not begun until December, 1920—for each month, under the heading intoxication and disorderly conduct, is as follows:

Month.	Intoxication.	Disorderly conduct.
1920.
December	392	255
1921.
January	430	241
February	399	208
March	471	272
April	545	349
May	540	416
June	449	321
July	485	452
August	506	459
September	506	479
October	598	362
November	425	203
December	501	260

The total number of recorded cases under the heading of intoxication for 1921 being 6,247, and of disorderly conduct for 1921 of 4,367.

There was an increase in December of 1921 over December of 1920 in the number of recorded cases of intoxication of 109, and in the number of recorded cases of disorderly conduct of 5.

The official records show that in 1910 the total number of cases recorded in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to which reports are made by a grand jury after indictment was 548 and in 1920, 1,328, an increase of 142 per cent, whereas in the same period the population in the District of Columbia had increased only 32.2 per cent.

An analysis of the cases in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for 1910 and for 1920, with the exception of murder and manslaughter, is as follows:

Crime.	1910	1920	Increase or decrease (−), 1910–1920.
			Per cent.
Assaults	63	136	116
House breaking and larceny	105	129	23
Grand larceny	66	258	291
Receiving stolen property	3	23	666⅔
Robbery	38	61	61
Forgery	22	54	145
Assault to rape, assault to have carnal knowledge, attempted rape, and rape	12	7	−42
Carnal knowledge	19	27	42
Nonsupport	28	174	522

It will be seen from an analysis of the recorded cases in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for 1921 that there has been the following increase over the recorded cases in 1920:

Housebreaking and larceny in 1920 was 129 and in 1921 165, or an increase of 28 per cent; robbery in 1920 was 61 and in 1921 75, or an increase of 56 per cent; forgery in 1920 was 54 and in 1921 64, or an increase of 18½ per cent; and assault to rape, assault to have carnal knowledge, attempted rape, and rape in 1920 was 7 and in 1921 21, or an increase of 200 per cent.

The police department of the District of Columbia reports that in 1910 there were 7 cases of murder and 6 cases of manslaughter, making a total of 13 cases; that in 1920 there were 38 cases of murder and 23 cases of manslaughter, making a total of 61, or an increase of 443 per cent in murder and 243 per cent in manslaughter, and an increase in the total of both of 369 per cent.

The report for 1921 is 44 cases of murder, 29 cases of manslaughter, making a total of 73, or an increase in one year of 16 per cent in murder, 26 per cent in manslaughter, and an increase in the total of both of 20 per cent, with an estimated population of 40,000 less than in 1920.

These statistics furnished by the police department of the District of Columbia compared with the statistics found in "American Police Systems" by Fosdick, as well as the last returns from London, show that there is a much greater number of murders in the District of Columbia than in London; in 1920 there were 15 cases in London and 38 cases in the District of Columbia; that Scotland, with a population ten times as great as the District of Columbia, has from 100 to 300 per cent less murders; and that the District of Columbia, not excepting New York and Chicago, has the highest rate per capita of murders of any city in the world.

For this great increase in crime the police department of the District of Columbia is in no way responsible, as all its time must be taken to apprehend offenders.

Divorces are granted in the District of Columbia for adultery only. The records of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia disclose that in 1910 181 cases were recorded and in 1920 309 cases, or an increase of 71 per cent.

The juvenile court had a total in 1910 of 2,925 cases and in 1920 a total of 4,094 cases, which is an increase of about 40 per cent.

It is said that statistics similar to those which have been given exist throughout the United States particularly in relation to larger cities. If this is true, then the American Republic is not in revolution but in dissolution; not in evolution but in devolution.

Many causes can be assigned for this amazing, startling, and portentious phenomena.

One of the causes for this phenomenon is undoubtedly the character of the legislation passed during the last eight or nine years by the Congress of the United States, the methods employed for its enactment and a consequent loss of respect by the people for these laws and for all law, and the holding of Congress in contempt rather than in esteem or reverence. If this is true, the District of Columbia being in such close association with Congress would be more acutely affected than the rest of the United States.

During these years the people have seen the Congress of the United States controlled neither by principle, courage, nor unselfish devotion to the public weal but surrendering itself and its power for the making of laws subserviently and docilely to the will of others and acting the demagogue for selfish purposes as never before.

Mr. HAMMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not. It has seen an abject and obedient Congress pass laws of profound importance dictated to it by liberally financed and highly organized minorities outside of Congress, sometimes for purely personal economic ends of the minorities, sometimes sumptuary laws from sectarian sources, sometimes laws dictated by "blocs" or minorities within Congress itself for purely selfish class purposes or purposes purely of reprisal.

Laws passed by such Congresses and under these conditions can not help lessening the obedience to the laws themselves which are so imposed and in turn to all laws.

The example of Congress in refusing to obey the mandatory injunction of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution to reduce representation in proportion to disfranchisement in violation of their oaths of office, thereby making elections to the House of Representatives and to the Presidency unconstitutional and violating the first principle of the purity of the ballot, can not but have its profound effect on the authority of laws enacted by such a law-making body.

Congresses which audaciously and contumaciously refuse obedience to the fundamental law which governs them, namely the Constitution, can neither expect nor receive obedience to its laws or directions.

Another cause of penetrating effect is the lessening by law of individual freedom and individual responsibility.

But more than all these is the destruction and elimination of the American home where no longer does the child know to whom to turn for authority and direction, and from which modern industrialism has subtracted parental care, and State supervision and intrusion weakened parental obligations.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 15 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee which prepared this bill, I wish to submit a few remarks concerning it.

In most instances the members of the committee were unanimous in arriving at their findings. In a number of instances, however, it was necessary for the chairman to submit various propositions to a vote of the committee. In this case, as in all others, by no means all of the findings have been unanimous. For instance, the item concerning an additional supply of water for the District of Columbia was not taken out of the bill by a unanimous vote. Speaking only for myself, I wish to say that for some time past I have believed that an additional water supply for the District of Columbia should be looked to. The question, however, has not been fairly, frankly, and honestly put to Congress by the local press. The local press has placed the demand for an additional water supply solely and entirely upon the theory that the water system had reached its limit of supply. That is not correct. The local press claims that the limit of supply is 70,000,000 gallons a day, and that during the war the peak was virtually reached by delivering to the people of the District of Columbia that quantity of water. They have never disclosed to Congress or to the people of the District of Columbia that the actual capacity of the conduit is not 70,000,000 but 90,000,000 gallons a day. I make that statement unhesitatingly, and the engineer department of the District of Columbia is not going to dispute it, for with that department lies the knowledge. I do believe, however, notwithstanding the fact that we have never approached the maximum capacity of the conduit by 20,000,000 gallons a day, that still there ought to be an additional conduit built, so that if anything should happen to the present conduit the great army of employees who are here should not be deprived of water, that the people who are not in the Government employ should not be deprived, and that public work should not cease because of the possible breakage of the conduit.

The conduit was well built; I think about 59 years ago. From that time until now there has been no serious mishap to it, and the probabilities are that there may not be such for many years. Yet, like the calamity in the theater which has just fallen down, it is always the unexpected that happens. For that reason I advocate the building of another conduit from the Falls to the District line.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS], who is on the subcommittee, is, in my judgment, one of the most valuable Members of this body. He goes to the bottom of things, and his conclusions, when reached, are most valuable, indeed. He has taken the plans submitted by the engineer department, or if not by the engineer department, then by acknowledged good engineers, and has analyzed them; and, if I am correctly informed, I believe he has all but convinced them that their plans for the water, after it has been brought to the line of the District of Columbia, are not feasible. I believe he has shown them, as he has shown me, that much of the water when brought to the District of Columbia through the present conduit, and more particularly that which may be brought through a new conduit, will, if present tentative plans are followed, be distributed largely throughout the District by power rather than by gravity, as he contends, and I believe, can be done.

Therefore I do not insist that anything more be done respecting bringing more water into the District than the building of another, parallel, conduit. By the time that is completed the plans for distributing the water throughout the District can be established on a correct and proper plan.

For a year or two now the local press, and particularly one paper, would make the people believe that they were standing on the very verge of a water famine. No such thing is threatened, and no such thing will threaten unless, as I say, it is the unexpected that happens, and against that certainly provision should be made.

Congress and the people of the District of Columbia are not treated fairly by the local press. Congress is misled and the people are led into apprehension when no cause for it really exists. Take, for instance, the old Aqueduct Bridge across the Potomac River from Georgetown to the Virginia side. For several years we heard nothing else through the local papers, especially in times of ice in the river, except that the bridge was going to fall down.

Every morning the people of the District of Columbia and Members of Congress rose expecting to see headlines in the papers that the bridge had fallen to pieces. But the bridge still stands, and when more than a million dollars had been appropriated to build a new bridge alongside the old one the clamor ceased. But what do you think! When the bridge nears completion many people and some of the newspapers are asking that the old bridge be permitted to stand for heavy traffic.

Twelve or 14 years ago there was a clamor here which misled the people and Members of Congress to believe that there was no place to keep valuable papers from theft and fire; that they were at the mercy of the innumerable thieves which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has just spoken of, and at the mercy of fire. Day after day that was hammered into the heads of Members of Congress and the public at large made to believe it. Then Congress, yielding to that clamor, purchased a site for a building in which to store the papers. A piece of property on Pennsylvania Avenue, immediately across from the Treasury Department, was bought for that purpose. As soon as the property was purchased upon which to erect the building the newspapers ceased their clamor and demand for a safe place for the valuable papers of our Nation. The sale of the land was the first thing in their mind, and the safety of the papers was only secondary, if at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Gladly.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice a similar clamor now for the purchase of another site for an archives building, and it is only three or four weeks ago that the United States gave the site on the Mall at Pennsylvania Avenue and Sixth Street, which would have been a beautiful site and situation for an archives building. What do we find now. We find that they do not want to use the land there, but want to buy more property behind the Navy Department for a new site for an archives building, and we will have that before us in a day or two for consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is always a demand in the District of Columbia being made on Congress to purchase property, but never on Congress to use property that already belongs to the Government. Only a few years ago the local press clamored and demanded that the property on Pennsylvania Avenue, on the south side of the street, just this side of Fifteenth Street, should be purchased for a public building. The clamor continued until the property was bought. Instantly after the property was bought and the money was paid the clamor ended. There stands the property now where the Poli Theater is and there is no more demand except as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested that they can sell more land.

The other day we heard discussed, particularly by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], the activities of Mr. Moore, a member of the Fine Arts Commission. Comparatively a few years ago this gentleman was the secretary of a Senator. Then he conceived the creation of parks; and, consequently, the purchase of land. His ideas have broadened and broadened, until now the Botanic Garden must be abandoned and put beyond the reach of those for whom it was established; and another piece of property must be bought for the Botanic Garden. The property to be bought is on the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River and is beyond the reach of those for whom the Botanic Garden was intended. We have the principal man in the Fine Arts Commission practically abandoning the real work for which he was selected, that of passing on statues, that we may have no ugly things of that kind in the streets or parks of the District of Columbia, and becoming more interested in making sales of additional land for Federal and District purposes, when God knows they already have an abundance of unused land.

But there is another secret about the thing, and that is, by act of Congress passed in 1883, I believe, the United States Government makes the District of Columbia a present of all the rents derived from Federal-owned reservations in the District of Columbia. That rent is given to the District of Columbia as a present; and throughout all these long years the Government of the United States has been compelled to put up dollar for dollar against that generous gift in order to comply with the terms of the half-and-half principle.

The next item in the report which I wish to discuss is "Sinking fund and interest."

The act of June 11, 1874, provides, with reference to that item, as follows:

SEC. 12. The sinking-fund commissioners of said District are hereby continued; and it shall be the duty of said sinking-fund commissioners to cause bonds of the District of Columbia to be prepared, in sums of $50 and $500, bearing date August 1, 1874, payable 50 years after date, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, to be signed by the secretary and the treasurer of said sinking-fund commissioners and countersigned by the comptroller of said District, and sealed as the board may direct, which bonds shall be exempt from taxation by Federal, State, or municipal authority, engraved and printed at the expense of the District of Columbia, and in form not inconsistent herewith. And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity. Said bonds shall be numbered consecutively, and registered in the office of the comptroller of said District, and shall also be registered in the office of the Register of the Treasury of the United States, for which last-named registration the Secretary of the Treasury shall make such provision as may be necessary. And said commissioners shall use all necessary means for the prevention of any unauthorized or fraudulent issue of any of such bonds. And the said sinking-fund commissioners are hereby authorized to exchange said bonds at par for like sums of any class of indebtedness in the preceding section of this act named, including sewer taxes or assessments paid, evidence by certificates of the auditing board provided for in this act.

Only a few days ago we saw nearly a column of editorial opinion in the local press to the effect that Congress was breaking faith with the holders of the 3.65 bonds by not continuing to pay them on the basis of 50–50, but instead proposes to pay them on the basis of 60–40. Nearly a column of editorial matter was devoted to that subject, and the contention was made that it was not just. What does that act say? Does the act which authorized these bonds say that they shall be paid on the basis of 50–50 or 60–40? No. Instead it says that they shall be paid—by proper proportional appropriation.

So that if Congress considers the proper proportion to be 60–40, then the law which authorized those bonds has been complied with and no one can be hurt. If the bondholder gets his money dollar for dollar with accrued interest, what right has he to complain? Absolutely none. Yet here comes the local press of the District of Columbia admitting that notwithstanding the fact that other items could be legitimately paid on the basis of 60–40, yet this item must be paid by the proportion of 50–50 to be in accordance with the law, when, as I have just read from the act, no certain proportion was then established.

The 50–50 basis about which you have heard so much has never been sacred. No proportion has ever been established by Congress that Congress, in its wisdom, might not change. When the 50–50 plan of 1878 was before this body for adoption, this House did not at first pass it at 50–50. As a matter of fact, it came very nearly passing it at 75 per cent to be paid by the District of Columbia and 25 per cent to be paid by the National Government. Finally it was passed on exactly the basis now obtaining, 60–40. When the matter went to the Senate, that body changed it to 50–50, and the conferees arrived at a settlement of the matter by establishing the proportion at 50–50.

Recurring again to the bonds: During the Shepherd régime, which ended in 1874, the District of Columbia, in its then three existing subdivisions, the city of Washington, the city of Georgetown, and the remainder of the county, were indebted to the amount of about $22,000,000. The whole administration for the then three and one-half years preceding had been so corrupt that Congress took the administration out of their hands and adopted the present form of government. There was no way to pay the debts that the District of Columbia or the three municipalities then owed. Congress came to the rescue, furnished a greater portion of the money actually paid, and authorized the District of Columbia to issue $15,000,000 worth of bonds, now known as the 3.65 bonds. Those bonds were hawked about the District of Columbia and about neighboring cities for 50 cents on the dollar. Speculators bought them. Then, when they had bought them, they got them included in the act of 1878, and put them on the 50–50 basis. Then they were certain to get their money, and immediately the bonds went to par. That is not half the story, however. Whoever heard of a municipality redeeming its bonds at above par?

What man to-day who owes a note in bank is expected to pay more than the principal and interest when he goes to pay his note? Yet we have here in this city of crime, just described by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], the condition that these bonds have been retired at a premium, and approximately three-quarters of a million dollars have been paid as premium to the local financial institutions that obtained them at less than 60 cents on the dollar. Subsequent to the issue of those bonds a statute was passed which provided that they should not be taken in at exceeding par. That has been ignored. The acknowledged principle throughout the financial world that payment of debts and accrued interest discharges the debts has been ignored, and to this good hour, in defiance of the obligation to pay principal and interest only and in defiance of the congressional direction that these bonds should not be retired at above par, they are being taken in and retired at a premium. As I just said, approximately three-quarters of a million dollars have been paid in excess of the face value and accrued interest on these bonds. Provision is made in this bill appropriating $400,000 for "interest and sinking fund" for the purpose of retiring more of these 3.65 bonds. They will be due in 1924. The committee has seen fit to follow the plan that relates to the proportion as between the National Government and the District of Columbia and has placed the retirement of these bonds on the 60–40 basis, like the other appropriations are made, and have undertaken to stop the retirement of them at 50–50. Why in the name of common sense, why in the name of common justice, should the United States Government be compelled to take the people's money and retire bonds at a premium when the law upon the question says that they shall not be retired at a premium?

The United States is only guarantor of the bonds.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not quite understand just how they have been retired at a premium. Perhaps my dullness is to blame for that, but I have not understood it yet.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Every year Congress appropriates a sum of money with which to retire the 3.65 bonds.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Heretofore the appropriation in this bill has been $975,000 per annum. This is the first time it ever dropped to $400,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is because the bonds mature in 1924, and now nearly all of them have been retired through this sinking fund plan.

Mr. DAVIS. Did the gentleman make it plain that we have included a limitation whereby we preclude a further retirement of the bonds above par?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am getting to that. Further answering the gentleman from Tennessee: When the holder of any of these bonds wants money or an unlawful profit, he goes to the Treasurer of the United States, and under a precedent wrongfully and illegally established years ago by his predecessors, this man is paid 105 or 106 or 107 for every dollar's worth of these bonds, together with accrued interest. As has just been suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota, there is a limitation in the bill repeating the law that none of the $400,000 shall be used to retire any of these bonds at above par and accrued interest.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Had the bonds matured that have been retired?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They have not. The bonds mature, as I just said, in 1924.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did the Treasurer redeem at the price on the open market?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There was but one market for them, and that was made by the Treasurer's willingness to buy them at a premium.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was just going to lead up to that—to ask if the fact that it was known that the Treasurer would be willing to pay a certain price, notwithstanding the law that confined him to par, fixed the market price for the bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think that is inevitable; I think that fixed the market price. It is contended that in 1888, I believe, the Treasurer was authorized to buy these bonds for the sinking fund. There is no question as to this authority to buy them for retirement, but there still stares him in the face, whenever he makes a purchase, the law that he must buy them at not exceeding par.

If this Congress did its full duty it would compel the Attorney General of the United States to sue every Treasurer on his bond who has abused this law.

The next item that I find in the report, concerning which I wish to make some comment, is under the title of "Streets." If I am correctly advised, the engineer officer having charge of the construction and repair of streets asked the Budget for $2,000,000. If I am still correctly advised we can not ascertain whether or not that is true, for the reason—and I qualify it again by saying if I am correctly advised—the various departments have been forbidden by the Budget to disclose what the various departments asked for. Therefore you can take that statement only for what it is worth without verification; but it comes to me in such a way that I believe that the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia asked for $2,000,000 with which to build and repair streets. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia, again if I am correctly informed, in their recommendations to the Budget asked for $800,000 for street purposes. In so far as the committee has been able to ascertain, without rhyme or reason, the Budget cut the sum down to about $200,,000, and this committee has kept itself within the amount provided by the Budget.

If that recommendation upon the part of the Budget was adhered to strictly, and Congress adheres to the same proposition, then Congress is bound and gagged by the Budget Commission, and can not give another farthing to build or repair streets no matter how badly they are needed. I speak only for myself in saying that I through the hearings and still am willing that Congress may exercise its good judgment, and not be bound by the Budget recommendations, and give to the District of Columbia the streets that it ought to have. The committee went about the city for the purpose of viewing the streets, and they viewed those recommended by the Budget and they also viewed many of those which had been recommended by the commissioners and some in addition which have been recommended by the engineer department to the commissioners. I for one was not blind to the fact that when we came to a street solidly built up on both sides, and that the automobiles in which we rode had to straddle ruts and gulleys in order to keep the axles of the automobiles from dragging the ground, believe that those streets ought to be repaired, notwithstanding that the Government has placed itself in the unfortunate and unjustifiable position of undertaking to pay half, or nearly half, the expenses of the District of Columbia. Since that unwise thing has been done to-day, it can not be avoided, and we ought to comply with the practice that a former Congress has recognized, that if certain streets, where houses are built up solidly on both sides, are impassable in wintertime that they ought to be paved, and if there is no other way to repair them except on the 60–40 basis they ought to be repaired. For instance, let us take Connecticut Avenue. That is a highway and thoroughfare from the Nation's Capital into the adjoining State of Maryland.

That is the one thoroughfare, which above others, leads to the magnificent system of highways which they have in Maryland, and which lead to the great national highway halfway across the continent, which was established through the efforts of Henry Clay nearly 100 years ago, and which to-day is one of the great thoroughfares of our Nation. A short while ago Congress made an appropriation to repair the east side of Connecticut Avenue. Mind you now, the east side of Connecticut Avenue can be used for vehicles going only in one direction, and that is out toward Maryland. The other side, the western side of Connecticut Avenue, is in a very bad condition. I asked myself, and I am unable to give an answer to my own question: Why persons going toward Maryland can have a good road over which to travel while those who come from Maryland into the District have a very bad road over which to travel? For myself, I was willing in committee, and am willing now, to improve that side of Connecticut Avenue. There are other smaller streets which are in a deplorable condition; but the Budget, as it relates to the District of Columbia, comes down to one single individual; one man who by his ipse dixit has said that this street, or the other street, shall be repaired, and that another shall not be repaired or built. I know not upon what meat he has fed that enables him to determine with such accuracy as to bind Congress that a street, although it be impassable, should not be repaired.

The Eastern High School——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Before the gentleman leaves "Streets," will he yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did I understand the gentleman to say that by order of the Budget the various departments of the Government were prevented from disclosing the estimates which have been submitted to the Budget?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make that statement without having available any member of the various departments to whom those instructions have been given to prove the statement.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman knows as to the District budget. May I ask the gentleman if it is a fact that the subcommittee on the District of Columbia appropriation bill were unable to ascertain what estimates have been made by the commissioners and forwarded to the Director of the Budget?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; that is not quite correct. In a way every member of the District subcommittee which made up this bill ascertained what those estimates were; but, further answering the gentleman's question, my information is that the various departments have been forbidden to disclose what recommendations were made to the Budget. One from a department will tell you that, but tell you so in confidence.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I make a remark to the gentleman apropos of what he is saying now?

I read the hearings that were had before the subcommittee and noted the fact that the chairman of the subcommittee was very disinclined to go into the action of the Bureau of the Budget in respect to any item, and after the bill was presented here that we are now considering, I inquired of the Commissioners of the District as to what their estimates were which they submitted to the Bureau of the Budget and as to the faith of those estimates, and I have a memorandum here in my hand, quite a voluminous one, which shows what the estimates were that were presented to the bureau by the commissioners, and showing the eliminations and reductions that were made by the bureau. Why those reductions and eliminations were made I do not know. No one seems to know. There is not any explanation. They were made by Gen. Dawes and former Senator Sherman, in so far as we can ascertain from the hearings. They may have been made arbitrarily; they may have been made reasonably; but a little later I expect to put in the RECORD this statement, which I think will prove of very great interest to the Members. It bears as largely upon the matter of the repair of the streets as upon any other subject to which the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky has been alluding.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that I got hold of the same paper that he has. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia were disposed to give to the committee all the information they had. I do not believe they withheld anything that they could give to the committee, and, in a way, they gave to the committee the paper the gentleman just spoke of. It was beyond my purpose to speak of the other departments of the Government until asked by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] concerning them, but I can say to him, but only with the qualification that I can not establish what I say, although it comes to me in such a way that I firmly believe it, that the other departments were instructed to withhold their estimates made to the Budget.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] just a moment ago spoke of the estimates for street work as having been made by Gen. Dawes and ex-Senator Sherman, of Illinois. If I correctly understood Gen. Dawes he had nothing whatever to do with the making of any estimate for the District of Columbia other than to approve a paper which was made out and handed to him by ex-Senator Sherman, of Illinois.

I was about to speak of another street——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Did ex-Senator Sherman have any official connection with the Budget or any other department of the Government at the time of handing in the paper to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Sherman then was and now is an ex-Member of the United States Senate from the State of Illinois, continuing, for how long I have no information, his residence here. While here he was called in by Gen. Dawes, of the Budget, and asked to make up the estimates for the District of Columbia. I have no information upon the subject, but I am of the opinion that he served without compensation, and, consequently, that he held no official position with the Government.

Again, I wish to say, I was about to speak of another street, and as a prelude to that it is necessary to mention the Eastern High School. The Eastern High School is being erected, not in the midst of a community from which school children may come, but it is being erected at a jumping-off place into the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River. That school may be able to get children from one direction, but by the river it is denied from getting children from the other direction. If I were willing to take the time and had verified the information upon the subject which has been given to me, I might account for the reason of its location, but not having those reasons verified I shall not discuss them.

But, reverting to streets, there are streets that lead to this school. A mistake has been made in building the Eastern High School upon its present site. It is now too late to go behind that mistake. Those who live on this side of the schoolhouse and who can get to it must have streets. Those streets are not provided for in this bill. The question now arises, Shall Congress build those streets, or shall it remain bound and gagged and not given liberty to speak, not given liberty to spend the money which the people of the United States have put into their hands for these very purposes?

The next item in the report to which I wish to address myself is the police department.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Did the Director of the Budget submit to the Appropriations Committee estimates on items for the improvement of streets leading to the Eastern High School?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. My memory does not serve me sufficiently well to state with accuracy. Therefore I will defer an answer until I have looked at the estimates, unless the chairman of the committee can advise me.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman is in favor of building streets to this school?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can see no use of building the schoolhouse if means of getting to the school are denied.

The next item to which I wish to address myself is the police department. The commissioners are asking for more policemen. This bill does not provide for more; and, in my judgment, it very wisely declines to provide for more. When the war was on and the White House of necessity should be guarded, and well guarded, 55 policemen were put to guarding the White House. Everything is now serenely peaceful. The President is not menaced from any quarter that we are advised of or that we can see, and yet that number of policemen remains at the White House. I do not wish to be questioned about it, for good reasons, and perhaps for obvious reasons. But the committee favors guards be placed around the White House who come directly under the control of the President. Indirectly the President may be able to say what guards shall be there, and who shall not be there. But under the present arrangement the authorities of the Metropolitan police force assign as many there as they may see fit to assign, and they assign whom they see fit. I am sufficiently well advised to be able to state that it is a far better and more acceptable plan that these policemen over whom the President has no direct control be taken away and that either guards under the supervision and control of the President's aid be placed there or that soldiers from Fort Myer be brought in, in relays, to guard the White House. For that reason, and for the additional reason that the President's aid says that 20 men are ample to protect the White House, this committee has not authorized any more policemen.

I come next to the title of "Charities and corrections." There are more abuses indulged in at the expense of the taxpayers under that title than under any other within this bill. Let us take, for instance, the Columbia Hospital. The Columbia Hospital is a lying-in institution. It is built upon Government land and it was built with public money. Then a private corporation steps in and takes charge of the institution and operates it. It is not economically operated. It has nearly as many paid officials as it has patients. Because this private corporation has the operation of the institution without any limit being placed on the overhead charges by Congress, extravagance is indulged in to a woeful extent. Notwithstanding that, the place is patronized by approaching mothers so extensively that it has accumulated some money. With a surplus of nearly $40,000 piled up in their coffers, money which they say does not belong to them, money which they admit should go into the Treasury of the United States, is held by them and is invested in securities. Holding this sum of nearly $40,000 in cash and in securities, they come to Congress and ask for an appropriation of $20,000 for an addition to the building. Not only do they want an addition to the building but they want what they call a linen chute built into the institution; that is, a chute through which to drop soiled linen from one floor to another down to the laundry. The Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Elliott Woods, has charge of the property, and he has not been made acquainted with the plans and specifications by which this chute is to be built. They want to build it out of this surplus fund at a cost of approximately $5,000, and they want to use it without authority of law.

Now, the committee is advised that Mr. Woods is uncertain as to whether their plan for building the chute will injure the building or not, but he is certain that it can be built for 25 or 30 per cent less than they propose to pay for it out of money in their hands belonging to the Treasury of the United States.

This bill contains an appropriation for the $20,000 to make the addition to the building, but with a limit placed upon it that the money shall not be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, but out of the surplus fund which this private corporation holds and yet admits is the property of the United States.

In some of the homes for the children, for some unfortunate children, they build them upon what they call the cottage plan. Every time they need a new building or more room for an increased number of children or occupants, whether they be old or young, they build another house. When they build it they build a reception room downstairs in each one of these cottages, and they build a kitchen and a dining room, and perhaps a room for the matron; and then above they build, not a dormitory for the accommodation of a number, but they build them so as to give each and every occupant a separate room. The unfortunate girls, wayward girls, who have been picked up and taken out to one of those institutions, are each given a separate room instead of placing them all in a dormitory. By having separate rooms for them the number of matrons can be increased, and the number of employees can be increased, and by adopting that particular plan they have a kitchen in every one of these institutions; they also have a separate dining room in every one of them, and they have everything separate, just as if they were different private residences, instead of supplying the food for everybody from one kitchen, and instead of having a dormitory for the entire number of girls or boys who are there.

It is bad management, but this committee can not correct it. All that it can do is to do the best it can toward making provision for the maintenance of those institutions. Under the 5-minute rule I contemplate saying more on this subject

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRAGO). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. How much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I shall give myself five minutes longer.

Another limitation to which I wish to invite attention hurriedly is this:

Provided, That no charge for copying, or for filing, indexing, and recording, greater than fixed by law, shall be made.

That applies to the office of the recorder of deeds. Under the law for this and several preceding fiscal years the recorder of deeds is authorized to pay to those who do the recording 40 per cent of all the money he collects. Mind you, 40 per cent of all the money he collects; but he collects nearly twice as much from everybody who has business in his office as the permanent law authorizes him to collect. So this limitation is provided to prevent the public having wills and deeds and mortgages to record from paying an illegal fee.

Congress should not continue in the open field of appropriating illegal fees collected by this office.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I have heard of some complaint about its being four or possibly five months before a deed or other instrument filed in the recorder's office is recorded and returned to the person who filed it, and I understand their contention is that Congress will not furnish them with new machines or give them sufficient clerical force, and so forth. What does the gentleman know about that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. During the hearings it was disclosed that the committee was perfectly willing to give all the modern appliances necessary to facilitate the activities of that office, but the recorder of deeds stated that he was forbidden by law to put in modern copying machines, and also that he was forbidden by law to depart from the present antiquated system of running the office. The committee has not been able to find any such law; but in order not to delay the bringing in of this bill they have passed that part of it over until another time, with the hope, however, that this limitation will be adopted, thus relieving the public of paying unlawful fees. If there is great delay in getting deeds recorded, not probably, perhaps, but at least possibly, that delay is being used to collect illegal fees for hasty recording.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield further there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. My recollection of the statement which I heard made at a public meeting which I happened to attend some weeks ago is that during the war, if my recollection is correct, the number of instruments filed for record ran up to about 55,000 a year, and that it has dropped down now to about forty thousand and odd a year. Can the gentleman tell me how many employees they have engaged in that work down there, so we can form some idea as to how many each employee records?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not remember. I think something like 75. I will ask the chairman of the committee if he remembers.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not remember the exact number.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Is it not a fact that the gentleman himself requested a legal opinion on the question to which his attention has just been directed; that is, the right of a person to use better methods in the conduct of that office, and that that opinion was promised but has not yet arrived?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is quite true.

Another limitation that the committee has placed in the bill is this:

Provided, That none of the money appropriated by this act shall be paid or obligated toward the construction of or addition to any building the whole and entire construction of which shall not have been awarded in one or a single contract to the lowest bidder complying with all the legal requirements as to a deposit of money or the execution of a bond, or both, for the faithful performance of the contract: Provided further, That this limitation shall in no wise apply to contracts already awarded; nor shall it be construed to impair the legal rights or status of any unsuccessful bidder on a contract already awarded: Provided further, That no architect's fee shall be paid or obligated for plans, specifications, or any professional services whatever, unless they are such as will enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or those letting a contract, to secure a legal bid within the amount authorized by Congress for the building or other project: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as repealing existing law giving the commissioners the right to reject all bids.

Let us take, for instance, the Eastern High School, to exemplify the necessity for this limitation. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia did not advertise for bids for the construction of the Eastern High School as a whole. They did, however, ask for bids for constructing the first two floors of it. That contract was awarded to the lowest bidder, who erected those two stories in full compliance with the plans and specifications and to the satisfaction of those who awarded the contract. When those two stories were built bids were asked by the Commissioners for the superstructure. The man who built the first two stories was the lowest bidder for the superstructure. His bid was rejected and the contract was given to another bidder who was higher, the amount of difference being approximately between $20,000 and $30,000. The law which requires the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to award contracts has been most flagrantly ignored and violated.

Now, let us look at this Eastern High School proposition. One contract was made for the completion of the first two floors. Another contract was given for the building of the superstructure, with the heating apparatus, the lighting apparatus, and many other things left out of that contract. Now, when they let these contracts by piecemeal, with a year, perhaps, intervening between the first and the last, how are they to know what a building is going to cost? It is not unreasonable to entertain the suspicion that it is purposely done; that in the beginning the architect draws plans and specifications for a building that can not be completed within the money; and next that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shut their eyes to that; and, for the purpose of getting more money than Congress is willing to give them, let these contracts by piecemeal.

This proviso also requires that no architect shall be paid any fee for his professional services in preparing plans and specifications unless he prepare such as provide for a house that can be built within the amount of money appropriated by Congress for that purpose. In addition to that, the limitation requires that the contract must be let as a whole and at one time. Then they can know for certain that the building can be erected within the appropriation. In addition to that this proviso requires that the lowest bidder be given the contract, if he complies with such cash deposit and the execution of such bond for the faithful performance of the contract as the law may require. The man who built the first two floors of the Eastern High School and who was the lowest bidder on the superstructure was denied the contract for that. Yet since then he has been given another contract by these same commissioners who refused to give him the contract for that superstructure of the Eastern High School. If this proviso is adopted—and the Lord knows it should be in order to stop these abuses—then untold thousands of dollars will be saved to the taxpayers of the District of Columbia and the United States, and the government of the District of Columbia will be saved from further scandal.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. MANN. If the law shall be that contracts shall be let as a whole and must be let within the limit of cost, what is the necessity of the provision in reference to the architect?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The necessity arises out of what I understand to be the practice, that when the architect prepares his plans and specifications and the District Commissioners accept them, then partial payments are advanced to him, and, as the work progresses, he receives more and more of his commission, until when the work is completed the money is gone and his plans and specifications have not been in accordance with the requirements made by Congress.

Mr. MANN. The work will not progress unless the contract is let.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly not, but they have been making these contracts by piecemeal on plans and specifications which provided for more houses than could be built with the authorized money.

Mr. MANN. But if that provision goes in, what is the necessity of the provision in reference to the architect? Of course, the architect can not tell exactly what a building is going to cost.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I must say to the gentleman that the architect can tell.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, no architect can tell——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's pardon, and I will cite an instance. I, myself, wanted to build a house. I had just $40,000 and no more to put into it. I went to one of the best architects in the city of Louisville, and he drew me plans and specifications. I said to him, "Can this house be built for $40,000?" He said, "Yes; I think it can." I said, "You say you think it can. Can it be done? Let us advertise for bidders and see if it can be done." We did so, and the lowest bid we got was $60,000. I said to him, "Tear up your plans and specifications. I do not want them." Then he remodeled his plans, and we had the house built for $42,000.

Mr. MANN. True; and even then it cost more; but I say the architect can not tell exactly what a building that he plans is going to cost. Will not the result be that you will have to get a cheap architect?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; this plan will compel the getting of the best architects, those who are competent to make plans and specifications that will come within the limit authorized.

Mr. MANN. Of course they always try to come pretty near the limit. I am afraid that the result will be bad, and I do not see the necessity of it if you require them to make one contract and that within the limit of cost.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; but Congress does not deal with the architect; it deals with those who let the contract, and those who let the contract continue to ignore the expressed will of Congress.

Mr. WINGO. If they violate one law, what assurance have you that they will obey the new one?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They are violating nearly every one on the statute books.

Mr. WINGO. How are you going to stop it, by piling up laws?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There are several ways that it can be stopped. The President of the United States can appoint commissioners who will comply with the law, and if those appointed do not comply with the law this body can impeach them, and I for one have expressed my willingness with others who will join to prefer charges against the next man who willfully and flagrantly violates the plain provisions of the law. Further, under this limitation no money can be paid by the auditor in violation of its terms.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield before he leaves this question of schools?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am asking for information on a matter that I have thought about ever since I have been in Congress. I do not understand about it, and as the gentleman has had long years of experience I would like his idea about it. Congress formerly appropriated on the 50–50 plan, but this is on the 60–40. The total amount authorized in your bill for schools is $6,857,260, and I presume 40 per cent of that is paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I can see where 40 per cent out of the Treasury of the United States can be paid for paving, water, parks, beautifying the Capital, and all that, but I want the gentleman's idea as to the justice of why we should pay 40 cents toward the education of those people who are fortunate enought to live in Washington?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In my hurry on account of limited time, that is too broad a field for me to go into just now. If the gentleman will read some of the many speeches I have made on the floor of this House during the last 15 years against that very principle, he will have all of my argument against the justice of it.

Here is another limitation we have incorporated in the bill:

Provided, That none of the money appropriated in this act shall be available for the payment of jurors' fees unless the actual cost of the trial jury be taxed as part of the costs, and judgment rendered therefor, to be paid by the unsuccessful litigant: Provided further, That no person in default of payment thereof shall be imprisoned on that account.

We have a law in the District of Columbia relative to criminal cases, which says that the court may assess jury fees as part of the costs. Those of whom I have inquired tell me that seldom, if ever, is it done. If the owner of a Pierce-Arrow automobile, living in a $500,000 house with several hundred thousand dollars of furnishings, drives down the street and violates a traffic law, comes into the court and asks to be tried by a jury, which jury costs $50, and he is fined $5, he walks out scot free from the payment of the costs. Since the courts have not exercised the right to tax jurors' fees as costs, this proviso has been put in the bill to compel it.

One of the local papers the other day said that this limitation was unconstitutional. I do not know what constitutional lawyer wrote the article on the subject, but we all know that under the Constitution a man is entitled to a trial by jury in certain instances. The courts are clogged because of jury trials, for which unsuccessful litigants do not pay, although they may be abundantly able to do so. Congress is asked to establish more courts largely because people who are perfectly able to pay are not compelled to pay jurors' fees. The establishment of some new courts can be avoided if you enact this proviso into law. How is it unconstitutional? A prisoner goes into court and is entitled to a trial by jury and demands a jury. If the court can not give him a jury, then he is not tried; but if the court does give him a jury, he must pay the costs if he be found guilty. He may not be compelled to pay the costs unless he is able to pay or unless the United States marshal can levy on property sufficient to pay the costs of the trial. So much for that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would that proviso apply except in civil cases?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am not certainly advised as to the law about taxing costs in civil cases beyond an expression of an opinion of some of the District officials who were in the committee room at the time this matter was up. They said that in all civil proceedings jury costs were taxed, but that in the criminal courts it was discretionary with the courts to tax jurors' fees, and that it was an unusual case when they were taxed at all.

Mr. MANN. Is there no provision in the District about allowing a poor person to litigate without costs?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am not advised as to that; but this limitation provides that nobody shall be imprisoned for the nonpayment of this particular part of the costs. The law as to the other class of cases would remain unchanged. However, if a poor person can not litigate without the payment of costs—I mean one unable to pay—he should be permitted to do so; but this committee has no jurisdiction of that subject.

Mr. MANN. This would cover that case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We hoped it might.

Mr. MANN. It would cover the case, if the law does now. In most States there is permission granted for a poor person to litigate by order of the court without cost.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to say that this proviso does not apply to civil cases at all.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it applies to all cases.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This certainly refers to jurors' fees in criminal cases and, perhaps, in civil cases.

Mr. MANN. But what the gentleman said was that it was customary to tax the costs in civil cases, and that this would not change that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We were not certain as to that, not having the exact facts of the matter before us, the committee deemed it best to use the language we did use in the limitation.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. But the gentleman's limitation provides that in criminal cases a man can not be imprisoned for failure to pay these costs, if he pays the fine. In some States they commit a man to jail, both in the police court and in the district courts. Is not that part of the judgment—that they be committed to jail in default of the payment of the fine and the costs, and do not some States by statute fix the amount that shall be credited per day for each day spent in jail?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is correct, if I fully understand him. In the State of Kentucky the law is that a man can not be imprisoned for debt of any kind beyond 10 days. At the expiration of the 10 days he can take what we call the "insolvent debtor's oath" and be freed, but this proviso does better than that and provides that a man shall not be imprisoned at all for failure to pay costs.

Mr. WINGO. I think the gentleman will find in one State a statute that covers a proposition where a man is fined in police court who elects not to pay the fine. He is committed and the commitment goes to the jailer and the jailer credits him with so much for each day of confinement, and the fine and the costs are included.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under this limitation judgment would be rendered for the costs, and then the next step would be to place the execution in the hands of the United States marshal, and he would either levy upon property or make return nulla bona.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I call attention of members of the committee to page 63 of the bill. This provision is under the heading of the police court. Therefore, as I understand, its jurisdiction would only apply to those who were before the police court charged with an offense, and would not apply to civil cases.

Referring now to the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia, March 4, 1911, edition, I find the following provision, section 176, page 57:

Poor suitors: Suits may be prosecuted by poor persons, in the discretion and upon the order of the court or of one of the justices, passed upon satisfactory evidence of inability to make such a deposit, without making the deposit prescribed by the preceding section.

That refers to the costs. I think that answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks recently made in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman needs it, I yield the gentleman from New York 15 minutes additional.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Kentucky for the time allotted me. Before proceeding to discuss the subject, I am going to ask the permission of the House to revise and extend my remarks, and I want to include therein certain articles, tabulations, and figures I have prepared upon the subject of aviation and the regulation and control thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I am going to use the time allotted to me to speak on the subject of the national regulation of aviation.

One of the important problems pressing for Congressional solution and demanding early consideration relates to the encouragement, regulation, and supervision by the Federal Government of civilian aviation.

On April 12, last, President Harding, with a clear vision of national needs, said in his address to Congress:

"The encouragement of the civil development of aeronautics is especially desirable as relieving the Government largely of the expense of development and of maintenance of an industry now almost entirely borne by the Government through appropriations for the military, naval, and postal air services. The Air Mail Service is an important initial step in the direction of commercial aviation.

"It has become a pressing duty of the Federal Government to provide for the regulation of air navigation, otherwise independent and conflicting legislation will be enacted by the various States which will hamper the development of aviation. The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics in a special report on this subject has recommended the establishment of a bureau of aeronautics in the Department of Commerce for the Federal regulation of air navigation, which recommendation ought to have legislative approval."

Civilian aviation was one of the first matters considered by the new administration, and within a month of his inauguration President Harding requested the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics to "take up vigorously and fully the question of Federal regulation of air navigation, air routes, and cooperation among the various departments of the Government concerned with aviation" and report thereon.

The committee on submitting its report to the Executive summarized its recommendations as follows:

"The most urgent need for the successful development of aviation at the present time, either for military or civil purposes, is the enactment of legislation providing for the Federal regulation of air navigation, and the establishment of airways and airdromes under Federal regulation. The Federal regulation should include the licensing of aviators, aircraft, and airdromes; the airways should consist of chains of landing fields providing supply and repair facilities and including the necessary meteorological stations, observations, and reports."

In transmitting the report to Congress on December 7 the President again referred to the necessity of Federal legislation on the subject by declaring in his letter of submittal:

To the Congress of the United States:

I think there can be no doubt that the development of aviation will become of great importance for the purposes of commerce as well as for national defense. While the material progress in aircraft has been remarkable, the use has not as yet been extensively developed in America. This has been due, in the main, to lack of wise and necessary legislation. Aviation is destined to make great strides, and I believe that America, its birthplace, can and should be foremost in its development.

I therefore urge upon the Congress the advisability of giving heed to the recommendations of the committee, the first and most important of which is that a bureau be established in the Department of Commerce for the regulation and development of air navigation.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 7, 1921.

Thus we have before us the advice of the President pointing to the necessity of congressional action and suggesting a plan by which that necessity can be translated into legislative enactment. A number of bills have been introduced providing for Federal control and regulation of air navigation, but none have been placed upon the calendar, and it is for the purpose of calling the attention of Congress to the need for such legislation that prompts me to address you to-day. Aviation while new is yet so firmly established that its continuance is beyond conjecture; and while still an infant when measured by the possibilities of the future, its record of achievement in peace and war attests the giant. The advance of science, the enlargement of knowledge, the adaptation of new ideas to the comfort, the pleasure, and the profit of men characterize the times in which we live. The prophecies of yesterday become the realities of to-morrow; doubts are transmuted into certainties, dreams come true; and under the driving force of concentrated intellects and marshaled energies, the secrets of nature are revealed, the elements are enslaved for the benefit of humanity and the word impossible becomes an obsolete phrase of our language.

We are advancing in a new and boundless era. America, famed for genius, gifted for organization, noted for efficiency, must go forward determined to keep abreast of the progress made by others in the development of aeronautics. We gave to the world its first airplane and then, as if satisfied with that signal achievement, rested on our laurels and permitted others to advance the science of the air. Under the impetus of war we returned to the task only to find ourselves outstripped in the race. With the stimulus derived from the necessity of the hour, when every energy was bent to the winning of the war, we have recovered much of our lost ground, but America is not yet in the front ranks of aircraft development.

The aircraft industry, abruptly divorced from military activity, struggled to establish itself in commerce. Flying utilized in warfare, when the national need overrides all else, is one thing; the art applied to peace, when profit and loss and public safety govern, is quite another. Modern business development depends largely upon credit and confidence, while permanent success in the operation of any transportation enterprise can be assured only if the public is protected against injury or property damage that may be caused by the use of unfit equipment or unskilled crews, or both.

Whatever may have been the faults or the shortcomings of the aircraft industry during or since the war, the fact remains that there must be an aircraft industry and that it should be kept in such a condition as to be able to expand promptly and properly to meet increased demand in case of emergency. The Government, as the principal consumer, is directly concerned in the matter and should formulate a policy which would be effective to sustain and stabilize the aeronautical industry and encourage the development of new and improved types of aircraft.

Aviation is indispensable to the Army and to the Navy in warfare, and its relative importance will continue to increase. Other branches of the military service are comparatively well advanced, whereas aviation is still in the early stages of its development. Therefore the problem of developing extensive commercial use for aircraft and thereby obtaining a reserve body of personnel, flying equipment, and aircraft production resources available for use by the country in time of emergency is worthy of a great deal of earnest study and serious thought, for it is imperative as a policy of national defense that the Nation have a strong, well-developed, and well-organized commercial air service to fortify and supplement the military services.

America can not hope to build up a great aerial reserve for purposes of national protection until proper legislation assures capital that it is entering a business project instead of a romantic adventure, and conditions are likely to remain unsatisfactory so long as no competent Federal agency exists to determine the airworthiness of craft or the competency of pilots.

The real difficulties in the way of the more complete utilization of aeronautics in commerce are not the lack of technical knowledge by which craft can be built or the ability to fly them, but, rather, the lack of proper conditions under which to operate such craft. These difficulties may be summarized:

First. The absence of Federal supervision and regulation. Under this head, which is the crux of the situation, are included the lack of airways throughout the country properly equipped with landing fields, signaling systems, and regular meteorological service; the lack of a body of law to govern and control for purposes of public safety the methods of operation, the issuance of licenses to pilots, and the inspection of planes.

Second. The aloofness of capital from investments in this field of enterprise.

Third. The lack of education on the part of the public to the advantages of air transportation, coupled with fear of bodily injury.

Of the first, the remedy lies with Congress, but as I desire to speak more fully under this heading, I will first refer briefly to the other two, but their solution depends upon the success of the Federal regulation of aircraft.

Owing to the fact that before the war we had no commercial aircraft of any moment, there was naturally no opportunity offered to the public for investment in this field. During the war all our capital properly was utilized in the procurement of military supplies, and since the armistice money stringency has prevented expansion. With financial relief and a proper setting forth of the advantages of air transportation under Government supervision it should be possible to interest capital in well-organized companies. But without Federal regulation it is not reasonable to expect capital to be interested.

Education of the public to the advantages of air transport is probably one of the most important factors in the program. Speed of transit of persons of goods is the commanding argument in favor of aviation, and to an American this saving of time should appeal with peculiar force. Conservatism undoubtedly causes hesitation on the part of individuals to trust their lives to this new mode of travel. They have been accustomed to travel on the surface and look askance at any innovation. Over and over again one hears these expressions, "Keeping on the ground has been good enough for me, and I don't think I will change now," or "I promised my wife I would not go up." To overcome this conservatism, or prejudice, or fear, is not an easy task; but it must be remembered that when railroads were introduced this same prejudice operated against them. The public press, magazines, and chambers of commerce can do yeoman service in educating the American public to the use of aircraft, as these mediums have done abroad. Newspapers with a desire to be sensational are prone to headline every accident traceable to aeronautics. These mishaps are featured and naturally instill in the public mind mistrust of aircraft. Of course, air navigation has its dangers, and so has every other activity of life, but the number of fatal accidents in proportion to the number carried by aircraft is relatively small, and I understand that Lloyd's rate for accident insurance crossing the channel from London to Paris by airplane is less than by surface means. Automobile accidents are so common as to be hardly noted, while the occasional accident on a railroad does not get beyond local mention. To use a very colloquial expression, in the interest of aeronautical development, newspapers should "soft pedal" accidents of this kind.

Chambers of commerce can do much in eliciting capital for air transportation companies, securing municipal landing fields, establishing facilities for aeronautical use, and pushing an educational program, setting forth the saving of time to business men by the use of aircraft. To-day one can travel over practically all of Europe by aircraft operating on regular schedules and at costs that make them serious competitors of the railroads. It is possible to travel from London or Paris or Berlin or Brussels to every large city on the Continent, and several routes have already been established to Egypt, northern Africa, and Asia Minor. So popular has this method of travel become that accommodations must be secured far in advance. The fundamental reason for the rapid and extensive development of these foreign routes lies in the fact that many of the nations heavily subsidize their aviation companies, either by direct payment of a per passenger bonus or by maintaining at Government expense hangars and flying fields.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this matter is one of such importance that we ought to have a quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HICKS. While I appreciate the kind words of my colleague, I hope he will not do that.

Mr. SNYDER. I think it ought to be done.

Mr. HICKS. I hope the gentleman from New York will not bother gentlemen to run in to listen to me, for I would feel guilty of asking for an audience. I appreciate his courtesy, however——

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point under extreme pressure.

Mr. HICKS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I will, gladly.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to know if the bill of which the gentleman speaks makes any start toward determining who shall control the rights of way in the air where it crosses over different people's land?

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will kindly wait until I proceed a little further I shall take that subject up and speak of it fully. In passing, however, I will say that the Wadsworth-Hicks bill only controls aircraft engaged in interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wanted to know whether the gentleman was going to do that, and I shall wait.

Mr. HICKS. Thank you. Let me take up the matter of Federal regulation and supervision.

At the outset let me hope that no one nourishes the idea that it is proposed to embark the Government in the field of commercial flying. The bill which Senator WADSWORTH has introduced in the Senate and which, with slight modifications, I am sponsor for in the House, in its main features proposes by the creation of a bureau in the Department of Commerce the encouragement of civilian aviation by the laying out of air routes, the formation and enforcement of rules for air navigation, the issuance of licenses to pilots after rigid examinations, and the thorough inspection of fields and machines, all of which safeguard those utilizing the air and protect the public on the ground. Surely it can not be considered unreasonable for Congress to take cognizance of the public safety, nor can it be considered premature for us to enact legislation in view of the prominence of aviation at the present moment.

The bill has the approval of organizations throughout the United States representing the operating, engineering, and constructing elements in aviation. It has the support of the aviation bureaus of the Army and the Navy, the Post Office Department, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and of the commercial interests who are operating aircraft for profit, all of whom feel the urgent need of legislation of this kind.

The following letter from Secretary Hoover is of interest:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 30, 1921.

The Hon. FREDERICK C. HICKS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN HICKS: I have your letter of December 27. I am, of course, strongly in favor of aero regulation as vital to the development of the industry. It is interesting to note that this is the only industry that favors having itself regulated by the Government.

Yours, faithfully, HERBERT HOOVER.

When one realizes that there is no supervision over this hazardous method of travel, that anyone can engage in the business and solicit for profit public patronage without having had the proficiency of their pilots passed upon or the fitness of their machines attested by competent examiners, it is small wonder that the public are skeptical about employing this means of transit.

It is essential, therefore, that the Federal Government take the initiative in the whole matter of the jurisprudence of the air before State governments develop short-sighted and repressive policies and enact laws which they are very much inclined to do through ignorance and irritation at the uncontrolled abuses that are all too prevalent at the present time.

Most nations, realizing the need of Federal supervision, have in operation a very rigid system of examinations, and this is as it should be, in order that the public may feel assured that in its use of aircraft every precaution has been taken to ascertain defects in the machines or lack of ability of the operators. By thorough examinations, imperfections in planes or incompetency of would-be pilots are discovered in time to prevent disaster. This feature of the suggested legislation is very similar to the rules and regulations laid down by the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection, which provide for inspection of hulls and machinery and the examination of pilots and engineers.

In this connection a very interesting question naturally arises as to the power of Congress to legislate for the navigation of the air over private property. In passing it may be interesting to note that many States of Europe claim and exercise, as I understand it, complete sovereignty in the air over their countries. With them it seems a generally recognized principle that ownership of the land does not convey any exclusive right to the free and unrestricted use of the air space above property. Abroad, easements of flight seem to be a recognized principle of jurisprudence. Many of the bills previously introduced provide for the Federal control of air navigation, presumably on the theory that in the absence of any definite law on the subject the situation warrants the surrender of private or State rights in space to national jurisdiction. While such supervision is highly desirable and should be eventually acquired, yet owing to the constitutional questions involved the defeat of all legislation might result if these measures were brought forward at the present time, for it may be contended that a landowner has exclusive control of the space above his land which is not subject to either State or national supervision, and that an aviator flying through it at any height becomes a trespasser.

If it is accepted that such exclusive private ownership of space exists, even though the landowner has not reduced and can not reduce all of it to possession, or if it is conceded, as many contend, that the States possess jurisdiction, then it would seem that legislation for the Federal control of this space should be predicated upon a constitutional amendment by which this space was surrendered to the authority of the National Government. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that either one of these views are correct and that legislation proposing the Federal regulation of all air navigation would be unconstitutional, as violative of the rights of private property or as an encroachment upon the rights of the States, then legislation would have to be postponed until an amendment could be proposed and ratified. This would retard greatly the development of commercial aviation, with no assurance that sufficient popular interest would ever be aroused to pass such an amendment.

There are undoubtedly many who feel that the most effective course to be followed for the development of aviation would be to first enact the legislation deemed necessary for the Federal regulation of air navigation and the encouragement of the development of civil aviation and let the question of the constitutionality of such legislation be tested in due course. In the meantime there would be development in civil and commercial aviation, and if eventually the legislation which made possible such development should be definitely determined to be unconstitutional there would then in all probability be sufficient public interest in the subject and popular demand to adopt an amendment to the Constitution.

It is conceded that both Coke and Blackstone in broad and general terms enunciate the doctrine that the owner of the soil owns up to the heavens and that the word land includes not only the surface of the earth but everything under it and over it. This doctrine has undoubtedly found expression in the opinions of many English judges and the writings of British jurists, and yet as early as 1845 in an English case Maude, J., stated that "The maxim is not a presumption of law applicable in all cases and under all circumstances."

In the light of the development of aircraft and its necessary use of air space, a use far removed from its employment by the surface owner as originally recognized, many challenge the view that the mere ownership of land carries with it unlimited control of the air above it. By many who take this more liberal position it is contended that the assumption that land ownership carries with it the space ownership of the air not immediately adjacent to the soil is founded upon a theory handed down from medieval times and is based on a strict interpretation of a maxim of common law, but is not law.

The argument is advanced that "The right of society to use the gift of God is greater than the right of individual owners of the land to interfere therewith, especially when based on a maxim that was never intended to give him such a right and which was formulated at a time when no property rights were of much importance except property in land. Even though it may have been applicable to the entire air column at the time, it would not follow that it is applicable to-day. While the subject presents a descent from the realms of dreamland to the domain of vested rights, even vested rights are subject to the change which inheres in all nature. Such a change has taken place by the invention of flying. It would certainly be regrettable if the progress of such an invention should be impeded by the existence of a musty law maxim originated when a person who would have dreamed of flying would have been prosecuted as a lunatic."

It may be asserted that it is the invasion of man's rights of ownership in the earth which the law protects, and that the maxim therefore is one for the better enjoyment of the land and refers to the air space only so far as it is appurtenant to the land. The owner is assumed to have control over the surface of his property, including that part of the air in which men move about daily and into which buildings, trees, and plants project. No one in those days could go higher and the question of authority over the upper strata of air, if raised, would have been considered as purposeless casuistry. The most that can be conceded is that the maxim intends to state that within lines extended through all points of the soil ownership to the sky is a space of preferential use to the owner of the soil which is interfered with only when the enjoyment of the soil is diminished. By viewing the landowner's right in the air space merely as appurtenant to the soil to be accorded only when essential to its enjoyment, his interest will be made compatible with the progress of the new invention which should be encouraged, though not overfavored, at the expense of the landowners.

It has been suggested that, although, according to the maxim, the landowner does own the air space up to the heavens, there is also a right of public passage, as long as the enjoyment of the landowner is not interrupted; a situation similar to the right of passage over navigable rivers privately owned. The similarity, however, is slightly incomplete, for on rivers it is the navigator who is not to be interfered with by the bed owner; here the owner is to be left undisturbed.

Another theory construes Coke's maxim as securing to the landowner only a right of user and maintains that the aviator is within the circle of law-abiding citizens until he causes actual damage. This doctrine, however, imposes absolute liability for any interference with the landowner's use.

A third doctrine asserts that "the scope of possible trespass is limited by that of effective possessions," just as possession is at the basis of proprietary rights in land, so is it the basis of any proprietary rights in the air space. The passage at a high altitude is, then, not a trespass. But there is liability for all interferences with the air effectively possessed.

If an owner's right to make substantial and feasible improvements on his own land can be restricted by law in the interest of all without compensation, his mere theoretical claim to the air space over his land far beyond his reach should not be allowed to interrupt the progress of the world. This is so particularly as applied to our time when the various Governments tend to push the public good further and further into what was formerly thought to be the inviolable domain of private right. Says Holmes, J.: "All rights tend to declare themselves absolute to their logical extreme. Yet all, in fact, are limited by the neighborhood of principles of policy which are other than those on which the particular right is founded, and which become strong enough to hold their own when a certain point is reached."

That the public have certain rights in space over private property when their exercise does not interfere with the surface owner would seem to be sustained not only by logic and reason but by practical analogy. It is lawful to own, train, and operate for profit, carrier pigeons, and these useful messengers wing their way over private property. If they are trespassers, no case, so far as I know, has ever been brought to the courts to test the subject. Another parallel is the use of the wireless, a lawful occupation both in maintenance and operation, and yet these Herzian waves carry items of news and dispatches of commerce through the space over private property. Here, again, I know of no injunction or suit to prohibit the operation of these great plants because of the violations of private rights in space. These cases may differ in degree, but not in kind to the use, far remote from the surface of the earth, of the air column above privately owned land.

In connection with this subject it is interesting to refer to the report of the special committee on the law of aviation of the American Bar Association, submitted at the annual meeting of that body in Cincinnati last September, which states:

"We feel that this committee can do no more beneficial service to the public and the common interests of all of our people than to challenge the proposition that it is an invasion of the rights of private ownership of property to utilize air for purposes of flight."

I fully realize that I am treading upon highly controversial grounds, and without further allusion to these technical questions I will endeavor to discuss the merits of the proposed legislation. To those who desire to pursue further the legal phases of the subject, I refer them to an article on "Aviation law," by Prof. Bogart, which I will include as part of my remarks. I also refer them to two articles on the "Use of the air," by Zollman, pages 711 and 897, of the Fifty-third American Law Review; "Trespass by airplane," page 569, of the Thirty-second Harvard Law Review; and The Law of the Air, a book written by H. D. Hazeltine.

To avoid any controversy that might arise in regard to the invasion of private or State rights above privately owned land the Wadsworth-Hicks bill was drafted, limiting Federal control in the air through existing constitutional authority, confining it to aircraft engaged in interstate and foreign flight.

Should the theory of private ownership of space be sustained by the courts, the bill, in anticipation of this possibility, in order to further extend Federal regulation makes it unlawful to fly any aircraft in violation of the rules promulgated in conformity with its provisions over navy yards, Army posts, reservations, national parks, or any property over which the United States has jurisdiction. By setting up these barriers to the unrestricted use of the air it is felt that all pilots from self-interest will take out licenses and comply with the regulations, for otherwise with so many areas of the atmosphere under Federal control, they would be either hampered in their movements to avoid these areas or would be subject to punishment if they passed through them.

Now, we in our bill do not propose to regulate the use outside of aircraft engaged in interstate and foreign commerce. We feel that aircraft which knows no distance, where time is eliminated, must, in order to be successful, perforce engage in interstate commerce, and that this will force all aviation to come within the purview of Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. McSWAIN. I assume that my friend understands that even railroads engaged in interstate commerce must acquire title upon which to place their tracks from the landowner, and that may be acquired by charters that, at the discretion of the sovereign, confer the qualified use of the right of eminent domain. I ask my friend if he has considered that question?

Mr. HICKS. In this way. Aviation concerns will buy a park, without any question of eminent domain, the same way as you buy a farm, set up their hangar, and advertise for carrying passengers from one place to another.

Mr. McSWAIN. Suppose a railroad has a terminal in New York and one in Pennsylvania, it must have a connecting line and that must rest on somebody's soil. Now, this flier must pass over somebody's land. If the maxim of the common law be the law, which one of the owners would have the right to restrain the trespass? If it is not the law, it would be pertinent for my friend to give us what is the law and the authority.

Mr. HICKS. I regret that time is limited, but if the gentleman will take the trouble to read my speech to-morrow he will find, I think, that I have covered that matter fairly fully. I have given citations to which he can refer, but I admit the question is an open one and deserves serious thought. If he will take the trouble to investigate, I will appreciate it, for I know he is interested. There are several analogies, two of which I have given, but which I will repeat. It is a lawful act for me to raise carrier pigeons and own them, train them, and hire them out for the purpose of carrying messages. Now, those carrier pigeons in order to operate must naturally fly in space over private property. I do not believe my friend has ever heard of a case where those pigeons have been considered trespassers on private property. An airplane is nothing but a carrier pigeon magnified. It differs only in degree, but not in kind.

It is an honorable and lawful profession or calling to own great wireless plants and operate them for profit. The waves that carry those messages go over private property. Does my friend know of a single case where a property owner has sued a wireless company for the trespass of air waves above his land?

Mr. McSWAIN. If my friend will yield for me to answer that question, I will say that I have not heard of any such case, but the burden would be on him to show that such a case had arisen, and that the demurrer of the company sued had been sustained on the theory of his law. He assumes the burden of proof. I will say to my friend it is not a question of first impression, but it has occurred to me there is an analogy a little nearer the ground, a little more materialistic, a little more workable, perhaps, than the one my friend has suggested, in reference to carrier pigeons and the wireless. It is this: The Federal Government has jurisdiction over navigable streams that, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, were practically nonnavigable by sailing boats, but now by steam, and the extension of the doctrine of navigability into the air, as though the streams had inundated the land, would furnish a more plausible theory, I believe, than wireless.

Mr. HICKS. I thank my friend for speaking of it, and he will find it covered in one of the citations I have referred to.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. I yield gladly to my colleague.

Mr. SNYDER. The thought comes to me on this proposition that this question of the control of the air will have to have some peculiar regulation, because one man might occupy the land and may put up a building on it 400 feet high. We are building structures to-day a thousand feet high. In the mining industry or in the oil industry a man owns the soil and all that is under it down as far as he desires to go. We are now going down four or five thousand feet for oil. How can the gentleman say that in a few years we are not going to go two or three thousand feet in the air?

Mr. HICKS. Two or three thousand feet of private ownership for a building would be quite a jump for a building, even in Little Falls. But concede that we do go up with our buildings, then we will make airplanes go that much higher and they will not interfere with the land owners' possession of the soil.

Mr. SNYDER. Suppose we take the gentleman's proposition and build an aerodrome and some one proceeds to build buildings on the land three or four hundred feet high. That would bring the whole scheme into difficulty.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HICKS. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As you have alluded to me, I may say that my examination of recent works on the subject have led me to the belief that the principle mentioned, which was announced in old days and which has so often been reiterated, never received the support of authoritative judicial examination or decision. It was a textbook statement. The more recent writers seem to deny the validity of the principle in any unqualified sense. One of them says that there is no right of property in the air existing in the landowner, unless the landowner can show that he is making or reasonably expects to make such use of the air as would create a right of property that would practically be invaded by some other use of the air.

It seems to me that as a sort of test we might inquire what would happen in the event a landowner asserted a claim for damages because of airplanes being operated over his land. Would it not be necessary for him to show the value of his alleged property right, and would he be able to show any value? He could not by any possibility show that any right of value to him was being impaired by an airplane sailing 1,500 or 2,000 feet above his land.

Mr. HICKS. I thank my eminent friend for his valuable contribution.

Mr. SNYDER. Would not that depend on how low his flying machine wanted to fly, and how high the property owner wanted to build his building?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the property owner could show that the flier was interfering with some use that he wanted to make of his property, you could find some text writer or authority who would say that the right of the property owner was being interfered with.

Mr. SNYDER. What called me to my feet in the first instance was this thought, that if Congress should give the right to fly airplanes throughout the United States and the distance below which they might not fly was not made sufficiently high, they could restrain a man who wanted to build a building as high as he might desire to build it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from New York that I have considered this subject somewhat myself, and it seems to me a solution of it would be just along the line on which we have solved the ownership of the ocean. Every nation is supposed to own that part of the ocean in front of it, but by international law it has been settled that it owns only three miles from shore, and that beyond that the ocean is free to the navigation of all nations. So it must be determined how far up the person who owns the land owns the air.

Mr. HICKS. My friend will find that topic discussed in the citations I will give.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, may I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, this is all very interesting, but let us get down to something practical. The gentleman has given some considerable attention to this subject. From the practical standpoint, has the gentleman ever considered how an investment could be entered upon and made a success if he would establish a line of carrier pigeons to New York, for instance, to carry parcels and packages?

Mr. HICKS. It might be possible, but it never occurred to me, and I am afraid we could not develop this service except for special dispatches.

Mr. LITTLE. I wish the gentleman would figure that out.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. What effect on the air will these nitrate plants have that are taking the nitrates out of the air? Have we any property right in that air?

Mr. HICKS. I will have to refer that to somebody who knows about nitrates.

Mr. FIELDS. I will say to the gentleman that the engineers who testified before the Committee on Military Affairs have stated that it does not affect the air.

Mr. HICKS. In drafting the Wadsworth-Hicks bill the advice, caution, and suggestions of the special committee on the law of aviation of the American Bar Association were followed. There are many competent lawyers who believe that additional authority may be secured through the general welfare, tax-levying, treaty-making, national-defense, and post-office clauses of the Constitution. This much seems certain, that a bill controlling aircraft in interstate flight will bring practically all aircraft in the country under its jurisdiction, for, with distances so easily overcome, a wider field than that allowed by intrastate flight would be essential to the successful operation of aircraft.

If future study by constitutional lawyers demonstrates the necessity for more complete control than can now be secured, the Secretary of Commerce, as provided for under the Wadsworth-Hicks bill, will be able to direct and advise the passage of additional or supplemental legislation.

I realize fully the hesitancy with which Congress considers the creation of new bureaus, and if it could be avoided I would not advocate it, but I believe a bureau in the Department of Commerce offers the best, if not the only, solution. You will recall that last spring Congress established a Bureau of Aeronautics in the Navy Department over the protests of many Members of Congress, who contended that it would lead to extravagance and an increased overhead. I am happy to say that under the vigorous administration of Admiral Moffatt and his assistants this bureau will show both a decrease in expenditures and an increase in the efficiency of the service.

While the establishment of such a bureau will call for an appropriation, it need not be a large one, and it must be borne in mind that there will be no inconsiderable revenue derived from fees for lincenses and inspections.

Let us not forget that this bureau is to be established not for some experiment or some transitory proposition but to carry forward a great American discovery, whose value has been demonstrated both in peace and in war, and to safeguard the public in its use. Whether we approve or not, the airplane is here; it is certain its usefulness will be augmented, and it is for us to provide for its proper control. Without Federal regulation an increasing number of accidents are sure to take place, which means loss of life and the retardation of aeronautical development.

As we are dealing now with civilian aviation, I will not allude to the airplane as a weapon of war, except to state that no one who witnessed the bombing tests last summer, when the ex-German ships were sunk, can reasonably doubt their efficiency from the military standpoint, both for attack and for the defense of our coasts. In this connection permit me to quote the opinions of several authorities:

Admiral Sims: "It may be stated as a general proposition that control of the air over any given area involves control of any forces on the surface below that area, whether they be fleets on the sea or armies, fortifications, or cities on the land."

Hon. A. J. Balfour: "The time is here when command of the sea will be of no value without corresponding command of the air."

Admiral Peary: "Great and important as is a sufficient Navy for our safety, I speak advisedly when I say that our Air Service of the near future will be more vital to our safety than our Navy and Army combined."

What a wonderful prophecy was uttered by Lord Tennyson when, in 1842 in Locksley Hall in penning these lines, he forecast events which are on the verge of realization:

Men my brothers, men the workers, ever reaping something new,
That which they have done but earnest of the things that they shall do,
For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the vision of the world and all the wonder that would be,
Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight dropping down with costly bales,
Heard the heavens fill with shouting and there rain'd a gastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue.

Mr. Speaker, I have laid the case of aviation before you as I see it in the hope that action may follow. We are dealing with a problem of to-day, a problem that calls for immediate solution. What the future of aviation will be no man can predict. Its possibilities seem as boundless as the medium through which it operates. It is the field where genius and daring, business and adventure, are linked together. Aviators are the knights of the clouds, the chivalry of the air, competing in the heavens, with the endurance of the eagle and the agility of the gull, where every flight is a romance, every record an epic. As America gave the world its first airplane, so America should possess the most efficient, the best organized, and the fullest developed Air Service in all the world. The Federal regulation of air navigation is the corner stone upon which such an achievement will rest.

SOME COMMERCIAL USES FOR AIRCRAFT.

In the final analysis all aeronautical activity is encompassed in aerial transportation, for aircraft to be useful in commerce must be able to transport not only passengers and material but be able to perform all the peace-time activities to which aircraft may be put.

As no registration of aircraft is required, any statement involving the actual number of planes in commercial use is problematical, but it is estimated that there are approximately 1,000 civilian planes in use and that in the year 1920 these planes carried 225,000 passengers and flew 6,000,000 miles. Including the Federal services it is estimated that within the United States and its insular possessions 15,250,000 miles were flown during 1920, divided as follows:

Army Air Service	6,250,000
Navy Air Service	1,500,000
Postal Air Service	1,500,000
Civilian	6,000,000

How can airplanes be utilized for business purposes?

For passenger and package carrying in sparsely settled regions where rail or boat transportation is inadequate.

For rapid transportation to distant points and for commuting in congested centers.

For sight-seeing excursionists and tourists. Typical instances in this field are the successes of the Aeromarine Sightseeing Co., the Aeromarine-West Indies Airways, the American Trans-Oceanic Co., the Aero (Ltd.), and the Mercury Aviation Co.

For the conveyance of mail and high-class freight where speed is a controlling element. The value of this means in transporting mail has been demonstrated abroad and has been successfully carried out in the United States, especially for long trips.

For fire patrol of forests, which service is already credited with saving a large amount of standing timber. A notable example of this activity, apart from the work done on national forest reservations and national parks, can be cited with reference to the Laurentide Lumber Co., of Quebec, which operates two flying boats equipped with camp outfits. These boats are used for fire patrol, for surveying logging operations, and for transportation of officials and crews from camp to camp.

For newspaper delivery. A sensational demonstration of the utility of aircraft in this work was given at Chicago at the time of the Republican national convention, when the New York Times delivered on the day of issue several hundred copies of its first edition.

For photographic work. Aerial photography has been one of the richest contributors to the development of useful activities of aircraft, and so successful have been the experiments conducted by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey that it is planned to revise by means of aerial photography the coastal charts of the entire American shore line.

For exploration in broken country and in frigid zones. Already considerable progress has been made in aerial exploration in the far north. Aerial photography and quick transportation are the chief contributions.

For advertising and publicity. Aircraft were quickly adopted by the motion-picture industry as an adjunct in manufacture and transportation of the films. Advertising firms and individuals have successfully employed this medium for publicity work

For spotting fish. New uses for aircraft over the water, in addition to the transport of goods and passengers, were revealed during the war when it was discovered that aircraft could discern objects beneath as well as on the surface of the sea, and that from their altitude and the speed of movement vast areas of the ocean were quickly brought under observation.

The most evident opportunity for the practical use of aircraft in the commercial fisheries at the present time lies in their employment as scouts for the purse-seine fishermen, in the pursuit of such species as menhaden, mackerel, bluefish, kyacks, and other schooling fish. In the case of the spring mackerel fishery it is believed that the use of aircraft would save much time in locating the fish upon their first appearance and in enabling the fishermen to keep in touch with the fish as they appeared farther north. The chief service rendered would be notification of the fishermen of the general vicinity of the schools, and it would require actual trial and practice to determine how much could be done in directing fishing vessels to particular schools by means of radiotelephone or other methods of signaling. It would appear that the menhaden fishery offers the most promising field for experiment in this direction.

In a great many cases vessels have been directed to bodies of fish which were within several miles of them and of which they had apparently no knowledge. In many instances the entire fishing fleet were found heading directly away from the fish and would undoubtedly have lost the entire day if it had not been for the assistance rendered by the plane.

For Coast Guard work. In the saving of life at sea by aircraft the Coast Guard reports actual rescues of persons in the water.

Instances have arisen when boats have foundered within sight of the guard, but distance precluded rescue by surface boat. Then it was that the seaplane, at home equally on the water as in the air, flew swiftly with succor.

It is fully expected that seaplanes will on the first opportunity be the means of saving life by contributing to the location of vessels in distress—first, by scouting; second, by radio or direct report; and third, by carrying means of relief. "In some cases," the Coast Guard report, "should it prove impracticable to get a line to a vessel by means of the beach gun, aircraft properly equipped might effect the purpose desired. To this end a design of gear has been developed, and the tests to prove its practicability or to develop it further will be undertaken shortly."

The Coast Guard is particularly impressed with the assistance aircraft provide in searching for derelicts when the object of the search is within a reasonable distance of the coast.

OUTLINES OF PRINCIPAL PROBLEMS IN AVIATION LAW.

[By George G. Bogert, professor of law in Cornell University and member of committee on aviation of the American Bar Association.]

(A) SOVEREIGNTY OVER AIR SPACE.

In determining the form which laws regulating aerial navigation should take several fundamental problems must be solved. The first of these is, what is the relation of the States and of the Nation to the space above the United States and its territorial waters. Is such space a detached, uncontrolled realm, comparable to the ice wastes around the North Pole, outside the sovereignty of either States or Nation? Or is this space as much a part of the physical territory of each State and of the Nation as the soil and waters therein? Obviously, unless the air space above us is subject to our sovereignty, legislation regarding flying within it is as far beyond the powers of our State or Federal Legislatures as would be the total prohibition of fishing in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean.

There can, however, be no effective argument against State sovereignty over the space above the land within its borders. Such space is under modern conditions actually within the control of the subjacent State by police aircraft and by guns. And acts within such space, of course, vitally affect the subjacent State with respect to the safety of its inhabitants and their property. Writers on international law now agree that sovereignty over air space exists. All the treaties, conventions, and municipal laws hereinbefore referred to are founded on the principle of the sovereignty of each State over the air space above its land. There can be no doubt, therefore, that either the States or the Nation, or both together, have the jurisdiction to make laws concerning flight in such space. A clause embodying the idea contained in the following preamble to the British air navigation act of 1920 might well be made the initial paragraph of our air act:

"Whereas the full and absolute sovereignty and rightful jurisdiction of His Majesty extends, and has always extended, over the air superincumbent on all parts of His Majesty's dominions and the territorial waters adjacent thereto."

The question of jurisdiction over torts and crimes committed in the air and contracts made therein may be raised here. The tendency of continental jurists has been to apply the doctrine of extraterritorialty and provide that legal relations between persons in aircraft are to be governed by the laws of the State to which the aircraft is attached by registration and not by the laws of the State flown over. According to this view, an assault committed by an Ohian upon a New Yorker while both were flying over Connecticut in a Massachusetts plane would be controlled by the law of Massachusetts. But the principal of extraterritoriality is, of course, contrary to the fundamental conception of English and American jurists. With us the natural rule is to apply the law of the subjacent State to legal relations arising between aeronauts or between an aeronaut and a landsman. Thus, a contract made between passengers flying over Illinois would be treated as made in Illinois, and the intentional dropping of ballast on a citizen of Maryland by a Virginia aviator, flying in a Virginia registered machine over Maryland, would give rise to a prosecution or action in the courts of Maryland. None of the proposed Federal laws seem to cover this question. It would appear to be a matter to be disposed of by a uniform State aviation law through the insertion of a section making legal relations arising in the air over a given State, and legal relations arising between an aviator flying over such State and a groundsman in such State, subject to the laws of that particular State.

(B) PRIVATE PROPERTY IN AIR SPACE.

The sovereignty of the State and the property of the individual are distinct concepts, although each is exclusive and alienable. Does a landowner own the space above his land in the same sense that he owns the soil?

Is he entitled to exclusive possession of such space? Assuming that he does not reduce all of it to possession, as, of course, he will not, is he entitled to exclude others from entering such space, even though he suffers no actual damage? Is an aviator, flying at any height, a trespasser as to the subjacent owner? In order to establish airways must aerial transport companies purchase or condemn rights of way? Can the State or the Nation authorize flight over private lands without providing for compensation to the subjacent owners if the due process clauses of the constitutions are to be respected?

These questions go to the essence of aviation law. If the space is owned absolutely by the surface owner and all flight is a trespass, there can be no development of aerial transportation without a constitutional amendment by which the people of the States give up their property rights in space to some extent and allow an easement of passage. Otherwise the expense of acquiring rights of way and defending trespass and injunction suits would bankrupt all aerial transportation companies. That such exclusive private ownership of space exists and that a Federal constitutional amendment surrendering authority over this space to the National Government is therefore imperative before a single step can be taken toward legislation is the view recently expressed by Maj. Johnson, legal adviser to the Director of the Federal Air Service. This writer says:

"It is therefore a safe conclusion that technically, under the present grants and prohibitions of the Constitution and the common-law rule of ownership of space above property, neither the United States Government or the States have any jurisdiction over the air."

This view of space ownership springs from a rigid and literal interpretation of the common-law maxim, "Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad coelum." This maxim was taken from the Roman law, and is found in the modern civil-law codes, but a qualification of it has been accepted, as is shown by the following section from the German Civil Code:

"The right of the owner of a piece of land extends to the space above the surface and to the earth under the surface. However, the owner can not prohibit interferences which take place at such height or depth that he has no interest in their exclusion."

This ancient maxim finds a limited survival in some American State codes, as, for example, that of California, which provides that "The owner of land in fee has the right to the surface and to everything permanent situated beneath or above it."

But, notwithstanding the persistence of this rule, its application to the space not immediately adjacent to the soil and the structures on the soil is wanting. All the decisions are regarding intrusions into the space very near the surface, where the actual use of the soil by the surface occupant was disturbed. It is believed that an examination of the cases will show that "cujus est solum" is not law but is merely a nice theory easily passed down from medieval days because there has not been until recently any occasion to apply it to its full extent.

It has been held to be a trespass to thrust one's arm into the space over a neighbor's land or to shoot over another's land, and for one's horse to kick into such space. Overhanging branches constitute a legal wrong, either a trespass or a nuisance. A board attached to defendant's building and overhanging plaintiff's land constitutes a trespass. In Pickering against Rudd, Lord Ellenborough said: "Nay, if this board overhanging the plaintiff's garden be a trespass, it would follow that an aeronaut is liable to an action of trespass 'quare clausum fregit' at the suit of the occupier of every field over which his balloon passes in the course of his voyage." This result Lord Ellenborough did not approve; but Blackburn, J., in Kenyon against Hart, remarked: "I understand the good sense of that doubt, though not the legal reason of it."

So also projecting eaves, cornices, roofs, and walls have been held to be wrongful and to give rise to an action of some sort. In Butler against Frontier Telephone Co. it was held that ejectment would lie for the space occupied by a telephone wire strung across plaintiff's land at a height varying from 20 to 30 feet. Vann, J., expressed himself as follows:

"The surface of the ground is a guide, but not the full measure, for within reasonable limitations land includes not only the surface but also the space above and the part beneath. * * * 'Usque ad coelum' is the proper boundary, and while this may not be taken too literally there is no limitation within the bounds of any structure yet erected by man. So far as the case before us is concerned, the plaintiff as the owner of the soil owned upward to an indefinite extent. * * * According to fundamental principles and within the limitation mentioned space above land is real estate the same as the land itself. * * * Unless the principle of usque ad coelum is abandoned, any physical, exclusive, and permanent occupation of space above land is an occupation of the land itself and a disseisin of the owner to that extent."

The English cases show that the stringing of a wire across land at low heights (30 to 34 feet) is regarded as a trespass. Leading text writers agree in substance that, in the words of Pollock, "the scope of possible trespasses is limited by that of possible effective possession."

The operation of subways and tunnel streets as far below the surface as 150 feet has been regarded as wrongful as against the surface owner in the absence of purchase or condemnation of the right.

It thus appears that the only rights in space which have actually been protected by the courts have been rights in space immediately adjacent to and connected with the surface. There are no decisions to the effect that it is a wrong against a landowner to interfere with the space over his land at such a height that the use of the surface is not affected in the slightest degree.

All the codes now in existence and all proposed codes so far as known to the writer treat the landowner's property in the space above his land as subject to a right of passage by aircraft. None of these codes require condemnation of an aerial right of way and none provide that the mere flight through the space above shall constitute a trespass. The report of the British aerial transport committee in 1918, made the basis of the British aerial navigation act of 1920, expresses a fair and sensible attitude on the question of space ownership in the following sentences:

"To retain this doctrine [usque ad coelum] in its entirety would be fatal to civil aeronautics. On the other hand, to allow unrestricted flying over private property at all altitudes would interfere with the reasonable rights of landowners. The interference would take the form either of trespass or of nuisance. The committee thinks that the following recommendations would, on the one hand, give reasonable protection or compensation to landowners and, on the other, interpose on aviators no obligation which could not be covered by insurance at reasonable rates, and so avoid hampering the development of civil aeronautics. The committee therefore recommend that the bill should provide as follows: (a) No action for trespass should lie except for material damage to person or property, whether caused by flight, ascent, or landing, or the fall of objects from aircraft. (b) That this right of action for trespass should include one for injury caused by the assembly of persons on the landing or ascent of aircraft elsewhere than at authorized aerodromes or landing places. (c) That the obligation on the aviator in an action for trespass should be absolute, negligence not being a necessary element in his liability and 'unavoidable accident' no defense. (d) That an action for nuisance should lie for damages only, and then only if breach of flying regulations is proved as well as actual nuisance."

Learned writers on the subject of the law of aviation have agreed that a natural easement or right of passage should be granted to aircraft and that flight over land at such a height as not to interfere with the use to which the land is actually put should not of itself constitute a trespass. In a French case decided in 1912 aviators were held liable for flying at low heights over land, whereby animals and workmen were frightened. This was an interference with the use of the surface, although there was no contact.

In declaring a right of passage in the air legislatures would be following the analogy of the right of navigation in waters flowing over private lands. The ownership of the bed of a navigable stream by a private person does not make navigation on the surface of the stream a trespass. Ownership of the stream bed is subject to an easement of navigation in favor of the public. It will be far less burdensome to the owner of the surface to declare an easement of public navigation in the air at such a height as does not interfere with the use to which the landowner actually puts his ground, whether that be agriculture or the support of a skyscraper. It would seem reasonable also to give the aviator an easement of landing in case of absolute necessity, on condition that he respond for actual damage done. This would prevent forced landings from being classed as trespasses, but would compensate the groundsman for actual loss. The aviator's easement should be one of passage only and not one to hover or anchor over the land. The right of passage over a highway has been held not to give a right to loiter in the road to watch the training of horses in an adjoining field, and so it should be unlawful to float in the air over land for the sole purpose of observing operations on the surface.

(C) BASIS OF THE AVIATOR'S LIABILITY FOR DAMAGE.

A third problem, the answer to which should be incorporated into any complete air code, is, when shall the aviator or his employer be held liable for damage caused by his aircraft or by objects falling from it? Such damage may occur (1) to persons or property on the surface; (2) to persons or property in the air.

Is the aviator to be likened to the operator of an automobile and proof of actual negligence, that is, the want of ordinary care, to be required for recovery? May the aviator engaged in carrying passengers or freight be subjected to the severe rule sometimes applied to common carriers on land and be held to a high degree of care? Or may it be said that injuries caused by aircraft are so generally caused by some form of negligence, and proof of actual negligence is so difficult due to the usual destruction of the machine and the witnesses, that the maxim res ipsa loquitur should be applied and a presumption of negligence aid the plantiff? Or should the law be so severe toward the aerial navigator as to say that Rylands against Fletcher shall apply to him, that he is like one who cages a wild beast on his premises—liable for any damages occurring to anyone from this dangerous instrument which he has caused to come into the community? Is one sending an airoplane into the air bound to realize that he is creating a seriously dangerous condition, for the results of which he is absolutely liable? And, lastly, should the common law, with its rule of contributory negligence, be applied to aviators, or are they to be regarded as navigators within the admiralty law?

The Connecticut statute makes the aviator absolutely liable for damage to person or property, whether caused by his negligence or due to unavoidable accident or vis major. The Massachusetts act of 1913 created a presumption of liability from the mere fact of injury, but this provision was omitted from the existing statute adopted in 1919. The very recent British act of 1920 places a burden of absolute liability on the aeronaut, unless the groundsman was guilty of contributory negligence. The International Air Navigation Convention does not attempt to decide the question.

The British aerial transport committee in their report in 1918, on which the present British act is based, gave the following reasons for the fixing of absolute liability:

"Admittedly persons on land are practically powerless to insure their own safety by precautionary measures against damage caused by the fall of aircraft or of objects carried therein. It is a matter of some doubt whether under existing principles of law persons suffering such damage would be called on to prove an affirmative case of negligence or intentional trespass. It is possible that the courts might hold aircraft to be within the class of those things which the owner keeps or uses at his peril. We think it preferable that the principles applicable should be defined by legislation rather than that they should be left for solution by a series of judicial decisions; we think, too, that as far as damage done by aircraft is concerned the deprivation of the landowner of what is almost certainly an existing right of property should be compensated by what will be in effect an insurance of himself and his property against such damage. Nor do we think that in practice the expense of insuring himself against third-party risks will prove very burdensome to the owner of aircraft."

If it be said that liability without fault is inequitable, it may be replied that the principle is one frequently applied in our law, where the public protection requires it. Thus, the owner of a deer who frees the animal in a public park is liable, without proof of negligence, to a visitor in the park who is injured by the animal.

A balloonist has been held liable, though no negligence in the operation of the balloon was shown, (a) for the damage caused by the fall of the balloon and operator on the plaintiff's land, and (b) for the damage caused by a crowd attracted to the plaintiff's land by the defendant's fall. One blasting on his land, without negligence and for a lawful purpose, has been held absolutely liable for the death of a traveler on an adjacent highway, who was killed by a piece of wood thrown by the blast, the court saying that "the safety of property generally is superior in right to a particular use of a single piece of property by its owner." A statute making the owner of a motor vehicle liable for injury caused by the negligent operation of the machine by a member of the owner's immediate family has been sustained. The employer of a balloonist has been held liable for injury to a traveler on a highway, where such injury was caused by the descent of the balloon, the theory of the court being that the fall of the balloon on the highway was reasonably to be anticipated.

The doctrine of absolute liability on the part of the aviator has been favored by numerous writers. It appears that there have been French and Belgian cases making the aerial navigator an insurer of the safety of persons and property below, so far as his own acts are concerned. These decisions are somewhat surprising, in view of the provisions in continental codes that there shall be no liability without fault.

The helplessness of the landsman and the difficulty of proof surely make inadequate and unfair a rule holding the aviator for ordinary negligence only. Suppose that A's aircraft falls on B's land and kills B. The representatives of B will ordinarily find the aviator dead also and the machine a mass of wreckage. To prove what caused the fall will be impossible in most cases. To hold the aviator to the common carrier's high degree of care would be no more helpful to the landsman than to adopt the standard of ordinary care. The occupant of the surface can not in 99 cases out of 100 prove the want of any care, nor can he prove anything about the cause of the descent of the airplane.

Although some writers have tried to assimilate the navigation of the air to navigation of the water and have sought to apply the rules of admiralty to both, such a course does not seem logical. Navigation in the air is intimately connected with the land and resembles railway transportation, instead of ocean-going or other water traffic. There appears to be no reason for applying the peculiar admiralty rules regarding negligence to aerial travel. It is reported that a German case regarding responsibility where two aircraft collided has applied the doctrine of contributory negligence.

It would seem that, if a recent English case is to be followed, the operator of a machine who suffered a collision in the air without negligence on his own part would not be liable for damages to persons or property caused by the fall of his machine to the land below. In the case referred to the defendant's automobile collided with the car of A, and the defendant's car was thrown on the plaintiff's realty. The plaintiff was not allowed to recover damages, since the defendant's car had come upon the plaintiff's premises wholly without fault or design on the part of the defendant.

Some writers have gone so far as to urge that the aviator should be required to give a bond or take out insurance to protect the public, as a condition to the obtaining of a license.

(D) REGULATIONS TO PROTECT THE PUBLIC.

There is unanimity that a very important part of any code regulating aerial navigation should be concerned with protecting the occupants of the surface. Statutes very generally provide for registration and marking of aircraft to secure identification and proof of ownership; inspection of machines and certificates of airworthiness as prerequisites to the right to the use of such machines in flight; compulsory examination and licensing of pilots; and the restriction or prohibition of trick flying, low navigation, and flight over densely populated areas, exhibitions, games, and zones set apart for reasons of national defense.

It would undoubtedly be wise to follow the example of other countries in granting to State and Federal officers authority to promulgate these rules, rather than to attempt to set the regulations out at length in statutes. Administrative regulations have the flexibility needed in the government of a rapidly developing industry like aviation. Code rules are set and difficult to modify in the light of experience. State and Federal statutes should cover the protection of the public by a single section, granting to chosen agencies power to promulgate regulations to accomplish named objects. The prohibition of the hunting of game from aircraft might well be included. The International Air Navigation Convention and the British regulations will furnish excellent suggestions for administrative rules to be issued by our State and national agencies.

(E) REGULATIONS TO PROTECT AVIATORS AND FOSTER AVIATION.

Projected laws and statutes already in force are likewise in accord in the establishment of certain rules which are chiefly for the protection and aid of aviators, although they incidentally make life on the surface safer also. Such regulations are those laying down "rules of the air," corresponding to the "rules of the road" for automobiles; fixing standard methods of landing and departure; mapping out airways so as to promote safety in flight and to avoid congestion of aerial traffic over thickly settled districts; and regulating landing fields and aerodromes. Some authorities would require the landsman to mark high buildings and wires with lights and other signals to protect the aviator.

As in the case of rules to protect the public, the details of these regulations might well be left to an agency of the State or Nation, rather than fixed in the law itself. The statute might well confine itself to a designation of the subjects to be regulated and the objects to be sought by such regulation.

(F) SHALL AVIATION LEGISLATION BE STATE OR FEDERAL OR BOTH?

All are anxious for uniformity of legislation on the law of aviation. All wish to avoid conflicting local codes. For these reasons many writers have advocated exclusive national legislation. This would undoubtedly be desirable, if it were constitutionally sound. But the desirability of uniformity does not confer on the National Government power to legislate. If it did, we might have a Federal divorce statute.

At least four clauses of the Federal Constitution have been assigned as authority for exclusive Federal legislation on the law of the air. These are (1) the admiralty clause; (2) the war clause; (3) the treaty-making clause; and (4) the interstate commerce clause. Space will permit of the suggestion of only a few of the arguments possible under each heading, and those in merest outline.

Admiralty jurisdiction as a basis for Federal legislation: The Federal Constitution provides that the jurisdiction of the United States courts shall extend "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." This clause has been construed to give the Federal Government power to enact laws on the subjects of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. A number of able writers have contended that this grant of power is sufficiently broad to authorize Congress to assume jurisdiction over aviation, the conference of State and local bar associations has so resolved, and bills now before Congress proceed on that theory. In a recent case in a Federal district court this thesis was advanced and an attempt made to libel an airplane for repairs. The court held that airplanes were not subjects of admiralty jurisdiction, for "they are neither of the land nor sea, and, not being of the sea or restricted in their activities to navigable waters, they are not maritime."

Admiralty jurisdiction is essentially connected with the sea and navigable waters and with navigable things floating thereon. "The character of craft included in the admiralty jurisdiction is any movable floating structure capable of navigation and designed for navigation." It does not include all water navigation, for craft operating on inland waters which have no navigable outlet and so are useful only in intrastate traffic are not subject to courts of admiralty. Nor does admiralty have control of everything floating on the sea or other navigable water, for a fixed floating dock has been held to be beyond the reach of the Federal courts under the admiralty head.

Only by maintaining that admiralty jurisdiction includes all transportation can it be rationally argued that it covers aerial navigation. This hypothesis is obviously too broad, for it would place railroads and other land carriers under admiralty. Aerial navigation is more akin to transportation on the earth's surface than it is to sea travel, for aerial navigation, in the case of landings, ascents, and accidental descents, intimately affects the inhabitants of the surface while the events of water navigation ordinarily have no effect on any persons except sailors and passengers.

It is true that admiralty jurisdiction is, in a certain sense, broader now than when the Constitution was adopted. It covers steamboats and all the other water craft invented since that time, but its development has been purely in the field of transportation on the water and never has it gone into transportation in another element.

Congress can not confer on agencies of the Federal Government powers not granted to such agencies by the Federal Constitution. This has been clear since Marbury against Madison, when Congress sought to give the Supreme Court authority to issue writs of mandamus to public officers. Nor can Congress by calling aviation law "admiralty" make it so. If the Federal Legislature could, by torturing the words of the Federal Constitution into wholly unnatural meanings, fix the bounds of Federal control, there would be no limit to the powers of our National Government. "No State law can enlarge it [admiralty jurisdiction], nor can an act of Congress or rule of court make it broader than the judicial power may determine to be its true limits."

The war power as conferring on the Federal Government exclusive authority over civil aviation.—It is the theory of some Members of Congress that the power of that body to raise and regulate an Army and a Navy, conferred by the Constitution, gives the Federal Legislature the right to assume exclusive control over civil aviation, intrastate and interstate. The argument no doubt is that in time of war a large number of machines and operators must be immediately available, that civilian airplanes and operators can quickly be turned to military and naval uses, and that, therefore, the stimulation and control of commercial aviation is necessary to preparation for war.

Undoubtedly Congress has power to create a united Federal air service and to merge the present military, naval, and Post Office air departments under one head. But it may be doubted whether Congress can lawfully subject the manufacture of aircraft and all flying, whether over several States or wholly within a single State, to Federal control for the purpose of providing an ample supply of pilots and aircraft in time of war. The Federal Government can provide those pilots and aircraft without taking over civilian aviation. Motor transport on land is equally essential to a successful Army, and yet it will hardly be contended that the Federal Government in time of peace could justify regulation and control of the automobile industry on the ground that such control was necessary to the production of a sufficient quantity of trucks and automobiles and a sufficient number of drivers in time of war. The same argument would apply equally well to other industries necessary to the support of an Army, as, for example, the business of manufacturing and growing food. There would be no limit to the war power if it were construed to have this effect. If a supply of pilots and aircraft for war purposes could not be obtained except through civilian aviation, and if civilian aviation would not flourish except under exclusive Federal regulation, the proponents of Federal regulation under the war power would have a stronger position, but neither of these suppositions seems correct. There appears to be no decision of a Federal court sustaining the assertion by Congress in time of peace of such broad powers under the war clause.

Power to make treaties as granting exclusive authority to the Federal Government to control aviation.—It is well known that the Federal Government has exclusive power to make treaties with foreign Governments, and it has been recently decided that where the execution of such a treaty requires Federal legislation such legislation will be upheld, even though it interferes with the internal affairs of a State not otherwise subject to national control. Thus, all that the Federal Government need do in order to acquire jurisdiction of a subject is to enter into a treaty with a foreign power regarding that subject.

Some advocates of exclusive Federal control of all aviation have urged that if the international air navigation convention were ratified by the United States the Federal Legislature would then be under a duty to enact laws to insure the carrying out of that convention and could on that ground assume control of all aviation in the United States. Some of the proposed Federal aviation laws purport to be introduced "to render effective the provisions of any treaty or convention relating to air navigation that may hereafter be entered into by the United States." It has been suggested that the London Radio-Telegraph Convention of 1912 and the act of Congress passed to give effect to that convention furnish an analogy. This act controlled all radio-telegraph stations, in order to give force to the convention.

One objection to this theory is that the international air navigation convention has not been ratified by the United States, and judging by the attitude of the Senate toward the League of Nations and the treaty of Versailles all pacts made at Paris in 1919 are to be treated with suspicion and disfavor. Until the convention is ratified, all Federal legislation will have to wait if it is to depend solely upon a treaty for its support. It will require an existing treaty to give validity to legislation, not merely a prospective convention.

Secondly, a query may be raised whether the provisions of the international air navigation convention, which concern international aviation only, necessarily require any Federal legislation on the subject of intrastate aerial navigation. Congress probably could comply with the convention if it enacted laws insuring foreign aviators entering the United States the rights and privileges guaranteed to them by that convention. But the conditions upon which interstate and intrastate flight are to be allowed may well be entirely different from those governing international aviation, so long as certain discriminations against foreign aviators are avoided.

The interstate commerce clause as authority for Federal control.—There can be little doubt that the commerce clause of the Constitution would be held to cover interstate flight, as it has been construed to apply to interstate telegraphy and telephony. Hence a Federal act regulating international and interstate aviation only would undoubtedly be constitutional. At least one bill introduced into Congress had been drawn upon this principle.

The objection that aviation would be handicapped by conflicting State and national rules, if Federal legislation were confined to international and interstate aerial navigation, can be met by the adoption of a uniform State aviation law. This State act could obviate the expense and trouble of double licensing and examination of pilots and double certification of the airworthiness of the craft by doing away with the necessity of a State license, examination, and certificate, if the aviator and machine possessed a Federal license and certificate. Under such a uniform State statute all pilots and machines would make use of the Federal licensing, certification, and registration plan, and thus be qualified for intrastate or interstate flight. The States would not give up their rights to amend the State laws and require State licenses and certificates if the Federal regulations proved at any time unsatisfactory in their requirements or their administration.

It is believed that the regulation of interstate and international aviation by the Federal Government and the control of intrastate aerial navigation by the States (preferably through a uniform act) are the only constitutional methods of action at present. The Federal law should cover licensing of interstate and international pilots, registration, and certification of aircraft to be used in international and interstate flight, and regulations for the safety of the public and the aviators where interstate or international traffic is involved. The uniform State bill might well include a declaration of State sovereignty over the air space; a statement of the landowner's property in the space above his land, subject to an easement of passage; a provision against liability by the aviator except in case of contact or actual interference with the use of the surface, and then an absolute liability, not dependent on negligence; requirements for the licensing of pilots engaged solely in intrastate flight (unless a Federal license had already been obtained) and for the inspection and certification of aircraft engaged solely in intrastate flight (in the absence of a Federal certificate already issued); provisions for the registration of intrastate aircraft; and a grant of power to a State agency to promulgate regulations for the protection of the public and the aviators as nearly like the Federal and international rules as local conditions would permit.

It may be argued that the power to control interstate commerce includes as an incident the power to govern intrastate commerce, when necessary for the complete and satisfactory exercise of the former power. This principle undoubtedly has been recognized by the Supreme Court, but it is one which should be sparingly applied. Liberally construed, such a doctrine means the destruction of all State rights. Hardly a Federal power but what could be somewhat more conveniently exercised if some portion of the State's sovereignty were added to it. This rule for the extension of the power of the Federal Government should require a strict necessity for its application. If mere convenience is to be a sufficient cause, then assuredly the reservation to the States of the control of intrastate commerce is meaningless and futile. Only in so far as aviators flying within a State adopt methods which endanger or handicap interstate or international traffic, should the Federal Government interfere with them. If intrastate operators are flying under reasonable local regulations and without conflict with interstate or international aerial navigators, they should be left unrestricted by the National Government.

Perhaps an all-powerful national air board and an all-inclusive national air code would be the desideratum if we were starting de novo, but under our peculiar dual form of government, with a National Government of delegated powers, it is difficult to see how such results can be accomplished without ignoring the Federal Constitution.

COMMERCIAL AVIATION.

Aviation as a factor of increased importance in commercial transportation is one of the fortunate legacies of the Great War. When hostilities between the European powers began in August, 1914, aviation was still in the experimental stage. Although successful flights had been steadily increasing in frequency and length, the results obtained were noteworthy chiefly as marking advances in the science of flying and had little or no immediate business value. The commercial possibilities of aviation seemed so remote that they were given little attention. In the seven years since that time, however, development has been so rapid that commercial air transportation is to-day a matter of general interest and substantial importance.

The military value of aircraft had, of course, been recognized prior to the war. It became increasingly apparent as the conflict continued. The pressure of military necessity became a powerful driving force in aerial progress. By the close of the war the importance of aircraft was such that a large proportion of the effort of each of the belligerents was expended in their construction and operation. The resulting development of aviation would probably not have been equaled in many decades of peace. Flying on the large scale of 1917 and 1918 was a conclusive demonstration of the potential value of aircraft as a means of transportation.

The armistice halted abruptly the feverish aerial activity. Each of the belligerents was left with enormous stocks of material, a large and highly trained personnel both for flight and ground service, and a huge industrial organization engaged in the manufacture of aircraft and their numerous parts and accessories. * * *

The huge stocks of surplus material and the absence of new orders were disastrous to the manufacturers, who saw no prospect of being able to compete with war material at disposal prices. Their position was unlike that of other industries where surpluses existed in that there was no regular established outlet for their products. To create a market for airplanes in the absence of military demand aerial transportation had first to be established. In the meantime the deflation of the aircraft industry in each country has been so complete that barely a nucleus remains of the enormous wartime organizations, and this subsists for the most part on small experimental government orders. In consequence technical progress along strictly commercial lines has been disappointingly slow since the armistice and converted war material is still widely used.

Military and commercial aviation are closely related and will continue to be as long as military establishments exist. The relationship may be compared in kind to that of the Navy and the mercantile marine. In degree it is much closer. In case of war the expansion of the air service must necessarily be much faster and greater than naval expansion. By so much more must the air force be dependent upon commercial aviation than the Navy upon the mercantile marine, as a source of material and personnel. The prohibitive cost of maintaining anything more than a nucleus for the enormous organization of a wartime air service explains the necessity, already recognized and expressed in England, France, and the United States, of entrusting the burden of maintenance in the future to commercial aviation. The report of the American Aviation Commission, presented to Congress in 1919, emphasizes this in a summary of what the commission considers unescapable conclusions, among which are the following:

"That any future war will inevitably open with great aerial activity in advance of combat either upon land or sea, and that victory can not but incline to that belligerent able first to achieve and later to maintain its supremacy in the air.

"That no sudden creation of aerial equipment to meet a national emergency already at hand is possible. It has been proved within the experience of every nation engaged in the war that two years or more of high-pressure effort has been needed to achieve the quantity production of aircraft, aircraft engines, and accessory equipment. The training of personnel, including engineering, production, inspection, maintenance, and operating forces—covering some 50 distinct trades and some 75 industries—has proved itself a stupendous task when undertaken upon the basis of war emergency alone."

DEPENDENCE UPON SUBSIDY.

At the present time, however, commercial aviation, far from having reached a stage of development in which it would serve as a support to a military air force, is still in a position of almost absolute dependence upon Government aid, extended to a considerable extent with a military purpose in view. The only incentive to commercial development of any kind is the prospect of profits and aviation has not yet reached a stage where this prospect is a powerful stimulant. Traffic is light and costs are still very high, and if the incidental but essential charges of providing landing fields, meteorological service, etc., were included most commercial companies could not now attempt to operate. Moreover, the very nature of air transport, its interstate and international aspect, necessitates a breadth of influence in its controlling power which, at the present time, no commercial company enjoys. So it is that in all countries commercial aviation has shown activity in almost direct proportion to the governmental assistance and encouragement it has received. * * *

In France the policy of direct assistance has been liberally maintained. Under the direction of an undersecretariate for aviation subsidies are paid to air transport companies based on the type of material employed, its adaptability to military use and the nature, length, and regularity of services operated. Subsidies amounting to one-half the purchase price are also granted on the purchase of aircraft constructed after July 1, 1920. The appropriation for these subsidies was increased from 9,500,000 francs in 1919 to 23,000,000 in 1920 and 32,000,000 in 1921. In 1920 subsidies formed 75 per cent of the earnings of air transportation companies.

British criticism of this system takes the view that such liberality maintains machines of any type without sufficient regard to their utility and efficiency and to the value of the work accomplished and even encourages purely military types. Very close supervision is maintained by the Government over all aerial activities, and subsidies are granted subject to comprehensive restrictions regarding operating details, including passenger and freight rates, which have been very much reduced. Insurance is made compulsory and tends toward State control.

In several other continental countries direct as well as indirect governmental assistance is extended. The Governments of Belgium, Germany, Holland, and Rumania grant subsidies of various types to private companies. In other countries, notably Italy, Government assistance is strongly advocated but has not yet been obtained, with the result that most commercial ventures have failed to materialize.

The present state of commercial aviation abroad is portrayed by the map of western Europe. On this map the heavy lines indicate air routes, either mail, freight, or passenger, which are traveled regularly according to schedule by the aircraft of a commercial company. The broken lines indicate routes which are now operated only occasionally or which are under serious consideration and likely to be inaugurated in the near future. Needless to state, there are scores of other routes, not indicated here, which have been and are the subject of much prophecy and promise but of which as yet there has been little progress toward actual operation.

The development of commercial aviation in the United States has been along lines different from that in Europe, due partly to the fact that the public has not been familiarized with flying as were the populations of the belligerent European countries and partly to the absence of a definite governmental policy. Commercial transportation companies have received neither assistance nor encouragement and in consequence private enterprises of this nature have accomplished very little. On the other hand the Government, in the Army, Navy, and Post Office Departments, has been active in experiments of great value to commercial aviation, so that in the United States the one distinctive example of successful aerial transportation on a large scale is not strictly commercial but is merely civil, as distinct from military aviation.

At the present time the air mail, including its contract lines, is the only manifestation of commercial activity in the air on any considerable scale in this country. It is estimated that there are about 100 air transportation companies in the United States, but regular operation of substantial commercial importance has scarcely begun. Passenger transportation has made a beginning, principally on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, but most of this is pleasure travel. In the United States there has been no resort to aerial travel as a purely practical means of saving time which can be compared to the London-Paris traffic, for example.

With a few relatively unimportant exceptions the routes enumerated comprise the total tangible results of nearly three years of commercial development in this country and abroad. The present discussion has applied exclusively to heavier-than-air machines. In a forecast of the future of commercial aviation or in a study of its possibilities the lighter-than-air craft would have a very important part, but in a résumé of its achievements there is little to be said at this time. Remarkable demonstrations have been made by dirigibles, in particular the return trip of the R-34 across the Atlantic, and progress in the art of handling these huge craft has been encouraging. However, with the exception of the German dirigible Bodensee, which is said to have carried a large number of paying passengers with entire success, there has been no example of lighter-than-air commercial operation.

The condition of many of the existing commercial companies is precarious, and very few are able to operate with a substantial profit. As regards the European companies at least, withdrawal of Government support, direct or indirect, would involve the failure of practically all of them. Nevertheless the fact that they do now operate scheduled routes with a high degree of regularity and safety under meteorological conditions, which, particularly on cross-channel lines, are as unfavorable as any in the Temperate Zone, is distinctly encouraging.

HANDICAPS TO COMMERCIAL DEVELOPMENT.

Commercial aviation is laboring under many difficulties, some of which have already been indicated. By far the greater part of the material in use is converted war material, built for extraordinary performance rather than economy. This material must in some way be worked off the market before new and better models can profitably be built. Traffic is light and variable and the uncertainty of its future volume and nature is a severe handicap. There are in addition many technical details, both in regard to material and organization, that appear to be of a minor character but frequently turn out to be important to economical operation. Passport and customs regulations are still a restraint to international services. The fact that night flying is not yet commercially possible handicaps air transportation in competition with other means of communication.

Airplane costs are still felt to be too high. Of course, speed must be and will be paid for. The cost per airplane-mile of operation between London and Paris is estimated by British authorities at from 38d. to 40d., and the cost of transporting goods by airplane at from 36d. to 44d. per ton-mile in contrast to a maximum figure of 2½d per ton-mile by rail, in England, and a very much smaller figure by water. Speed is evidently the only basis on which airplanes can compete with existing means of transportation. A comparison of rates between London and Paris is enlightening. Air transportation on this route costs twice as much for passengers and three to ten times as much for freight as the older and slower methods, to say nothing of higher insurance rates. It is clear that, particularly with regard to freight, the amount of traffic which can afford to pay the present premium for speed is strictly limited. Mail, the highest paying class of freight, appears to offer the most favorable opportunities.

Under these many unfavorable conditions absence of profits should not be taken as evidence that commercial aviation can not be made profitable in the near future. In particular, mail traffic alone offers to European companies distinctly better possibilities than have yet been realized. As long as it is left to the initiative of the sender of a letter to specify that it shall go by airplane and to pay an extra charge for the time saved comparatively few letters will be sent by air. When, however, the regularity and efficiency of air dispatch are recognized to such an extent that all first-class mail on certain routes is sent by air, as it is in the United States, extra postage will not be needed, and the position of the transport companies will be very much improved.

The greatest handicap by far to further development of commercial aviation lies much deeper than present financial prospects of the industry. It is the continued lack of public confidence in the safety and reliability of air transportation. The fact that voyages may be prevented, even infrequently, by weather conditions makes the business man loath to depend upon air service. More serious still, as long as the personal risk looms large in the public mind, be it real or imaginary, the number of people who will travel by air will be strictly limited. And the element of danger is still prominent in aviation. Though a certain mental inertia, a natural conservatism, may have some effect, by far the greatest cause of the lack of public confidence is the continued prevalence of accidents and fatalities. The fact that all modes of transportation were accompanied by many casualties in their early stages of development does not detract from the extremely harmful effects which flying accidents now have upon air transportation. Flying has been handicapped from the beginning by having assumed the aspect of a dangerous sport in the public mind and the widespread publicity which accompanies every accident tends to deepen this unfortunate impression.

Since the armistice accidents have been increasing in number in some countries at a higher rate than the increase in flying. The most carefully compiled figures, those for British commercial aviation, show the death rate of passengers to have increased from 0.10 per thousand passengers carried in the six months ending March 31, 1920, to 0.22 in the six months ending September 30, 1920, and to 0.30 in the six months ending March 31, 1921. In the 23 months from May, 1919, to March, 1921, inclusive, 20 persons were killed and 21 injured in a total of 48 accidents, or 1 accident for every 33,200 miles flown. In the United States the number of casualties, both in military and civil flying, has been alarming, although it is not possible to determine the accident rate, as no official reports are required either of flights or accidents.

Progress toward increased safety in flying has not been so great as that in developing speed, capacity, and cruising radius. Motors are more powerful and to a considerable extent more reliable than before the war, but they are still subject to sudden failure, due usually to weakness of important accessories rather than that of the engine itself. Forced landings are frequent, and as yet no proper provision has been made in most countries for emergency landing fields on established air routes. Speed is the outstanding feature of the airplane, and speed has been particularly emphasized in military design. But safety is the first consideration in time of peace, and speed must be sacrificed in the first years of the industry in so far as safety makes it necessary. The operation of air routes with greater regularity than at present and, above all, with as near absolute safety as possible over a long period of time, is the only way to establish public confidence in air transportation.

At the present time it is undoubtedly true that a considerable proportion of accidents is due to the large surplus of military planes still in use which are too old for flight or which have not been given the proper care. The situation in the United States in this regard is very much worse than in most other countries, where Government supervision of civilian flying is practiced. The lack of official regulation of aviation in some form is the greatest detriment to increased safety in flying in this country. The present situation in the United States is one of total absence of regulation, with the exception of a very few State laws and municipal ordinances. In most parts of the country there is nothing to prevent any pilot from operating any machine, without regard to his competency or its condition. It may well happen, and often does happen, that an irresponsible pilot will fly a machine unfit for use, with imminent danger to the life of himself, his passengers, and the safety of the community. In case of accident the entire aircraft industry suffers through the injury to its most vital asset, its reputation with the public.

The operation of airplanes for other than transportation purposes would, if properly regulated and supervised, perform a valuable service to commercial aviation by familiarizing large numbers of people with the advantages of aerial transportation. A system of licensing by which the safety of such flying could be improved can not be established, however, without the enactment of an air law. That an air law must be at least national in scope is evident from the very nature of aviation, and considering the distances already covered by commercial air routes the advantage of a law which is internationally uniform is apparent.

The aeronautical commission of the peace conference drafted a convention for the regulation of air navigation which was signed, with some few reservations, by the representatives of all the Allied and Associated Powers, the United States included. It is generally believed that this convention would be an excellent foundation for an air law for the United States, but as the signatures of the American representatives have not been ratified the United States is deprived of the benefits of this code which the other nations enjoy. Efforts to establish an American air law have encountered a fierce conflict in regard to the form of the supervising organization and as yet have been without tangible results. It is gradually being realized by all those concerned with the future of American commercial aviation that the need for an air law is so pressing that its method of administration is a secondary consideration. When this attitude becomes general substantial progress may be expected.

Besides being the first step in the reduction of fatalities, the enactment of an air law will accomplish other valuable results. Wise regulation may be expected to give a certain stability to the air transportation industry essential to any industry which must appeal for credit and for investment capital. Until this is attained air transportation can not be said to be on a business basis. Insurance, for example, which is essential to commercial aircraft operation, is in this country in a state of confusion, whereas in England it has had a regular and orderly development. So vital a point as the limit of liability of an owner of aircraft is still in considerable doubt in this country. A sound insurance business can be built only upon adequate data covering registration and inspection, such as Government regulation will supply, and upon laws which clearly establish the legal status of aircraft. From whatever point of view the subject is approached the conclusion is unescapable that the enactment of an air law is the first essential step toward the development of commercial aviation in the United States.

STATUS OF AVIATION ABROAD.

[Compiled from information submitted by attachés of foreign embassies and obtained by the Aircraft Manufacturers' Association.]

France, Great Britain, Germany, Holland, Rumania, and Belgium are granting subsidies to commercial aviation companies. In other countries, notably Italy, Government subsidies are strongly advocated but have not yet been obtained, with the result that most commercial enterprises have failed to materialize.

Through the courtesy of European air attachés and diplomatic representatives in Washington, and through the cooperation of the Air Service and the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, as well as by direct investigation abroad, the Manufacturers' Aircraft Association is able to present the following review of aeronautical activity, nation by nation, throughout the world.

AUSTRALIA.

Australia is organizing an air force which, with civilian aviation activities, will be under the control of a board including in its personnel representatives of the army, navy, and commercial interests. The Government hopes to map all possible air routes, make appropriations to encourage civil aviation, and provide in this a civilian reserve and assure an operating aircraft industry able to supply planes and motors in case of war. For this the budget appropriates £500,000 (about $2,500,000 at normal exchange) for military and £100,000 for civilian aviation in 1921.

BELGIUM.

Belgian aeronautical activity is under the jurisdiction of the premier group of the minister of national defense, who has under his supervision a department headed by a director of aeronautics. The development of civil aviation is under this director. Commercial, passenger, freight, and mail lines are being operated between Brussels and Paris and Brussels and London. Belgium has assigned air attachés to all important capitals of the world. Their duties are to aeronautics what those of the military and naval attachés are to the military and naval branches of the Government.

BRAZIL.

Brazil is developing an air force, and has formulated certain rules and regulations concerning civilian flying. Representatives of the Curtiss Corporation, continually flying over Rio de Janeiro and other cities, created much enthusiasm in aeronautics. Practically the only restriction on flying to date has been the rule that a pilot must have a Government permit.

CANADA.

Canada has an air board, which supervises all federal and civilian aeronautics. It was established by an act of Parliament, June 6, 1919. A chairman and advisory officers were appointed immediately. They in turn divided the work of the air board into three branches, each under a superintendent: Flying operations, certificate branch, and a secretariat. The superintendent of flying operations controls all Government flying. The certificate branch conducts that part of the administration relating to the public, such as licensing of pilots and personnel, inspection of aircraft and air harbors. The secretary has charge of the office organization.

The Canadian air board at once issued orders against dangerous flying and then set to work on regulations. The rules were established by 1920. They conform to the air board act and the international aerial convention.

Preliminary surveys have formed the basis for a network of aerial routes and landing fields designed to facilitate the development of commercial aviation in time of peace and the transportation of aerial troops, supplies, and munitions from one end of the Dominion to the other in time of war.

The board is also gathering meteorogolical data, and during the 11 months in 1920 the air board reported the following: Private air pilot's certificates, 60 applied for and 51 issued; commercial air pilot's certificates, 118 applied for and 59 issued; certificates of aircraft registration, 137 applied for and 96 issued; air harbor certificates, 47 applied for and 6 permanent and 28 temporary issued pending per-improvement of facilities.

All civilian and commercial flying organizations are required to make monthly reports detailing the number of machines in operation, number of flying hours, accidents, and so forth.

DENMARK.

The navy and army departments have respective jurisdiction over aviation in Denmark. Regular air service carrying mail and passengers has been established between the three Scandinavian countries. These countries, with Copenhagen as a center, are in direct regular air-service communication with west and south Europe by the following routes: Copenhagen to Warnemunde, Berlin, and Copenhagen; Hamburg–Amsterdam–London. This air service is conducted by private Danish firms, but the Government assists in every way possible.

FRANCE.

French aviation is divided into three branches—military, naval, and civilian, the last under the undersecretary of state for aeronautics. It is a branch of the ministry of public works. The common point between these three branches of French aviation lies in the technical section of aeronautics. During 1920 it was found that a great deal of money was saved by having in the same organization all the aeronautical engineers of the army and navy. This was based on the experience that any improvement in the mechanical branch of the art necessarily must be of benefit to all aviation activities.

The undersecretary of state for aeronautics is M. Flandin. Late in 1920 Gen. Dumesnil was chief of military aeronautics and Capt. Valdenaire chief of naval aviation. M. Fortante was chief of the technical section, involving the other three branches. Aerial attachés have been appointed to the important countries of the world. The French aerial attaché in Washington is Capt. de Lavergne. France has sent temporary or permanent aviation missions to other countries, including those in South America and Asia, for the purposes of supporting French manufacturers, surveying markets, establishing air transportation under the respective Governments, and in some cases acting as temporary military missions, instructing foreign Governments in organizing their aviation departments.

Late in 1920 there was a project to establish an aerial arm of national defense, which was to be brought before the Chamber of Deputies for ratification. This aerial arm would be similar in operation to infantry, artillery, and cavalry. It would double the flying pay, promotions would be more rapid, and retirement after 20 years of service, with the same pay as in the others after 30 years. A special school of aeronautics was to have been organized at Fontainebleau. A scientific school for aeronautical engineering has already been created at Versailles.

Approximately 40,000 letters a month have been carried by the French lines operating between Paris and London. The air mail postage in Europe is slightly in excess of ordinary postage. All landing fields are in charge of the office of aerial navigation. These fields are bought, established, and equipped at the expense of the Government. The civil plane finds there a shelter as well as gasoline, oil, repair facilities, and mechanics, all for a small fee. All communications, wireless stations, meteorological posts are installed by the Government office of communications.

For each trip undertaken by a company recognized by the Government certain bonuses are given. The sum of various bonuses covers, for instance, for the trip from Paris to London a total of almost 700 francs, or $140. During the next 10 years the Government will continue to award these bonuses in order to support civilian aeronautics and to help develop it. In return for this Government assistance private companies are required to accept the control and supervision of the Government according to the rules and regulations laid down. The planes must be kept in perfect condition, and the Government may have a plane condemned and discarded.

French aerial activity centers at Paris, which is a terminal for three routes operated daily—to London, Brussels, and Amsterdam, and also for a service to Strassburg, Prague, and Warsaw, for which departures are made three times a week. The latter is interesting as a part of an ambitious plan eventually to extend an air line to Vienna, Budapest, Belgrade, Bucharest, and Constantinople. From Toulouse airplanes leave four times a week for Barcelona, Alicante, Malaga, Rabat, and Casablanca, carrying mail, passengers, and freight. A stop is made for lunch at Barcelona, and at Alicante for the night. This was the first commercial route established in France and has been eminently successful, aided, of course, by subsidy.

There are in addition a number of short aerial routes in operation in France, as indicated on the map. Most of these are scheduled for three and four times a week. There were in all, at the end of last year, some 15 French companies engaged in aerial transportation on regular routes, with a total equipment of about 450 machines.

FRENCH COMMERCIAL AVIATION.

France has gone ahead of England in the promotion of its commercial aviation, as illustrated, for instance, by the statement in the Journal des Debats, of September 2, 1921, that during June last French air companies carried 1,553 passengers while British companies carried only 400. The considerable increase in traffic in 1920, as compared with 1919, is shown in the following table:

French commercial aviation traffic 1919 and 1920.

The longest traffic route at present is that from Toulouse to Casablanca, Morocco, which takes about a day and a half with a stop overnight. Other foreign services are: Paris to London, four times daily, 2½ hours; Paris–Brussels, 2 hours; Paris–Amsterdam, 4¾ hours; Paris–Strasburg–Prague, 7 hours; Paris–Warsaw, daily, except Sunday, 12¼ hours; Bayonne–Bilbao–Santander, daily, 2½ hours. Services within France include: Bordeaux–Toulouse–Montpellier, 3½ hours; Montpellier–Nimes–Avignon–Nice, twice weekly, 2¾ hours.

In France, Government assistance has indeed been very considerable, which can be readily appreciated from the following:

AMOUNT OF SUBSIDY.

The sum of 33,215,000 francs has been voted for civil aviation subsidies during the financial year 1921–22.

The subsidies to be granted are of two kinds:

(a) A subsidy for purchase, and

(b) A subsidy for public transport.

In all cases the subsidies will only be granted, subject to the approval of the undersecretary of state for air, to French subjects and companies employing French material, French pilots and personnel.

METHOD OF ALLOCATION OF SUBSIDIES.

(a) Subsidy for purchase.

This subsidy consists of a grant by the State of half the value of machines employed for training and transport by air and will not be given to any business connected directly or indirectly with the sale of aeronautical material.

The types of machines to be subsidized and the value thereof will be fixed by the undersecretary of state for air.

The purchaser receiving a subsidy must undertake:

(1) That he will keep the machine in good condition and report to the undersecretary of state when it is unserviceable.

(2) That the machine does not leave French territory without consent of the undersecretary of state.

(3) That he will not sell the machine without the consent of the undersecretary of state.

(b) Subsidies for transport.

The subsidies for transport are granted only to legally constituted French companies, carrying out regular air service of recognized utility.

The value of the subsidy varies according to the nature of the enterprise, the type of material employed, the regularity of the service, and the commercial turnover.

Special conditions governing the grant of subsidies:

(1) The company must possess a minimum number of machines equal to twice the quotient attained by dividing by 200, in the case of land machines, and 150, in the case of seaplanes, the number of flying hours. Represented by the total annual distance flown by the company machines at a speed of 130 kilometers per hour.

(2) The company must employ to a minimum the following personnel:

(a) One pilot for every three machines.

(b) One mechanic for every 300 horsepower utilized.

(3) The rates and fares which may be charged by companies are fixed according to the following tariff laid down by the undersecretary of state for air. Passengers, 0.80 franc per passenger-kilometer; goods, 0.015 franc per kilogram-kilometer.

GERMANY.

Germany has a ministry of air and transport. Immediately after its creation early in 1920 several new transport and aerial manufacturing companies were formed. Liberal subsidies have been granted to manufacturing and passenger-carrying companies.

Although the development of commercial aviation in Germany, particularly in regard to international operations, has been severely handicapped by the terms of the peace treaty, there has been remarkable progress in establishing air routes within the country. As indicated on the map, the principal cities are interconnected by a network of air lines, most of which are operated regularly. Schedules are so arranged that the interior services connect advantageously with the international routes at Hamburg, Bremen, and Berlin. In 21 months of operation the principal commercial company is reported to have carried more than a million pounds of freight, which includes 72,500 pounds of mail and 5,545 passengers. The German industry has been relieved of a large surplus of military material by the destruction of most of it under the terms of the treaty. In technical skill the German designers hold a high place, and some of the most noteworthy technical advances since the war have originated in that country.

GREAT BRITAIN.

All aviation in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is under the air ministry. Military and naval aviation is included in the Royal Air Force operating under the air ministry. The ministry also has jurisdiction over civilian aviation, control of fields, inspection and licensing of machines and pilots. Many air lines operate daily between Great Britain and the Continent. While the Royal Air Force is the dominating scheme of the government organization, the air council of the ministry includes Winston Spencer Churchill, secretary of state for air; the Marquis of Londonderry, undersecretary of state for air; Air Marshal Sir Hugh M. Trenchard, chief of the air staff; Maj. Gen. Sir Frederick H. Sykes, controller general of civil aviation; Air Vice-Marshal Sir E. L. Ellington, director general of supply and research; W. F. Nicholson, secretary of the air ministry.

The ministry is divided into departments, the department of the secretary including the air historical branch, a directorate of contracts, a finance department, and a directorate of lands. The department of the chief of the air staff handles all operations and intelligence, training and organization, personnel, equipment, medical services, works and buildings. The department of the controller general of civil aviation has charge of all commercial aerial navigation and enforcement of aerial laws, information, communications, licensing of airdromes and pilots, and meteorological data, all cooperating with officials assigned from the Royal Air Force. The department of the director general of supply and research has charge of all research, designs, armament, instruments, aircraft supplies, and aeronautical inspection. Late in 1920 Great Britain had air attachés in all important capitals. Air Commodore L. E. O. Charlton is air attaché at Washington.

Great Britain recently out of a direct appropriation of £1,000,000 for civil aviation has allocated the sum of £60,000 for the purpose of granting subsidies to civilian companies, and certain companies now have these subsidies under consideration. There seems to be appreciable understanding in the press, notably the London Times, of the necessity to subsidize commercial enterprises in order to allow them to successfully compete with France, and the tenor of information points toward increasing and expanding these grants.

It will be noted that in England there has been no internal development. Due to the short distances to be covered and the excellence of existing means of communication, England in itself is not a favorable field. The important routes are across the Channel, from London to Paris, to Brussels, and to Amsterdam.

The London-Paris route, the most active of any in the world, was served in the fall of 1920 by four British and three French companies, all of which gave daily service with at least one departure from each terminal. At present there are two British and two French companies active. The passenger fare of £6 6s. includes transportation by automobile to and from the center of each city to its landing field. With this included, the time for the trip averages about four hours, a saving of six hours over the boat and train route at slightly less than twice the cost. The 223-mile flight takes from two to two and a half hours. Passengers are allowed 30 pounds of baggage without charge. Mail is carried for additional postage of 2d. per ounce; and freight charges, on a sliding scale, amount to 9s. per pound on parcels up to 10 pounds in weight.

On the London-Brussels route but one Belgian company now operates, the British company having abandoned the field. The scheduled time for the trip of 210 miles is two and one-half hours. This service advances all British mail passing through Brussels for interior points by a full day.

The longest of the three routes from London is that to Amsterdam, a trip of 258 miles. Daily departures in both directions were formerly made by two British companies, with Rotterdam an intermediate stop on the homeward trip. A single Dutch company now gives daily service. The scheduled time is two and one-half hours. The mail charge is 4½d. per ounce and a single fare £8 8s. This route connects with several continental routes whose terminals are at Amsterdam, and in consequence the Danish and German mails arriving in Amsterdam are sent direct to London by air.

Three commercial air routes are operating between England and the Continent: London to Paris, 223 miles; London to Brussels, 210 miles; London to Amsterdam, 258 miles. The Government grants a bonus equal to about 25 per cent of the operating receipts of companies engaged in commercial flying.

Strict rules are enforced regarding importations into the United Kingdom. Imports worth £512,722 were flown into the United Kingdom in 12 months. Exports for the year aggregated £235,045 in value. Aircraft departing for the Continent in 12 months totaled 1,455, and 1,325 arrived in England; 51,535 letters left the United Kingdom for Paris, Brussels, and Amsterdam and 45,077 letters from those cities between November, 1919, and October, 1920.

CIVIL AVIATION IN ENGLAND.

The following is a summary of British civil aviation, including continental services from London to Paris, to Brussels, and to Amsterdam, during the years 1919 and 1920:

Traffic.	May 1, 1919, to Mar. 31, 1920.	Apr. 1, 1920, to Mar. 31, 1921.
Number of machine flights	37,821	26,154
Approximate machine mileage	691,900	901,800
Number of passengers carried	67,940	42,448
Weight of goods carried (tons)	46	124½

It will be seen from the above table that there was a decided decrease in the number of passengers carried and number of machine flights made from April 1, 1920, to March 31, 1921, as compared to the previous year. This is due to the fact that the Aircraft Transport & Travel Co. discontinued its cross-channel services December 17, 1920, and owing to the heavy French subsidies and the consequent reduction of fares Messrs. Handley-Page found themselves no longer in a position to compete with the French air transport companies and ceased operations.

In consequence of the suspension of the British continental services, a small committee was appointed in February by the secretary of state for air to examine the whole question of financial assistance for British firms operating on the cross-channel routes, with the result that temporary arrangements were made with Messrs. Handley-Page and the Instone Air Line for the revival of a daily service between London and Paris, each firm being guaranteed a profit of 10 per cent of its receipts from the carriage of passengers, goods, and mail, with a maximum liability to the Government in each case of £25,000.

ITALY.

Since July 1, 1920, commercial aviation in Italy has been under the jurisdiction of the permanent board of aeronautics, which, broadly speaking, controls the development of both military and naval aviation. Army air service operations are controlled by the inspector of army aeronautics, and naval aerial operations by an inspector of naval aeronautics. These are Gen. Moris and Admiral Orsini, respectively, while Profs. Volterra and Panetti comprise the other members of the board.

All military and naval aircraft are developed and produced by the army air service, assisted by technical officers from naval aviation when the planes are to be used by the latter branch. Operations are conducted separately by both land and sea aerial forces, while the aviators are trained in separately conducted schools.

The army air service, beginning January 1, 1921, will include four divisions, that dealing with commercial aeronautics, the operating division, the technical and administrative divisions. Technical sections under the jurisdiction of the war department include experimental branches for both heavier and lighter than air craft, all in the technical division; also an ordnance bureau, radio office, aerological, and photographic services. * * * Italy has assigned aerial attachés to France, England, the United States, and Sweden. Lieut. Col. A. Guidoni is attaché at Washington.

The commercial aeronautics branch of the army air service is continuing the work of preparing aerial routes and establishing landing fields throughout the Kingdom.

Several commercial companies are endeavoring to maintain regular services. They are assisted by the Government, which maintains the landing fields and defrays the expenses incident to charting air routes. The Government also nourishes the industry by buying all its machines from manufacturers, with two results: Machines and equipment can be secured more economically from private factories operating on a competitive basis than if built in Government-owned and operated factories; also, the maintenance of a civilian industry provides the country with a nucleus for quantity production in case of war.

Aerial laws have been made in accordance with the International Aerial Convention and local regulations are based on those provisions.

JAPAN.

Aviation in Japan is under the supervision of the Government, military and naval aviation being part of the army and navy establishments, and the air mail service now being organized under the supervision of the department of communications—all, however, cooperating in conferences for the development of machines, routes, and the training of pilots.

Japan is encouraging aviation through federal assistance, although this is mostly in the form of honors, awards, and instructions to individuals. No commercial enterprise has as yet been subsidized by the Government, but indications are that airplane construction companies will soon be so subsidized. Japanese progress and activity in aviation is backward and appears largely confined to that which is directly under Government control.

[NOTE.—For aviation status of other countries see the Aircraft Year Book for 1921, p. 158.]

It seems interesting to me to give you some figures which give a right idea of the progress made in Europe in the matter of commercial aviation.

You will find below the records of the trips completed on our several routes and on those of England and Germany, as well as the number of passengers carried and the weight of the freight and mail.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, by direction of my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky], I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the other day when the bill making appropriations for independent offices was under consideration, I did not have the opportunity, either under general debate or under the five-minute rule, to make a few observations which I deem to be of some importance to the people in New Orleans, which I have the honor in part to represent, myself and my splendid friend and colleague, GARLAND DUPRÉ, representing the entire city and some few adjoining parishes that correspond to your counties.

I have no fault to find with the administration of the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation. I am not a critic by nature. I do not think the Almighty ever intended that I should play any spectacular or stellar engagement in that direction. I view with sympathy and I propose to support all of the efforts made by the officers and members of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation to accomplish the great purpose which the American people are looking to them to accomplish. I do not believe in finding fault with what is considered the extravagant performances of the war period. I do not know that it would do any good. I believe it is Dryden who says:

> Not Heaven itself upon the past has power;
> But what has been, has been.

After we had declared that there was a state of war in existence between this country and Germany a tremendous wave of emotionalism stirred our people; the war spirit spread over the land; that emotionalism and that war spirit swept people off their feet; men in high position responded to the tremendous cry that had gone up from ocean to ocean to hurry on and beat Germany. It was that martial enthusiasm and exalted patriotism, that desire to deliver a knock-out blow early and end the war, which was responsible for a great many of the extravagances of the war. What else could anyone expect? When in all history was war economical? War and economy are an absurd contradiction. As has been said time and again on this floor, in the press, and from the pulpit, war in itself is the most reckless extravagance, and every incident that pertains to it is necessarily extravagant. It is not difficult to recall the thrill of those never-to-be-forgotten days when the soul of America was soaring to Olympian heights. I recall them vividly, for from New Orleans as a viewpoint I could sense the atmosphere of the Nation and particularly of the cities. Our tense interest was the interest of every village, hamlet, and city in America, for as the late Robert Ingersoll once said, all cities in their mass attitudes emotionally, anyhow, are alike; they have their streets and their alleys, their great outstanding buildings, and their men, women, and children; and the conditions that spring from the facts of their existence produce about the same results. So, too, does the country boy of Louisiana and Maine, Mississippi and Oregon respond, react to the same influences, and how nobly they did respond to the call of their country! When shall their glory fade? Those days shall never fade from our memories, and the heroism of the brave youth of this land should never fade from the minds of men and women who love their native land because it is their own and scorn to give aught other reason why. You remember when the cry, "Food will win the war" and "War stamps will win the war" and "Ships and more ships" rang through the land like a bugle blast. Where, then, was the man rash or bold enough to believe from a common-sense standpoint he ought to protest against that emotionalism and the riotous extravagance which accompanied it and which evidenced that America was moved and thrilled to the depths of her soul? No one would have been permitted to protest against any expenditure, however great. Summary punishment would have been meted out to him whose folly would suggest economy in a time when every other idea should have been drowned in the thought, Win the war. During the debate upon the antilynching bill a few days ago these thoughts came back to me, and I concluded that potentially, much as we might deplore it, all Americans are capable of becoming lynchers.

If a man stood out against the best interests of his country during that period when we were all thrilled with patriotism "from head to toenails," when our brave boys were crossing the ocean, when we were looking at them leaving schoolhouses and the various other meeting places where they assembled in order to take the train and reach the Atlantic seaboard, if during that time a man had said anything to arouse the faintest suspicion that he was not all American and was not fully in accord with the mothers and fathers of those who were going out to die for us, he would have been summarily dealt with and lynched judicially or extrajudicially, either within or without the forms of law. I make this observation, as I said before, in connection with the bill which I did not have the opportunity to discuss. But my course in these remarks is somewhat like that of Joseph Conrad in Lord Jim, said to be one of the greatest novels ever written. I am "somewhat vacillating," moving forward in pursuit of one train of thought and then moving backward to pick up another. I have not prepared, in the usual meaning of the word, this address. So let me swing backwards.

When the independent offices appropriation bill was under consideration the Dallinger amendment was under discussion to a large extent during two or three days. The purpose of that amendment, which I supported and which was adopted, is to give the navy yards an opportunity to estimate on the repair work of the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation, and, though not so expressed, to estimate for the reconditioning of the Leviathan. The debate showed that the people of Boston are extremely anxious, as a result of widespread unemployment, to secure this work. I understood from some newspaper comments that I read that New York was also eagerly looking for this work. That, gentlemen, is a result of unemployment and the anxieties and miseries which flow from this curse that has recurrently afflicted humanity through all the centuries that have rolled their way into eternity since this globe first began to revolve on its axis, and which has apparently become accentuated as a result of a social order in which we prosper in the face of scarcity and starve in sight of plenty. I would imagine that it is difficult for one of us who knows where he is going to sleep, and who knows that he can sit down and have something to eat—I dare say it is difficult for one of us to realize the agonizing torture that must at times threaten to dethrone a man's reason when he is out of employment and when he has a family dependent upon him for support. To the hopeless and saddened eyes of a man who has a wife and little boys and girls to protect and rear unemployment makes for the darkest chapter in his existence. During my day I have seen men in that terrible condition. I had hoped and prayed to God that I would never see that condition again. But man's hopes and prayers and tears do not prevent soul-trying calamities. God moves in mysterious ways His wonders to perform. We are face to face with poverty and misery in this country to-day. I can therefore view with all my heart's sympathy the attempt on the part of the people of Boston to secure the work which they think will alleviate the suffering or probably prevent the starvation that confronts a great many of their men who are willing to work but are idle to-day.

I can thoroughly understand the intention on the part of the mayor of Boston and the Representatives in Congress of that great metropolis and its environs in attempting to secure work of this or any other description in order to tide over many an unfortunate man who is walking the streets and looking into the future with misty eyes and troubled hearts. God pity the man who has four or five children and a wife and has not the money to pay the rent and has not the money to go to the grocery store and get the ordinary necessities of life. Yes; and the Nation should not only pity him but succor and make employment, for we are our brother's keeper, and no greater maxim could a country have than the misfortune of one is the concern of all.

The people believe that they have a right to look to Government—National, State, county, and city—to protect the welfare of the country by alleviating the sufferings which flow from unemployment and poverty as far as the means and ability of Government will permit. People all over the civilized world expect it, and I think the President is in accord with the idea, because he is urging the Cabinet officers to hurry up what work they have to do and do it now. And he is appealing to every agency of Government, State and National, as well as to business interests, to make work for the poor and needy. Of course, my friends, I may say it is an indictment of the social order and civilization under which we are living that all this distress is on account of Europe's inability to buy our goods. Millions are starving on the other side because there is nothing with which to purchase the necessities of life, and we are confronted with starvation in the face of the fact that our granaries are bursting with the foodstuffs stored therein. While there is enough in sight to feed and clothe the world and make all mankind content and happy, we are confronted with gaunt want as a result of not having an international fiscal system that would make for an exchange of products and for that employment and industry prayed for by millions on both sides of the world. Yes; I am perhaps pursuing a vacillating course, but I hope to reach the point I have in mind.

While we were discussing the hopes of Boston in the way of reconditioning this monster of the deep, the Leviathan, in order to keep at work those who are presently in that yard, and who are apprehensive they might soon be on the street, and to provide for some of the great number who are to-day tramping about that city looking for bread, I could not help but contemplate what a slight change in our so-called world economic order can change prosperity into a cataclysm. Not long ago all our people appeared to be happy and content. They were so busy that no thought was given to Government work. To-day, as a result of widespread depression, poverty, want, and misery, Boston, New York, and Newport News are struggling to recondition the Leviathan, and all navy yard employees are clamoring for work. Nor could I help but think of the number of navy yards we have running from Charleston up to the far north—I believe Portsmouth is the one that lies farthest north. Nor could I avoid reflecting on the fact that one might take a ship and drift down the Atlantic coast and around Florida and go along the Gulf coast until the Rio Grande is reached and not strike another navy yard, for the only navy yard that was down there was at New Orleans, on the banks of the Mississippi, in the district that I have the honor to represent, and that has been practically closed. Why I do not know. I do not profess to be an expert on naval affairs, but everyone conversant with our geographical situation realizes that if some tremendous conflict on sea should take place between us and some foe across the Atlantic, it will necessarily be at some place between the Bermudas and the Bahama Islands. As a lover of peace, as one who hopes for English-speaking solidarity, as one who prays that another war may never come, may I ask as an American why does Great Britain hold on to the Bermudas and the Bahamas? These islands mark the only place in which a naval engagement might be fought, and not on the North Atlantic coast. And yet, in the face of this patent and obvious fact, it is proposed to close up the New Orleans Navy Yard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. O'CONNOR. We are told by those who profess to know that for strategic purposes the New Orleans Navy Yard can be no longer considered because the Straits of Florida, 90 miles across, might be mined, and the straits between Yucatan and Cuba might be mined, and in addition to that the mouth of the Mississippi River might be mined. Gentlemen, that is true. These tremendous tasks might be accomplished; but there is no navy yard in the United States of America to which that statement does not apply with a great deal more force than it does to the New Orleans Navy Yard, because all navy yards are located in harbors or on the banks of a bay, and all of these harbors and bays could be more easily mined than the Straits of Florida or the Straits of Yucatan or the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Gentlemen, may I suggest, in view of the sympathetic attitude of the President of the United States toward the unemployed in requesting the Cabinet officers and the heads of departments to give work as rapidly as possible where it is intended to do any work, in order to relieve the sufferings of the people of the country, that it would be not only a gracious but a highly patriotic act—an act of great wisdom—to keep open the New Orleans Navy Yard, a yard that is dear to the Mississippi Valley, but particularly to the old city near the Gulf of Mexico, where there is unemployment also, for we are all suffering from the terrible visitation from which no city can escape. I respectfully suggest this course not only from the sentimental standpoint but from the broad and high ground of patriotism, for I repeat we need it, and will need it, if fate ever demands we meet on the sea any power from over the Atlantic. Keep in mind, Members of Congress and Secretary of the Navy, that our Naval Establishment should not have an eye single to one or two sections of our country, but should always be mindful of the needs, the requirements, the hopes of all the country. Like all or most of my countrymen, I hope for peace on earth and good will to all men, if that be the phraseology of that optimistic hope; but I can never forget and hope—pray that my country will never forget—that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty and of safety.

With all of the respect that a Member of Congress should have for the Secretary of the Navy, I urge him, on behalf of the people of New Orleans, to keep in operation the only yard we have after you leave Charleston, either in the South Atlantic or Gulf coasts. I believe, my friends, that it is absolutely lacking in wisdom to close the New Orleans yard, and that the old tradition and the old viewpoint ought to be adhered to—an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure. The Mississippi River and old New Orleans played a tremendous part in the struggle that ended at Appomattox. When Butler and Farragut took New Orleans the great Civil War practically came to an end. The North through that victory took control of the Mississippi and cut the Confederacy in twain. Do not, Mr. Secretary, add to the possibility, remote as it may be, of an alien from across the sea ever cutting any part of our country in twain by securing control of the mouth of the Mississippi. Do not close the New Orleans yard. It is the only one from Charleston to the Rio Grande——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose now is to get into the RECORD certain data that may be needed by some of the gentlemen who propose to discuss to-morrow the District appropriation bill now under consideration. During the address of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] he made some reference to the evolution of the bill. The bill seems to have been evolved in this way: The authorities of the District of Columbia, the commissioners, presented their estimates last fall to the Budget Bureau. The Budget Bureau at the beginning of this session of Congress, having dealt with those estimates, submitted their own estimates to Congress, and the estimates of the Budget Bureau—not the estimates of the commissioners—were taken by the Committee on Appropriations as the basis of that committee's work.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. I scarcely would want to agree with the gentleman's statement. The estimates coming from the Budget governed the committee only in this, and I think all members will agree with me, that we did not go above, but we investigated independently each and every item of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think my friend will remember that at the hearings the chairman of the subcommittee insisted that the committee had no right to exceed the Budget estimates. But whether that is correct or not——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I did not wish to be understood in that way. I said we limited our investigations to what was done in the Budget.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman at the hearings assumed, as I understand, that there was some legal reason which should prevent the consideration of estimates in excess of the Budget estimates.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I really think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not intend to do either of my friends any injustice, but to-morrow if I get the opportunity I shall quote from the hearings to show exactly what was their position. Inasmuch as we are not on that as a vital issue now, I shall use the two or three minutes I have remaining to offer the data which I wish to present.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Oh, the gentleman will excuse me. I thought he was referring to my remarks this morning.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No; I am referring to the hearings.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I remember saying during the hearings that we must confine ourselves to the Budget.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I quote now from the report of the gentleman, chairman of the subcommittee, filed for the Committee on Appropriations:

> With but a single exception have the committee recommended an appropriation in excess of the estimates.

That exception, as the report proceeded to state, involves an item of only $700. Then the report further says:

> In no other instance have they exceeded the Budget totals. On the contrary, there are but few instances where the appropriation proposed is not well below the Budget's proposal.

The point I wish to make is that the commissioners' estimates were reduced very drastically by the Budget Bureau. Why they were thus reduced we in the House do not know. Why they were reduced the Committee on Appropriations does not know to this good hour. The extent to which they were reduced is shown in the statement that I have here in my hand, which I ask permission to have incorporated in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this statement shows the eliminations and reductions by the Budget Bureau totaled $2,625,337 before the Budget made up its estimates which it sent to Congress. The Committee on Appropriations took those estimates, reduced by the bureau in that manner, and proceeded to cut them severely. The bureau's estimates were $26,888,000 plus, and we have here a bill from the committee carrying only $20,397,000 plus.

The statement I have referred to is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask the gentleman to yield me one minute more.

Mr. FIELDS. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Three milllion dollars of the decrease was on account of the water proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I quite understand that.

It is one of the most extraordinary showings that we have had in Congress since I have been here. As the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] stated this morning this bill carries a smaller amount than any appropriation put through or likely to be put through——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Not a District bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. A District bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No; I said I expressly excepted the District bill. I said it was the smallest amount of any bill coming before us from the other subcommittees.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is exactly what I am saying.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I thought the gentleman referred to any other District of Columbia bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No; I am talking about the District bill as compared with the other bills. It is the smallest in amount, and represents the most drastic reductions by the Budget Bureau and by the Committee on Appropriations that we have thus far encountered or are likely to encounter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I got permission very kindly to put some remarks in the RECORD. Now, there are some extracts contained in those remarks that I am afraid unless I get permission to put them in full-face type in the RECORD they will be put in small type which nobody will read, and I think people will be interested to see what they are, and I ask permission to have those extracts printed in full-face type in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOCHT. I offer to amend the motion that they be put in 8-point type.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRENNAN].

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, every Member of this House in common with every man and woman in the country was shocked and appalled at the disaster at the Knickerbocker Theater last Saturday evening, and while we recognize that nothing we can say, nothing we can do, can assuage the grief of the stricken families, still it is only natural and proper that we should seek some solution, some remedy to prevent such occurrences in the future. There is another condition that we who have been in the city of Washington during the past week are cognizant of which perhaps is not so well known throughout the balance of the country, and yet which we know was a great contributing factor in the loss of life and the extent of the injuries of the victims. I have learned, and no doubt you gentlemen have heard, that because of the fact that the streets of this city were clogged with snow the apparatus of the fire department and of the police department and the ambulances were unable to reach the scene of the disaster as soon as they would have if the streets had been clean. Some of this apparatus was tied up for hours and never reached the scene of the accident. And following that condition we witnessed the business of the city of Washington practically at a standstill for 48 hours. Members of this body who lived a distance from the Capitol were obliged to walk. I happen to live about 5 miles from the Capitol. There was no street-car service to my section of the city. It was almost impossible to operate a motor vehicle upon most of the city's streets. It was impossible to obtain deliveries of food and other necessities. Thousands of hours of time were wasted by the business people of the city and by Government employees; accidents without number occurred in the city's streets; and this in the Capital of the United States, a city of half a million people, whose laws are made directly by the Congress of the United States, whose administration is by commissioners under direct appointment of the President; this condition which we would not believe could exist in the darkest part of soviet Russia, this condition of a city of a half million standing still for three or four days with sidewalks and streets clogged with ice and snow, a menace to the life and limb of every man, woman, and child who used them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRENNAN. I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Where does the gentleman place the blame?

Mr. BRENNAN. I am coming to that. We have heard in the last few days that there will be many investigations of the Knickerbocker catastrophe. I believe that there are now proposed or under way four separate investigations, and I wonder whether that condition could exist in any other city in the country—an investigation by the coroner, another one by the United States district attorney, another one by the District Commissioners themselves, and a fourth one possibly by the Congress of the United States. My thought, Mr. Chairman, as to what the solution of these problems is, is that there should be some substantial change in the system of government under which the District of Columbia is administered. I can not entirely agree with certain of the District officials who blame Congress, who say that Congress has not given them sufficient money for the needs of the District, any more than I can agree entirely with the violent criticism of the District officials themselves. We appreciate that these men are perhaps as patriotic, as enthusiastic, as forward-looking as any of the municipal officials in our own cities at home, but the trouble is not with the District Committee of Congress, not with the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee having to do with these expenditures, not with the District officials, but the trouble is, Mr. Chairman, with the hybrid system by which there is a divided responsibility between the Congress, on the one hand, and the municipal government, upon the other. And when, after a disaster of this kind, it is possible for the District officials, on the one hand, to accuse Congress, and for a Senator of the United States, on the other, to say that the District officials are lax in the performance of their duties, I say it is high time to give to the people of the city of Washington authority to govern their own affairs, to elect officers of their own choosing, subject to their recall, and to have something to say regarding the adequacy of local appropriations.

The system which is now in effect, and which we have been discussing in connection with this bill, should be so modified as to give the people of the District of Columbia such a degree of self-government as to make their officials responsible to them. And when they find that the streets of Washington are so filled with snow and ice as to be a menace to life, health, and property there will be a commissioner of public works, or some corresponding official, who can be called in to explain, some man who is directly responsible to the very people who are obliged to suffer because of his derelictions. God forbid that there should ever occur again another human sacrifice such as this theater horror, but if another serious accident occurs let there be some responsible official or department to be held accountable and let us not witness again this lamentable division of authority and this prospect of four separate, duplicating, and overlapping investigations.

Mr. McSWAIN. Not being familiar with streets of cities farther north than Washington, I wish to ask if in the cities that have been incorporated by State governments—such as Philadelphia and Chicago and others—whether or not they clean the snow off promptly after a storm?

Mr. BRENNAN. I can not speak as accurately for the cities mentioned as I can for the city of Detroit, the fourth largest city in the country, which I have the honor to represent in part. The city of Detroit would clean that snow off its streets in less than 24 hours. There would be no cessation of street car service, little or no difficulty in getting to and from work. Why? Because we have in the city of Detroit a mayor, with a common council of nine men—responsible to the people, making the laws, letting the contracts, and doing the business for a city of a million people, and when the appropriations for the city of Detroit are presented for consideration there are present, usually, 100 per cent of that common council, and not 10 or 15 per cent of the legislative body as, unhappily, is sometimes the case here.

Members of Congress not on the District Committee can not be censured for not always being present on the floor when a District bill is being considered. They feel that their primary obligation is owed to the people of their respective districts. If the Member of Congress from the average busy district worked 24 hours a day he could not hope to consider fully all legislative matters and to attend, as completely as he would like to, to the needs of the disabled service men, the unemployed, the pensioners, and the other people in his district. Is it any wonder, then, that District of Columbia day in Congress is hailed by many of us as a day in which to catch up with our mail and to visit the departments in the interests of individual constituents? But what of the people of Washington who have no representative? Why should Congress not be willing to relieve itself of the burden of legislating upon these matters of liberal concern? The time of Congress is sorely needed for the business of the Nation. The people of the District are entitled, as American citizens, to have their needs looked after by officials of their own choosing who have the time to devote to their problems and who are inspired by a genuine interest in seeking a solution of those problems.

Mr. McSWAIN. Along the same line my friend noticed the figures that were published some time ago by Congressman FITZGERALD, to the effect that crime in Washington per capita is greater than in any other city in the United States, and I wish to ask my friend if in the face of these facts he voted for the antilynching law, to deprive different States of the right to administer the law of the country?

Mr. BRENNAN. I did. I yielded, thinking the gentleman was going to make some suggestion regarding the matter at hand.

There are a number of plans before the Congress. I believe bills have been introduced to make the Commissioners of the District elective, to make them responsive to the people, and to insure some degree of home rule.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that in Detroit and other large cities of the North each person whose residence fronts upon a sidewalk is under the law obliged to clean snow off his sidewalk, and is it not also true that as a usual thing the walks and the streets of the city of Detroit and the other northern cities are all passable and free from snow when it gets through snowing?

Mr. BRENNAN. Absolutely.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And this storm would be considered a very ordinary storm in Detroit and in the other cities of Michigan?

Mr. BRENNAN. Unquestionably.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And it would hardly put anybody to any inconvenience?

Mr. BRENNAN. No.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRENNAN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is not the answer as regards Washington that this was a very extraordinary storm in Washington, although it would be an ordinary storm in Detroit?

Mr. FOCHT. If the gentlemen will pardon me, I may say that there are a few more streets in Washington than there are in the average city.

Mr. BRENNAN. The city of Washington is less than one-half the population of the city of Detroit.

Mr. FOCHT. How about the street area?

Mr. BRENNAN. The area of the city of Detroit is more than one-seventh larger than the area of the District of Columbia. Its street area is more than twice as large. But to answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], this is not the only snowstorm of the winter in Washington. We have had other snows, not as heavy as this, but I understand that there is no law on the statute books which requires one to remove the snow from his sidewalk in the District of Columbia. A man can break a leg by slipping and falling on a half inch of snow as readily as by slipping on 2 feet of snow.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for three more minutes.

Mr. BRENNAN. I understand that one of the commissioners says he has no authority to regulate traffic so as to rope off a portion of the street to permit coasting by schoolboys. In the northwestern section of Washington there have been a number of serious accidents. The school children use their sleds to coast down the hills. In all the large cities of the country there is some provision for such things without being obliged to come to Congress and interrupt the consideration of a $10,000,000,000 foreign loan bill to ask for the enactment of a law to permit school children to run their sleds in safety. I understand one child was injured so badly here that his leg had to be amputated. Coasting, of course, will continue so long as the natural attraction of the snow-covered hills exists. But the District officials can not legally protect the children without the enactment of an act of Congress. Surely somewhere in local officials should be imposed an authority to regulate so essentially local a matter without the necessity of the cumbersome appeal to the Congress of the United States.

For the past 20 years home rule for cities has been one of the dominating political issues in every State in the country. Splendid advance has been made to guarantee self-autonomy to municipal communities. But to-day there does not exist in the splendid Capital of the United States even a degree of the right of self-government which is enjoyed by the humblest villages and hamlets of the country. We can never erect to the many heroes who died in the Knickerbocker disaster a physical memorial worthy of the supreme sacrifice which many of them made; but it does lie within our power to erect for them a more suitable monument by way of establishing in the city where they perished a form of government more intelligently calculated to prevent a repetition of the catastrophe of which they were the helpless victims. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that the complaint that I have to make is capable of solution in the way suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRENNAN] or not. Perhaps so. I am going to submit the case and rely on the judgment of the committee as to the manner in which it is to be solved. But it has impressed me for the last three years and more that the police force of the city of Washington is not as efficient and capable, for some reason or other, as it ought to be and as is the police force of some of our large cities. In the last Congress we remember the race riots that occurred here, in which a great many people were slain—right here in the Capital city of the United States and almost within a stone's throw of this building—and some brave policemen were killed in the performance of their duties. There was none of us at that time who did not believe that had not some of the officers turned their backs on incipient violence the whole trouble would have been nipped in the bud. Recently I have read in the newspapers that a man was virtually clubbed to death by officers who were merely trying to arrest him for a disturbance. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] to-day presented an array of statistics showing that an appalling list of crimes had been committed in this city. Major crimes, murders, burglaries, rapes, and other felonies seem to be more numerous here per thousand of population than in any other civilized city in the world.

A few evenings ago I was talking with a lady who had just returned from England, and she commented favorably upon the politeness of the London police, and she spoke of herself and her companion having improvised a lot of questions which they propounded to the police officers chiefly for the purpose of enjoying the Bobbies' ever-patient courtesy and accuracy in answering them.

So now I am going to speak of a complaint that relates not only to general inefficiency but also to a lack of courtesy on the part of the police. Last evening I and a member of my family took a Mount Pleasant car and intended to transfer at Eighteenth and Columbia Road. That is where the terrible tragedy occurred Saturday night. The place is now roped off.

The cars going out in a northwesterly direction usually stop in the 1800 block on Columbia road, and passengers transfer usually on Eighteenth Street on the lower side of Columbia Road, the side toward town. Last night the car did not stop at the usual place. On account of the theater area being roped off it stopped in the 1700 block on Columbia Road. There were a great many policemen standing around there keeping people out of the roped area. I asked one of the policemen where we should take the car. He said, "It is down there," pointing down Eighteenth Street. We went down Eighteenth Street, stumbling along over the ice, to the place where the car to which we desired to transfer usually stops. There we found the space roped off, and I asked the policeman where we took the car. He said, "It must be some place up the street." We went up the street toward the place where we had been originally, and at the corner encountered a third encyclopedia of useful knowledge, a police officer, and asked him where to take the car. He said, "It must be up the street somewhere." Well, I ventured the observation, which was perhaps a little testy, "I think you officers on duty here ought to be advised so that you can inform passengers where to take the car." He said—and this is his answer verbatim—"That is for you to find out." Gentlemen of the committee, I do not believe it could happen in any other city in the United States that three officers on a street corner roped off by order of the police could not tell a passenger where to take the street car. I do not believe it could happen in any other city in the United States that one of those three officers—the first two were courteous enough, though professing complete ignorance of the subject—that any one of those officers would be so impudent as to answer a question which perhaps was a little vexatious to him, but which was a most natural question, by saying, "That is for you to find out." Let me add that two boy scouts on duty there did know exactly where to take the car and how far the car was running.

We have, therefore, in the city of Washington a situation where policemen who are assigned to duty on a street corner do not know as much as two volunteer boy scouts.

Mr. FIELDS. Did the gentleman take the number of the policeman who was discourteous to him?

Mr. VAILE. I did not. I purposely refrained from doing that. I did not want to get the poor fellow "fired" from his job, and he was not informed by his superior. He probably has a wife and children who are dependent upon him for bread and who get also some courtesy from him. But that is the situation, and that is what happened at 20 minutes after 8 last night.

Mr. FIELDS. The next time the gentleman had better take the policeman's number.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the very interesting discussion which was had a while ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] on the question of aviation, and especially with reference to the control of the right of navigation of the air, is one which is coming to be—and soon will be—a very live question. I take it, however, that the maxim of the common law, that a man who owns the land owns ad caelum et ad infernum, still prevails, notwithstanding the intervention of the art of flying. I do not see exactly how that could destroy the right of ownership. Of course, there can be no question that this right is subordinate to the public use. The right to navigate the air over a man's land certainly will have to be acquired, recognizing the fact that the man who owns that land owns the right to the air, certainly, at least, to a finite distance up. If it is not so, then all the theory of the common law as to the ownership of real estate is destroyed if you say, "Well, it is too far up to know how far he does own," which is the same thing as too far down. I do not care how far down you go, if you find coal or if you find oil or gas, the man who owns the top is going to own that which is down there. The gentleman said that was merely a maxim, and that it was not the law. I understand the use of the word in the dictionary, and I went and looked to satisfy myself, and found what I had supposed, that a maxim is "a principle accepted as true and acted on as a rule or guide."

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Is the gentleman familiar with the doctrine of extralateral rights in mining countries?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir; I have not been familiar with extralateral rights, but I have had some litigation about the matter of heavenly rights, and I find that the doctrine is recognized that a man owns as far up as he wants to go, and he can sell a section of it above the ground or he can sell all the way up if he wants to.

Mr. VAILE. I might suggest to the gentleman that, owing to the nature of the case, in mining countries we have long established an exception to the doctrine of owning down to the center of the earth.

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, well, you have an exception where a man finds a vein on one piece of land and it runs under another, that he can follow that vein.

Mr. VAILE. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. The man who owns the surface of the land where that vein starts owns as far as the vein goes; thus it recognizes the right for him to follow his property down as far as he can identify it. Therefore, the same right will apply going up. I want to repudiate the idea that a maxim of the law is not the law but is merely a maxim. It is a principle of law that is so thoroughly settled that nobody ever questions it. I remember when I was quite a young lawyer a question arose as to the construction of a will filed in the county adjacent to me. Two or three young lawyers—and one of them is now on the bench—were very much exercised over the question, because, they said, it was a peculiar question and they could not find any decision upon it. They finally went to old Judge Hudson, one of the great lawyers of the State, then on the bench, and asked him if he knew of any decision on the matter, and he said that there was no decision on the question. They were very curious to know why there was not. The judge told them that it was so plain that nobody had ever been fool enough to raise the question. A maxim is one of those statements that is so clear and so accepted that nobody ever raises the question, and, therefore, there could be no decision upon it.

Down in my State there was an old Scotchman and a jeweler who made a trade, in which the Scotchman sold the jeweler the land and the space to about 12 feet above the top of the soil and reserved the balance above that on which to construct a hotel, with a provision that if the hotel should burn down he would have the right to rebuild it.

The hotel burned down, very naturally. Something got the matter with the finances or went wrong in some way. The whole business was burned down. The jeweler built his house up until it got about as high as he could go, and the Scotchman undertook to place the hotel on top of that. The jeweler brought suit and made the allegation that it was all bosh, that a man could not sell the air in that way, and it was not the law; that a man could not sell his land in segments, but that if he sold it he sold whatever there was above it. We litigated the question. I looked up the decisions all over the world, and it was finally settled in our State that a man did have the right to leave a Scotchman with something between him and heaven, and the courts sustained the theory that a man owned all of the air as far as there was air, and that he could sell a certain space and stop there, and that if he could find anything there to put his building on in the reserved air, he could put it there and keep it there.

My own judgment about the matter is that we are going to have legislation which will limit the distance to which a landowner owns the ocean of air, just as international law limits the distance to which the United States, for instance, owns the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans that border upon it. In other words, each nation owns the ocean in front of it, but who shall say where they shall stop? International law says 3 miles from the shore, and you are going to have to legislate and provide for a certain distance in the air, and if your right of way comes within that distance, then you have to exercise the right of eminent domain to condemn the right of way to go over another man's land. It may not cost much, but it will be worth something.

That brings us to the gentleman's bill. He says that they have undertaken to provide how they can get the right of way. I do not understand that Congress could step in and provide for the exercise of eminent domain over the property of people in the different States. The right to exercise eminent domain is acquired from the State, and the State may charter corporations and give them the power to exercise that right so as to condemn these great airplane rights of way. I do not think Congress has the right or the power to do that, and you will have very serious trouble whenever you begin it. However, it is a live question, and I am very glad that the gentleman has brought it up. It is one of the questions that has to be settled within the next few years, and the common law, I think, you will find will point the way, because it has been decided that under it you can go down 40 feet underground and sell a man a section of your land that is 40 feet deep, and it will run from 40 feet to 80 feet, and you can sell him the right to go in there, and he can go in there; and, as I say, the case in South Carolina decided that you can sell him the air up to a certain place and stop, or you can begin at a certain place above the ground and sell him above that and stop. You can cut your real estate horizontally as well as perpendicularly. The common law has always been equal to any emergency of that kind which arises, but the right to condemn the right of way, in my judgment, is going to be contested very bitterly when you undertake to allocate it to Congress instead of to the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired. All time has expired and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That 40 per cent of the following sums, respectively, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and 60 per cent out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, only, namely:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I thought we would read the first section.

Mr. WALSH. That is 40 pages.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is an appropriation bill and it is read by paragraphs. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman just withdraw that? I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10101, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. KELLER (on request of Mr. CLAGUE), on account of sickness.

Mr. FUNK, for to-day and to-morrow, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, we all have notice of the fact that to-morrow the plenary session of the Limitation of Armament Conference is to be held. I have not had an opportunity to talk with the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], but I am quite sure that many Members will be desirous of attending that conference to-morrow. I wonder if there is any gentleman on the majority side who would be willing to ask that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at, say, 1 o'clock. The meeting is at 11.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to take the responsibility of asking unanimous consent to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn to meet at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the conference will be rather lengthy, and if we are going to break the ordinary rule of convening it should be a later hour, and I should say 2 o'clock. I remember prior conferences where Members missed roll calls and did not return until rather late in the afternoon.

Mr. HICKS. Reserving the right to object, I believe the gentleman from Wisconsin is right. If we are going to adjourn, we should make it at least 2 o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have been informed by the floor leader that he is going on to-morrow with Calendar Wednesday and was not going to set it aside, and I do not see any reason——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That involves exactly the same thing.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am not objecting to making it 2 o'clock.

Mr. WALSH. I am willing to ask that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 1 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 1, 1922, at 1 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 1, 1922.

The House met at 1 o'clock p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, we would close the door and rest in the quietness of the inner chamber for a moment. Here through quiet communion and silent effort we would repeat our vows and relinquish our faults that good deeds and wholesome living may be the issues of our lives. O, weapon our minds with great thoughts, our tongues with wise speech, and our hearts with rich sentiment. As we are intrusted with great responsibility, O help us to discharge it with a fine conscience, with high principle, and in every way make right use of our vocation. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

SPANISH WAR PENSIONS.

Mr. ROBSION (when the Committee on Pensions was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Pensions I call up the bill H. R. 4.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, from the Committee on Pensions, calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4) granting relief to soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign; to widows, former widows, and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors; and to certain Army nurses.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and under the rule the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4) granting relief to soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign; to widows, former widows, and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors; and to certain Army nurses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, there are not many Members here, but perhaps there will be more by the time the amendment stage is reached. I think the bill ought to be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4) granting relief to soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign; to widows, former widows, and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors; and to certain Army nurses.

Be it enacted, etc., That the widow of any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the War with Spain, the Chinese Boxer rebellion, or the Philippine insurrection between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, and was honorably discharged from such service, or, regardless of the length of service, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and line of duty, such widow having married such soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the passage of this act, shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed upon the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act at the rate of $20 per month during her widowhood. And this section shall apply to a former widow of any officer or enlisted man who rendered service as hereinbefore described, and who was honorably discharged, such widow having remarried either once or more than once after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife; and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $20 per month; and any widow or former widow as mentioned in this section shall also be paid $4 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16 years: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise mentally or physically helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability; and this proviso shall apply to all pensions heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted under this or any former statute: Provided further, That in case of any widow whose name has been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to renewal of pension under this act until the pension to such child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon renewal of pension to such widow, payment of pension to such child or children shall cease.

SEC. 2. That all women employed by the Surgeon General of the Army as nurses, under contract or otherwise, during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion, or who were employed as nurses during such period by authority which is recognized by the War Department, and who rendered actual service as nurses in attendance upon the sick or wounded in any regimental, post, camp, or general hospital of the armies of the United States for a period of 90 days or more, and who were honorably relieved from such service, and who are now or who may hereafter be unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States and be entitled to receive a pension of $20 per month, and such pension shall commence from the date of filing of the application in the Pension Office after the passage of this act: Provided, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period: Provided further, That all dependent parents of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion, whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now entitled to pension under any existing law, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act, all persons whose names are on the pension roll and all persons hereafter granted a pension, who while in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty shall have lost both hands or both feet or been totally disabled therein, or who while in such service and in like manner sustained injuries that proved the direct cause of the subsequent total disability of both hands or both feet, shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

SEC. 4. That the pension or increase of pension herein provided for, as to all persons whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now in receipt of a pension under existing law, shall commence at the rates herein provided from the date of the approval of this act; and as to persons whose names are not now on the pension roll, or who are not now in receipt of pension under existing law, but who may be entitled to pension under the provisions of this act, such pensions shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 5. That in the adjudication of claims arising under section 1 of this act, and claims arising under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to pension soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition," approved June 5, 1920, all leaves of absence and furloughs under General Orders, No. 130, August 29, 1898, War Department, shall be included in determining the period of pensionable service: Provided, That as to any claimant who filed an application for pension under the act of July 16, 1918, or the act of June 5, 1920, and whose application is still pending in the Bureau of Pensions or has been rejected on the ground that 90 days' service was not shown exclusive of the leave of absence or furlough under the order herein referred to, the pension shall commence from the date when the original application was filed in the Bureau of Pensions, and as to claims under the act of July 16, 1918, the pension shall be at the rate provided in that act, with increase at the rate provided herein from the date of the approval of this act: Provided further, That persons who are now receiving pensions under existing laws, or whose claims are pending in the Bureau of Pensions, may, by application to the Commissioner of Pensions, in such form as he may prescribe, showing themselves entitled thereto, receive the benefits of this act; and nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent any pensioner thereunder from prosecuting his claim under any other general or special act: And provided further, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private: Provided, however, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period.

SEC. 6. That no claim agent or attorney or other person shall be recognized in the adjustment of claims under this act except in claims for original pension, and in such cases no more than the sum of $10 shall be allowed for services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any such claim, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension allowed or due to such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I want to inquire if we may not agree on the division and control of the time?

Mr. WALSH. The rule provides for an hour for and an hour against the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. As the gentleman from Massachusetts says, we have an hour on a side.

Mr. ROBSION. I ask unanimous consent that one hour be controlled by the gentleman from Mississippi and one hour by myself.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that can not be done in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The division of time is fixed by the rule. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, the uppermost thought in every veteran's mind is that his widow, dependent children, and dependent parents may not want for the necessaries of life when he can no longer provide for them, and therefore the primary purpose of this bill is to give some relief to the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of the soldiers and sailors of the Spanish-American and Philippine War and Chinese Boxer Rebellion. The act of October 6, 1917, gives to the widows of those veterans whose death was due to the service $25 per month. This bill does not repeal that provision.

INCREASE FROM $12 TO $20 AND FROM $2 TO $4.

Under the act of July 16, 1918, the widows of all volunteer soldiers in the service who served 90 days or more between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, and received an honorable discharge may be allowed $12 per month, with $2 per month for each child under 16 years of age and the dependent parents may receive $12 per month, but this pension is not allowed to widows and children if she has an income of more than $250 per annum.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. I would rather make my statement first.

This bill increases the widow and dependent parent's pension from $12 to $20 per month and minor children from $2 to $4 per month and removes the $250 income provision.

GIVES PENSIONABLE STATUS TO WIDOWS, CHILDREN, AND DEPENDENTS OF SOLDIERS IN REGULAR ESTABLISHMENT.

About the time the Spanish-American War was declared the Regular Army numbered less than 25,000 men. War was imminent and several hundred thousand men volunteered for service, but only about 250,000 were accepted. About 140,000 of these were put in what was known as the Regular Establishment and were called regulars. The others were known as volunteers. While practically every man in the Army was a volunteer, yet strange to say the act of July 16, 1918, cuts out all of the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of the so-called regulars, unless it can be shown the soldier served at least 90 days outside of the United States, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902. This bill removes that restriction and places the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of the so-called regulars on the same footing as the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of the volunteer soldiers and sailors and under this bill the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of the so-called regulars whose claims have been filed and rejected because of the 90-day actual service clause outside of the United States, may have their claims reconsidered, and if otherwise entitled to a pension may receive a pension at the rates provided in the act of July 16, 1918, from the date of the filing of the claim, and of course will receive the increase provided by this bill, from the date of its approval.

RESTRICTION AS TO FURLOUGH REMOVED.

In order to save expense and for the convenience of the Government, War Department General Order No. 130 furloughed many of the soldiers of these wars. These furloughs ranged from one to two months. The soldiers and sailors during the period of their furloughs were subject at any moment to be called back to their post. The Pension Department has ruled and this ruling has been affirmed by the Department of the Interior that the time of this enforced furlough can not be considered in the 90 days' service required under the act of June 5, 1920.

This bill removes that restriction and permits the time and furlough to be counted as part of the actual service of the soldier or sailor.

This ruling of the Pension Department affects regiments and parts of regiments as follows:

First Connecticut Infantry.
Louisiana Artillery, Batteries A, B, and C.
New York Artillery, Fourth and Fifth Batteries.
Pennsylvania Infantry, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Regiments.
Rhode Island Artillery, Batteries A and B.
Washington Independent Battalion of Infantry.
Wisconsin Artillery.
Iowa Artillery, Batteries 5 and 6.
First Maine Infantry.
About 200 men of Roosevelt's Rough Riders and perhaps parts of some other organizations.

This bill gives a pensionable status to nurses who served in the hospitals and in the camps under the direction of the War and Navy Departments 90 days or more and who may now be or who may hereafter become unable to earn a support and served the said 90 days or more between April 21, 1898, and February 2, 1901, and such nurses who were not included in the reorganization of February 2, 1901. The act of June 5, 1920, takes care of the nurses of said wars except those mentioned in this bill. I can not give the exact number, but there are not many of these. They nursed the soldiers in the camps of the United States and in the Philippines. Many of them contracted typhoid and yellow fever. Those who remained in the service or entered the service on or after February 2, 1901, are included in the act of June 5, 1920.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBSION. I hope the gentleman will wait until I complete my statement.

Mr. LAYTON. All right; if the gentleman wishes to continue, I will ask it later.

Mr. ROBSION. I will say to the members of the committee that after I conclude my statement I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman to answer any question on any matter in connection with this bill.

This measure also grants a pension of $100 per month for the soldiers or sailors who lost both arms or both legs or became blind in the service or because of total disability to legs or arms contracted in the service.

Up to December 31, 1921, 13,297 applications of widows had been filed under the act of July 16, 1918. Of these claims 5,827 have been allowed, 2,753 have been rejected, 668 have been abandoned, and 4,049 are still pending. It is estimated that not more than 2,000 more will make application within the first year after the approval of this act. Secretary Fall, of the Interior Department, estimates that in carrying out all of the provisions of this bill the increased cost for the first year would not exceed $2,500,000. We are inclined to think the increase would not be as great for any other year as the first year.

I wish to take this opportunity to thank Messrs. Smith and Mattocks for their helpful assistance in bringing reliable information to the committee and House, and to thank the United Spanish War Veterans' officers and organization and men for their kindly, gentlemanly attitude toward the committee and the Congress. Their request is modest and fair. No bluff or threats were employed. Their conduct in connection with this bill has created a splendid impression on the Members of the House.

At this point I wish to read a letter from the chairman of the legislative committee of the United Spanish War Veterans, as follows:

JANUARY 23, 1922.

Hon. JOHN M. ROBSION,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: As you are in charge of H. R. 4, I wish to say to you at the meeting of the national committee on legislation, held on January 22, 1922, at which the commander in chief and adjutant general of the organization were present, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas H. R. 4 has been reported favorably by the Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives and is now on the calendar;

"Whereas many Members of Congress have expressed their intention of voting for it: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee that the said bill be passed in its present form and that no substantial amendment to same be made by the House of Representatives."

The commander in chief and the members of the committee feel that you and the members of the Committee on Pensions of the House have reported favorably a bill in the interest of the widows and children of the veterans, which is the best that can be passed at this session, and we are therefore heartily in favor of the early passage of said bill, without amendment.

Thanking you and the other members of the committee for your assistance in this matter, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

JNO. LEWIS SMITH, Chairman.

I might say that that is not intended to convey the idea that the House shall not consider amendments, but it is to express the wish of the Spanish-American War officers that it is not their desire that the friends of the bill assume to amend the bill upward to increase or enlarge its provisions. The United Spanish War Veterans in convention at Minneapolis, Minn., unanimously indorsed this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. I will when I complete my statement. I want at this time to make some remarks as to the character of the men who participated in this war.

GREAT COURAGE AND SPLENDID ACHIEVEMENTS.

Some thoughtless persons have been inclined to belittle the character of the men engaged in these wars and their services to our country and the world. Some would tell us that this Army was made up of some young, reckless men, who entered this service without purpose, thoughtlessly and merely looking for adventure. Nothing is further from the truth. No braver or more loyal or patriotic men fought in any army in any war of this country, and in making this statement we take nothing from the glory of the American soldiers and sailors who fought in other wars. The Spanish-American and Philippine War soldiers were simply high-class Americans. Look at the long list of distinguished men who served with distinction in those wars—the incomparable Teddy Roosevelt, the dashing Joe Wheeler, the gallant Black Jack Pershing, Dewey, Sampson, 7 of the present Members of the United States Senate, 22 Members of the House of Representatives, Secretary of War Weeks, Secretary of the Interior Fall, Secretary of the Navy Denby, governors, and thousands of others who have distinguished themselves in public and private life. About 50,000 of the veterans of the Spanish-American War, although beyond the draft age, volunteered their services and served their country in the World War. Every man who was in the Spanish-American War, Philippine war, and Boxer rebellion was a volunteer. Thousands of others volunteered for those wars, but were unable to enter the service, because their country could not use them.

Among those Spanish-American War veterans who volunteered and served in the World War includes Capt. Oscar L. Carlston, the present commander in chief of the United Spanish-American War Veterans. He is a big, fine American; big mentally and physically. He was in command of an artillery company in France. Col. John J. Garrity, the present adjutant of the Spanish-American War Veterans, was likewise a colonel of a regiment during the World War. Capt. John Lewis Smith, the chairman of the legislative committee of the Spanish-American War Veterans, and the man who has done so much to promote legislation for the veterans of these wars and their dependents, was a captain in the World War. If time would permit we could name hosts of others.

We find our soldiers at Manila Bay, Santiago Bay, El Caney, San Juan Hill, and Las Guasimas, and on other battle fields and naval engagements, showing the same intrepid courage that our ancestors displayed at Bunker Hill, Kings Mountain, Fort Moultrie, Lake Erie, Mobile Bay, Gettysburg, and our boys showed on the fields of France. They located the enemy, sought him out, destroyed him, and brought quick and certain victory to the American arms. The individual heroic acts of Hobson, Bagby, Lawton, and others stand out in equally bold relief with the achievements of our soldiers on land and sea in other wars. The Spaniards had nearly 200,000 well-trained soldiers in Cuba. We sent less than 19,000 men. In a few days our soldiers had destroyed Spanish rule in the island, destroyed the fleets of the enemy, and captured many more prisoners than there were American soldiers. This is the more remarkable because our country had been at peace for 35 years and we had given little thought to the art of war in our pursuit of building up our country along lines of peace. The achievements of our soldiers and sailors during these wars prove that the American soldier and sailor may be relied upon always to do his full duty at any time, any place, or under any circumstances, and the boys of 1898, like the boys of 1776, 1861, and 1918, went forth and brought the American flag back in honor and in victory. A grateful Nation should not permit the widows, children, or dependent parents of these brave men to suffer the pangs of hunger or feel the pinch of poverty. This bill is designed as a recognition in a small way of the services they rendered to their country and to mankind.

SONS OF NORTH AND SOUTH UNITED.

The war of 1898 hastened the day for a complete reconciliation between the North and South. It not only healed whatever wounds remained from the terrible struggle of 1861–1865 but it removed the scars. We found the sons and grandsons of the Blue and the Gray and many of the Blue and the Gray themselves fighting side by side at San Juan Hill and other battles in Cuba and the Philippine Islands. Gen. Miles, who was a colonel in the War between the States, was the commander in chief. Gen. Joe Wheeler, the gallant ex-Confederate, inspired the boys both North and South in the struggle of 1898, and Gen. Clem, the drummer boy of Chickamauga, stands out as one of the participants of the Spanish-American War. Dewey, Sampson, and others wrote again their names high upon the scroll of fame and won the plaudits of a grateful Nation.

THE ROUGH RIDERS.

The Rough Riders need not fear unfavorable comparison with the record of any soldiers anywhere. They had for a leader a man but a few men in the world have equaled and none have surpassed. It was made up of virile Americans from every Territory and State in the Union, from every walk of life, each with a spirit that knew no conqueror. They, too, won undying fame at Las Guasimas and San Juan Hill and brought additional luster and glory to the Stars and Stripes. In this regiment, consisting of about 500 men, we find four sergeants—Tim Philpot, of my own district, whose ancestors fought in all of the wars of this country, who were among sharpshooters of Jackson's army at New Orleans; Sergt. W. L. Mattocks, associate editor of the National Tribune, who has worked in season and out for the benefit of his comrades and their dependents; his father was a veteran of the Civil War; Sergt. John McIlhenny, whose father lost his life fighting for the Confederacy; Sergt. T. D. Fennessy, an adopted son, whose father was a colonel of the Royal English Engineers—the sons of the North and the South, the adopted sons of our country, and the sons of slaves all fighting for our common country and for the relief of mankind.

LOSS HEAVY.

The casualties were very great during this war. Although the campaign in Cuba was a short one, 23 officers and 237 enlisted men were killed; 99 officers and 1,332 enlisted men wounded.

In 1898 the total number of deaths per 1,000 among the Volunteers was 28.18 and among the Regulars was 27.55. Twenty-five out of every 1,000 died of disease while in the camps of the United States, while during the World War for the same period of time there were only 8 deaths per 1,000 in the camps. About 10 men out of every 100 in Cuba in 1898 in the engagements there were either killed or wounded; 86 out of every 1,000 Volunteers and 98 of each 1,000 of Regulars were killed or died of disease. This is rather a large casualty as compared with other campaigns in other wars.

THE SONS AND GRANDSONS OF FREED SLAVES.

Not only the sons and grandsons of those who wore the blue and the gray but the sons and grandsons of those who were the objects of the struggle from 1861 to 1865 were found at the front in 1898. It was a colored regiment that marched in front up San Juan Hill on July 1, 2, and 3, 1898, the thirty-fifth anniversary of the memorable Battle of Gettysburg, the great turning point of the Civil War. They, too, fought shoulder to shoulder with their white comrades in helping to free the oppressed people of Cuba. I have talked with many of the members of the Rough Rider Troop and they all agree the colored boys on this occasion displayed the same courage and devotion to the flag as their white comrades. They had a part in that splendid achievement. Some of them gave their lives for their country and their flag. "Greater love hath no man shown for his country than this, he gave his own life for it."

RESULTS OF THE WAR.

We have noticed the character of men engaged in the war and their achievements on land and sea. It is the first time in the history of our country that our soldiers fought on foreign soil for the freedom of another people, a war of humanity. In this war we not only became united ourselves as we had not been for 35 years, we freed the people of Cuba and the Philippine Islands, established law and order and a new and brighter era for those people. We increased our faith in ourselves. It gave us the first real glimpse of the great man power and resources of this country. We became a world power overnight. The nations of the world for the first time recognized the United States as a great world power, so that looking at this war from every angle we can take pride both in our soldiers and sailors, in their achievements on land and sea and the results of their heroic sacrifices, both at home and abroad. They were worthy sons of worthy sires.

I would like to yield now to some of the gentlemen.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I notice that on page 3, section 2, that deals with women nurses, the basis for a pension is placed on different grounds from that of the soldier who served; that is, if I am reading the language and understand it properly:

And who are now or may hereafter be unable to earn a support.

Now, is that not a different basis from the pensions which are accorded generally in any war?

Mr. ROBSION. I think not. It really is based upon the question of physical disability.

Mr. LAYTON. Why not have used the same language as used in other laws?

Mr. ROBSION. It is practically the same language.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I interrupt the gentleman? The language in this bill is identical with the provision of the law pertaining to nurses of the Civil War.

Mr. RANKIN. But they place this on a different basis, their allowance on a different basis, from what they do the widow. The nurse must prove her disability while the widow may come in, regardless of her wealth and physical condition, without making any proof.

Mr. ROBSION. Well, the widow draws the pension because she is the widow of the one who served, as the nurse served, and whenever the soldier himself makes a claim for pension he is held to the same rule as that to which you hold the nurse.

Mr. RANKIN. But the gentleman will not contend that the widow under this bill has to prove that financial or physical disability, while the nurse does. That is the discrimination.

Mr. ROBSION. The reason for that is this——

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think this is correct: The widow who receives the pension must prove the disability of her dead husband.

Mr. RANKIN. She must just prove that he is dead.

Mr. LAYTON. I mean his honorable discharge from the service, and that is all.

Mr. ROBSION. He must have had 90 days' service, as the nurse must have had, and he must be dead before the widow or children get it. If he is alive, he must prove his disability, as the nurse must prove her disability.

Mr. LAYTON. What I am trying to get at is, in this bill, as the language appears to me, it seems there is no condition as to the service or disability. It does not say so. It simply says that if for any reason under the sun occurring during the service or after her service the nurse gets into such a condition that she can not earn her own support, she is entitled to a pension.

Mr. ROBSION. That refers, of course, to the physical condition. That is the language used in other acts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, so much confusion prevails in the Hall that I could not understand the gentleman's explanation of the changes this bill makes from existing law. Will the gentleman kindly, in a few words, explain the difference between the proposed law and that which now exists?

Mr. ROBSION. It increases the dependent parent's and widow's pension from $12 to $20, and that of minor children from $2 to $4.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does it make any change in the right of the widow to draw a pension?

Mr. ROBSION. The present law provides that if the widow gets $250 income she can not be allowed a pension. But the department has found that it costs more to administer the law with that provision in it than it would cost to pay the pension without that being considered, and that is stricken from the law, and this has caused no end of delay in adjusting the claims of thousands of poor widows and children.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, this makes it a straight so-called service pension?

Mr. ROBSION. No; no more than it was, but it cuts out the $250 income provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would any widow of a Spanish-American War soldier be able to draw a pension without reference to the question of whether or not she is in bad physical condition or needs it?

Mr. ROBSION. If she shows that her husband served 90 days or more and received an honorable discharge and is dead, she could. I was going to explain that this act of 1918 only permitted widows of volunteer soldiers to get this pension if she could show that the soldier served more than 90 days beyond seas in Cuba or in the Philippine Islands or China. It made a distinction between the so-called volunteer and the regular. Yet the truth is that we had only 24,000 men, or a little over, when the Spanish-American War came on. We increased the Regular Establishment out of volunteers to the number of about 165,000, and there were something like 110,000 who were not put into the regular organization but were called volunteers. This bill puts the children and widows and dependent parents of the so-called regular on the same footing with the widows, children, and parents of the volunteer soldiers.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Why the 90-day limit? Why should a man be required to serve 90 days in order to come within the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ROBSION. You have to have some time fixed, and the pension laws affecting the Civil War fixed 90 days, and I think practically every law fixes 90 days' service.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to section 6 in the bill, in which certain provisions are made in regard to attorney's fees. Some years ago it was called to my attention that some pension certificates were paid directly to the attorneys representing the pensioners, and in many cases they kept the entire amount. I was wondering whether or not section 6 would make it impossible for a pension certificate to be cashed by an attorney representing a pension claimant.

Mr. ROBSION. You mean the attorney indorsed the certificate and received money on it?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION. He could not under this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Otherwise I would like to suggest an amendment to the effect that all vouchers shall be made payable only to the pensioner, and that same shall not be honored unless they are indorsed by him personally.

Mr. ROBSION. Nobody except a committee of an incompetent pensioner can indorse the pensioner's check now. No attorney can do that now, and if he should attempt to do it he would violate the law, which provides a heavier penalty than those provided in this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. In case a pensioner has an attorney in fact, could it be done?

Mr. ROBSION. Not in any case.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is the gentleman familiar with the present law in regard to pensions to those who fought on the frontier up to 1876? The gentleman will remember that many fought after that time who were just as much entitled to pension as those who fought prior to that time. Would the gentleman object to an amendment extending the time to 1880?

Mr. ROBSION. I would not object to that if it would not endanger the passage of this bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not want to prejudice the gentleman's bill.

Mr. ROBSION. I am very much in sympathy with the gentleman's idea of taking care of the soldiers of whom he speaks. I am sure sufficient time will be allowed in the detailed consideration of the bill under the 5-minute debate to consider that question.

Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me before he takes his seat?

Mr. ROBSION. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I understand, the gentleman says that in the opinion of the committee the progressive cost under this bill would be less after the second year than in the first year?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is not in line with the statement of the Secretary of the Interior. I call the gentleman's attention to the figures given on page 3 of the report, where the Secretary says that in the years following the passage of the act of 1890 in regard to the Civil War the rate was enormously increased.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman will understand that under the provisions of the act of July 16, 1918, quite a number of widows and dependent parents and children have been rejected. This bill permits a reconsideration of those claims. The act of 1918 made a distinction that should not have been made, and it was not expected that it would be made, but when the Pension Department came to pass upon the question they excluded folks who we thought were included; and when you take into consideration those four or five or six thousand widows and dependent parents who will now come in, I think the increase for the first year, perhaps, will be as great or greater than in some subsequent years.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then, why does the Secretary of the Interior use the figures of the progressive increase in the Civil War pensions as a basis for the probable increase under this bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. He does not do that, does he?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION. The facts, conditions, and circumstances are entirely different here to what they were there.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman, then, makes a substantial distinction between this bill and the act of 1890?

Mr. ROBSION. I do. But the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fall, further says that he really does not undertake to forecast it, but he merely gives those figures and lets you draw your own conclusion.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky reserves the remainder of his time. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not support this bill in its present form, for reasons that I shall attempt to point out as I go along.

There is no man on the floor of this House or elsewhere who has more sympathy or a higher regard for the soldiers of the Spanish-American War than I have. That was possibly the most just war that America has fought since the days of the Revolution. It was fought strictly and purely for the benefit of humanity.

In the first place, this bill has one feature in it that I consider dangerous. If it is passed in its present form it will commit us to the policy that a pension is a matter of right. I do not subscribe to that doctrine. I do not believe that every man who ever wore the uniform, I do not believe that every woman who ever married a man who had worn the uniform, is entitled to a pension regardless of his or her physical or financial condition.

It may be that climatic and geographical conditions have something to do with my views on that subject, owing to the fact that I come from a State where men do not draw their pensions from the Federal Government. I come from a section where men must not only prove their inability to earn a livelihood, or were required to do so until recently, but even now they must prove that they are not financially able to comfortably take care of themselves. Not only that, but there is in this bill the most flagrant discrimination that I have ever read when it comes to the distinction made between the widow of a Spanish-American War soldier and the nurse who served in that war. The real difference between this bill and the law as it now stands, and the real bone of contention, is the policy to which this bill proposes to commit you. Do not be misled. Do not be deceived.

Under the law as it now stands if the widow of a Spanish-American War veteran is without means of support she is entitled to draw a pension. We have petitions before the Committee on Pensions, one of which I can recall to-day, that of a woman who admits that she is worth $72,000. If this bill passes every widow of a Spanish-American War veteran, regardless of what she is worth and regardless of her physical or financial ability, will be placed upon the pension roll.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman is emphasizing the proposition of the $250 income. The gentleman realizes that that is one of the very small features of the bill, does he not?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman did not even mention the $250 income. He mentioned this fundamental principle underlying this bill, that it commits this Congress to the proposition that a pension is a matter of right. This is a bill for the rich widows, if you really want to know what is behind this bill. This ought really to be denominated the rich widows' bill. That is what it means. As I said, we have one woman applicant who admits in her application that she is worth $72,000. If this bill becomes a law, of course she will be placed on the pension roll. And she will not be by herself. You men who have served on this committee know that there are a great number of them who will make this application. You will place them on the pension roll and pay them money that they do not need, while to-day there are thousands of Spanish-American War veterans who are walking the streets of various cities, out of work, and they are not granted a pension at all.

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. HERRICK. The gentleman speaks of one rich widow worth $72,000. I would like to ask the gentleman how he is going to get around that without rendering the bill unconstitutional? If you put in a proviso cutting out widows worth $72,000, you make it class legislation. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. RANKIN. We "done abolished the Constitution" last week when we passed the antilynching bill. Another thing this bill does is to raise the amount from $12 to $20. I do not know that I have any serious objection to that. Frankly, I was not in favor of any change at all in the law, but a mere change from $12 to $20 would not be a change in the policy of this Government. It would not commit us to the policy that pensions are a matter of right. Suppose you place every widow on the pension roll regardless of what she is worth; what are you going to do about the soldier? Are you going to discriminate against the man who did the fighting and in favor of the rich widow who does not need this money? Are you going to try to stand up under a proposition like that? Most assuredly not. Then, if you carry it to its logical conclusion you will say that if a pension is a matter of right for a widow it is a matter of right for a soldier. The next thing, you will be committed to the policy that a pension is a matter of right regardless of financial or physical disability; and when you do that it will be only a very short time until there will be more than 5,000,000 names on the pension rolls of the United States.

Now, there are some people back at home who want to know where the money is coming from. They want to know who is going to pay the bills. I am not willing as a member of the committee to subscribe to this bill; I do not want Congress to adopt that policy without a protest.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I was under the impression that the law applicable to the World War veterans does not contemplate a pension in the future, but that that has been taken care of by insurance.

Mr. RANKIN. That is the intention of the law, but as time goes on we do not know what changes will be made in the law of the land. I happen to be one of the beneficiaries under one of these policies, as I served a short time in the Army. I realize that every man who keeps up his policy will be fairly well taken care of; but what are you going to do with the fellows who drop their policies? In 10 or 15 years from now you will have Congress filled up with a new set of men, and if these men come and demand a pension and say that they were not able to keep up their insurance, what will Congress do? Why, it will fall for it just as you are going to fall for this bill.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION. Then the gentleman would object to the present law which grants a pension to the Civil War widow even more than this without any property or income——

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is too well acquainted with me, he and I having been on the committee for some time——

Mr. ROBSION. It is the same thing in principle.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, no; he knows that the Civil War widows are not young and active. He knows that he never heard me before that committee object to pensioning people in any war who were more than 70 years old, widows of soldiers who have reached the age of 70 years or more.

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman will admit that a Civil War widow under 70, but can you pass any pension law that does not have exceptions to it that perhaps none of us would want to agree to?

Mr. RANKIN. I think that question answers itself. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to go one step further and show you the main discrimination in this bill. I do not care how much virtue the bill carries, I never could vote for it with this provision in it, and unless it is removed I do not see how any man can justify himself in supporting it.

SEC. 2. That all women employed by the Surgeon General of the Army as nurses, under contract or otherwise, during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion, or who were employed as nurses during such period by authority which is recognized by the War Department, and who rendered actual service as nurses in attendance upon the sick or wounded in any regimental, post, camp, or general hospital of the armies of the United States for a period of 90 days or more, and who were honorably relieved from such service, and who are now or who may hereafter be unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of pensioners, etc.

Here is what you do, and it is the most flagrant discrimination against nurses in the Army that I have ever read. You say to the widow of a Spanish War veteran, "We know you did not suffer the deprivation; you were possibly born after the Spanish War closed; you admit by your statement here that you are worth $75,000 or $100,000, but we do not care anything about that; we will place your name on the pension roll and you will be granted a pension." Then you say to the nurse who went to the war at a time when the strongest quailed before the dangers that lurk in the tropical zone, and this Red Cross nurse, or a nurse of any kind, left her home and braved all the dangers of war, went into the camps where there was typhoid fever, yellow fever, and various other diseases which wiped people off the face of the earth by the thousands, who went there for 90 days or more, and yet you make her prove that she is not able to take care of herself before you grant the same pension that you grant to a widow who has $100,000. How are you going to explain that when you get back home. Men wrote this bill, but I tell you the women are going to read it, and I don't blame them. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is the first time in the history of this country when persons having a civilian status, such as the contract nurses during the Spanish War, are held to be entitled to receive a pension as much as though they had a military status. It is a departure from our precedents and from our traditions under which it has been held that a military status is essential to entitle the person to a pension. It is a proposal to grant a gratuity which any other civilian employee of the Government would be as much entitled to as a nurse.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Was there ever a war in which this country engaged when we had any nurses that had a military status until the present war?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Never before the World War. Let me say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] that this bill opens wide the door to pensioning any nurse that may have served in any private or public hospital in which soldiers of the Spanish War may have been treated.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, no; that is not correct, if the gentleman will permit. If the gentleman will read on page 3, line 14, he will find that the language is—

That all women employed by the Surgeon General of the Army as nurses.

It does not speak of private hospitals, but of nurses who were employed by the Surgeon General of the Army.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The bill provides—line 17, page 3—

Or who were employed as nurses during such period by authority which is recognized by the War Department.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Employed "by authority which is recognized by the War Department," to wit, by a contractor conducting a private hospital; to wit, by anyone who undertook to take care of a soldier—not merely the Surgeon General, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] would have us believe.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Are the Civil War nurses pensioned by any act of Congress?

Mr. RANKIN. I am not advised on that question. I will be frank with the gentleman and say that I do not think that the practice of women going into soldiers' camps began until after the Civil War, though I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the author of the bill know whether Civil War nurses were ever pensioned by any act of Congress?

Mr. KNUTSON. I would refer that question to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. FULLER. Civil War nurses who were regularly employed in the service are pensioned.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They were civilian nurses under contract, were they not?

Mr. FULLER. I do not think so.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They did not have a military status?

Mr. FULLER. Oh, no. Yes; they must have been under contract.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is what I am trying to get at. Always heretofore, including the Civil War, nurses who have been pensioned have been civilian nurses up to this time.

Mr. KNUTSON. They were civilian nurses until the reorganization of the Army under the act of February 2, 1901.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say in reply to all of this that I do not care whether they were civilian nurses or not. I do not think any soldier cares when he gets sick or is shot down whether the woman who comes to wait upon him wears a uniform or not, and so far as I am individually concerned I do not care what their status might have been. I am in favor of treating these nurses at least as well as we do the widows of Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is a question of principle involved in this, as to whether we are going to pension civilian employees of the Government or other civilian persons who may incidentally render some service in connection with the armed forces of the country. In principle the pensioning of these nurses will authorize the pensioning of every sutler ever employed by the Government to follow the track of the Army.

Mr. RANKIN. I think not. I think the way this bill is worded that that proposition is fairly well guarded against. I think if this bill passes it will mean those nurses who rendered these services, one might say at the request of the Government, and they have what you might call a quasi-military status and will be taken care of, at least to some extent.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. My recollection of 1898 does not seem to bring to mind any considerable body of nurses who were with the Army. I remember very distinctly that we were so short in hospital preparation and Medical Corps organization that every captain made a detail of men from his own company to do the nursing in the division hospital. If there were other nurses, there were few of them, and they did not show up in the field. They may have been around some concentration camp, but they did not partake of the character of the service of soldiers in the field at any time in any experience that I had with them.

Mr. RANKIN. If they did not, they are not included in this bill.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION. Perhaps this point should not be overlooked, that most of these women who served were nurses who continued in the service after February 2, 1901, and then they were taken into the Regular Establishment. The act of June 5, 1920, provides a pension for them. These are the nurses who did not finally go into the Regular Army under the act of February 2, 1901. There is a small number of them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman mean to say that the nurses contemplated in the provision of this bill are identical in person with the nurses who subsequently became members of the Regular Army?

Mr. ROBSION. Part of them; most of them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What status did they have before? They were hired only incidentally. There was no continuing, permanent bureau or organization or corps of nurses.

Mr. ROBSION. They were recognized by the War Department and the Navy Department.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield any further. Under the present law, if a man is disabled because of his own vicious habits, he can not draw a pension, but as soon as he dies his widow can, if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am sure my colleague does not wish to take the position before the House that he is in favor of penalizing the widow for the indiscretions of her husband.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not think he deserves any pay, either for himself or for his family, where his disabilities are the result of his own vicious habits.

If this bill passes and is logically followed up, it is only a matter of time until we will have 5,000,000 people on the pension roll of the United States Government. It is already getting top-heavy. I am opposed to it because I do not think people are entitled to a pension as a matter of right. If a man is disabled, if he dies and his widow is not able to take care of herself, if she is without means, without ability to earn a livelihood and take care of her children, then I am as much in favor of pensioning her as any man on the floor of the House, but I am not in favor of starting out on a policy of granting pensions as a matter of right, regardless of the applicant's financial condition, and committing the United States to that policy.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. Do I understand that the law now is that a soldier of the Spanish-American War does not have to prove disability incurred while in the service?

Mr. RANKIN. Here is the law.

That all persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, and who have been honorably discharged therefrom, and who are now or who may hereafter be suffering from any mental or physical disability or disabilities of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which so incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor as to render them unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the facts, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension not exceeding $30 per month, and not less than $12 per month.

And so forth. Those are men who are pensioned.

Mr. LAYTON. No valid objection could lie to the last part of section 2, as far as Army nurses are concerned, in my judgment, because that is what I was assuming, that the disability had to be proved in the case of a soldier, and it was remitted in the case of a nurse, and that exception shows that in section 2——

Mr. RANKIN. No; that is the old law, but here is the discrimination in this bill: These widows do not have to prove financial or physical disability in order to draw their pension, and these nurses do.

Mr. LAYTON. And the rich nurse does not have to do so?

Mr. RANKIN. She would not get a pension, she is excepted.

Mr. WALSH. Assuming a nurse drawing a pension dies, leaving a husband. Is he entitled to come in and receive a pension?

Mr. RANKIN. I think not.

Mr. WALSH. Well, that is too bad. All the rest seem to do so.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. RANKIN. I will.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman give some idea of just what is contemplated under section 3 of the bill in reference to a man who has lost two hands or two feet? What is the practice——

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know the practice, but if the gentleman will read the present law he will find that it makes a very small change. I think men covered by that provision now draw $90 a month.

Mr. CLOUSE. Where a man has lost one hand and one eye. Can the gentleman distinguish between the man who lost one hand and one foot and a man who lost both feet? Why discriminate in favor of one more than the other?

Mr. RANKIN. It does not discriminate.

Mr. CLOUSE. I just wanted to know the purpose and object of this section.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In looking over the bill I notice that a widow is not required to prove physical disability. In the general law the soldier is required to prove disability. Will the gentleman explain why he is more liberal to the widow than the soldier?

Mr. RANKIN. I am not more liberal to the widow than to the soldier, nor am I more liberal to the widow than to the nurse. The gentleman can propound that question to the gentleman from Kentucky who is in charge of and in favor of this bill.

Mr. HAMMER. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Tennessee there are 16 on the pension roll.

Mr. RANKIN. I can not support this bill. I think there are two fundamental propositions underlying this bill that we can not afford to indorse. One is that the widow is entitled to a pension as a matter of right. That was the argument that was made before the committee by the men who were supporting this bill before the committee, not by members of the committee, but by some one representing some soldiers' organizations; that they were entitled to it, not because of their physical or financial incapacity, but entitled to it as a matter of right. If the widow is entitled to it as a matter of right, why not the soldier? And if the soldier is entitled to it as a matter of right you place all the soldiers in the United States who served 90 days on the pension list. I am opposed to it, because it most flagrantly discriminates against those nurses who actually saw service and in favor of the rich widows who are able to take care of themselves. [Applause.] I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no pride of authorship in this measure. It was prepared by the late Wayne W. Cordell, former examiner for the Pension Committee of the House, and Mr. Fleming, the present examiner of the committee. As you gentlemen know, Mr. Cordell passed away in December.

I am as satisfied that his death was due to overwork as I can be of anything. He literally gave his life in the service of this House, and I am glad to testify at this time to his industry and integrity. It is the first opportunity I have had to do so.

I can not subscribe to the position taken by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], who is a member of this committee. It would be inconceivable that such a great and glorious country as this should compel anyone seeking a pension to claim poverty before they can be placed upon the pension rolls, and yet that is what the proposition advanced by the gentleman from Mississippi amounts to in a nutshell. I believe if a person has rendered service to that flag, whose broad stripes have been baptized in the best blood of American manhood, it should not be necessary for him to plead poverty before being placed upon the pension rolls of this country, and it should not be necessary for his widow to do so.

Mr. WYANT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will.

Mr. WYANT. Do you think the taxpayers of this country would be in favor of paying the widow of a soldier worth $75,000 a pension of $20 a month when we have thousands of people who are walking the streets with nothing to do?

Mr. KNUTSON. We have heard much of pension applicants who have property valued at thousands of dollars. I have been a member of the Pension Committee almost five years, and I know of only one instance of that character.

Mr. WYANT. Does the gentleman believe in pensioning a widow worth $72,000?

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not believe in drawing any distinction. I will tell the gentleman why. When you do, it will be necessary for those who want to get on the rolls to plead poverty and go before the country and say they have nothing, and I am opposed to that. I want to say to the gentlemen of the House that this bill has the approval of the Spanish War Veterans and Pension Bureau. It is based upon the experience of long years, and it has the unqualified indorsement of every member of the committee save the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. The gentleman from Mississippi did not advance in the committee the reasons that he has advanced on the floor this afternoon.

Mr. NORTON. Is it not a fact that those who deserve it most would be ashamed to ask for it if it was not given at all?

Mr. KNUTSON. Absolutely. I know of nothing that has greater pride than poverty. It is something that we try to hide, because it is a reflection on our success in life.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman tell me what change the proposed bill makes in the present law?

Mr. KNUTSON. I will say to the gentleman that this is altogether a new law that affects Spanish War widows.

Mr. LONDON. In what other respect is the law proposed to be changed by this bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. Remove property restrictions for one thing. I would say to the House that I believe that the widow who does not need it or who has a large income will not ask for it, and I do not believe more than 1 per cent of that class will ask for a pension.

I will answer one question raised by asking another. Do you men believe a widow should be compelled to go before the Pension Bureau and plead poverty in order to be placed on the pension roll?

Now she must go before the Pension Bureau and confess her inability to support herself. If that is not a confession of poverty, I do not know the meaning of the word. I for one do not want to place the brand of failure on anyone who served this country or on their dependents. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I have only asked for these three minutes in order to get into the RECORD some statements of fact which the proponents of this bill all seem desirous I have placed therein. It is as follows:

WHY ARMY NURSES OF THE SPANISH WAR SHOULD BE PENSIONED.

Army nurses of the Civil War were long ago granted pensions.

Army nurses of the recent war have the same rights and benefits as have the soldiers of that war—war risk, etc.

Army nurses who served in the latter part of the China campaign or of the Philippine insurrection have the same pensions as soldiers under the act of June 5, 1920, which granted disability pensions to veterans of the Spanish War period.

But Army nurses who served in the War with Spain and up to February 2, 1901, have as yet no pensionable status except by special act. The Knutson bill, H. R. 4, proposes to remedy this injustice.

The Nurse Corps of the Army is one continuous body from its origin in 1898 to the present time. No women nurses had served in the Army between the Civil and Spanish Wars, so those appointed by the Surgeon General when the Spanish War began were under contracts, which admitted of promptness and flexibility in appointment and discharge.

So eminently useful and valuable was the work of these nurses, who numbered in all nearly 1,700, and so well was the organization of the Nurse Corps working, that it was specifically described as a permanent part of the Medical Department of the Army in the reorganization act approved February 2, 1901. It is because this act gave to the nurses a definite military status that they now have pensions for service after that date, but not before it.

Yet the work and position of the nurses was not one iota more military after that act than it was before. Nor did it make any change in their duties or responsibilities. Practically what it did was to give them appointment and discharge papers instead of contracts, and only that. The contract nurses took oath of allegiance, were under military discipline, wore uniforms with the emblem of the Medical Department, received the same rations and quarters as the enlisted men, and otherwise worked under the same conditions as enlisted Hospital Corps men or the Army surgeons who were their coworkers in saving lives.

These women worked not only in general and post hospitals but also in camps and in the field, on hospital ships and transports. They were sent to all the regions where soldiers were, from Cuba and Porto Rico to China and many parts of the Philippines. They used their strength and skill to the limit, and they made many sacrifices. They left homes and good incomes as trained nurses to receive the Army pay of $30 a month, and when they contracted typhoid—as did probably 150 of them—they usually had to be sent away from the camps in order to be cared for at some home hospital, and that at their own expense. Death claimed them just as it did the soldiers. Twelve nurses died of typhoid, one died of yellow fever in Cuba, and one died of blood poisoning contracted in Cuba.

The real enemy in the Spanish War proved to be disease, and in fighting this enemy the nurses were in the front ranks. Their work saved many lives, worth many times more than they will ever receive from the Government. It is also doubtless true that they actually saved the country more expense for veteran and widow pensions alone than the pensions asked for them will ever cost.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I will vote to strike out section 2 of this bill if anyone will make a motion to do so. With the exception of section 2, I think it is a good bill and that we ought to adopt it.

As I understand section 1, which is the principal section of the bill, it has no other purpose than, first, to increase from $12 to $20 the monthly pension of a widow and, second, relieve her of the necessity of showing that her total annual income is less than $250.

Now, let me make this general observation for the consideration of those who have served in various wars. It is a strange situation where those who served in the Spanish War are receiving at the hands of Congress less in the way of consideration and of benefits than those who served in the Civil War or those who served in the World War. That strange situation can be attributed only to a single fact, and that is that we who served in the Spanish-American War are fewer in numbers and of smaller political influence than those who served in other wars.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Does not the gentleman think that is the reason why the nurses are faring so badly in this bill, that there are only a very few of them, and, consequently, they amount to very little politically?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No. They seem to be faring pretty well, inasmuch as a radical departure from all our past policy is proposed for their benefit. But whether they be few or numerous I do not think we ought to ravish any of our traditional principles in passing a bill for their benefit.

Now, if there is anything that ought to be really hated by fair-minded men it is discrimination. We find this discrimination prevailing among the widows of the men who served their country in these three different wars.

The widow of the soldier of the Civil War does not have to plead poverty in order to get a pension and the widow of the World War does not have to do so. We call the pension that is given to the World War widow "compensation." "By any other name it would smell as sweet." In fact, it is a pension or gratuity, and I do not care what you call it. No widow of the World War has to plead poverty in order to get the $25 per month to which she is entitled. Why, I ask, in the name of common sense should the widow of the man who went to fight in the Spanish War be required to stand on a lower level than the widows of other wars?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman says he is opposed to this because it is a dangerous departure from our traditional policy.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is section 2.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes, I understand; but if it is a dangerous departure from previous policy it is a dangerous departure, no matter what section it is. When you abandon the beaten path in relation to rich widows you are violating precedents.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; there is no change of policy. We are granting pensions to Civil War widows and to World War widows without requiring a plea of poverty. We are following that policy now, and why should there be discrimination against these Spanish War widows? The distinction between this bill and the existing law is that we increase the pension of Spanish-American widows to $20, yet we pay to the widow of a World War soldier $25 and to the widow of a Civil War soldier $30. How can we look the Spanish War veterans in the face and explain why the widows of soldiers of that war are entitled to a smaller pension than the widows of other wars? There can be only one answer why we are about to do this, and that is the answer that I gave at the beginning, that there are more of the other widows, their friends are more numerous, and they are able to write more letters to Congressmen. It is not because they are more worthy that they are able to get more money. But it is a hateful species of discrimination and violative of all justice and good faith. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, in order that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] may realize that there is not such discrimination as he thinks, I want to say that by the act of June 27, 1890, Civil War widows were allowed $8 per month and $2 for minor children, and they had to show that they had no income except that derived from their daily labor. Under the act of May 9, 1900, the same rates were allowed, but the widow was allowed an income of $200 in addition to her earnings. In the act of April 19, 1908, the pension was raised to $12 for widows, and property limitations were removed. By the act of September 8, 1916, the rate was raised to $20 per month, provided the widow was the wife of the soldier during the time of his service or had reached the age of 70 years and had been married to the soldier prior to June 27, 1905. Under the act of October 6, 1917, known as the war risk insurance act, the rates were raised to $25 for all widows then on the rolls, and under the act of May 1, 1920, the rate was raised to $30, with the same limitations. There is no discrimination made against the Spanish-American War widows.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Then why does not the gentleman's committee propose to raise these Spanish-American War widows to an equality?

Mr. ROBSION. It was thought that in the course of time they will be given the $30.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; but the $30 is needed now to provide food and shelter, because the cost of living is high, and the prevailing prices are just as applicable to Spanish-American War widows as to any other widows.

Mr. ROBSION. I sympathize with the gentleman's thought, but there are two parties who must be taken into consideration in all this legislation: First, the people who are the beneficiaries of the legislation; and, second, the people who pay the bill. Those are the two considerations, and this is the bill that is indorsed by their comrades and the husbands and brothers themselves who served in the Spanish-American War. They ask us to pass this bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman think there is a Spanish-American War widow in this country who would refuse the larger pension if the committee were generous enough to grant it? This is the discrimination which the gentleman's committee has given them.

Mr. ROBSION. The committee and Spanish War organization feel that they can get this bill through, and that if you tried the higher rate we might not get it through.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; you have given them half a loaf.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, how much more time has the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. ROBSION. How much more time has the gentleman from Mississippi?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-one minutes remaining.

Mr. RANKIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall support this bill and am in favor of the proposed legislation. I believe there ought to be an amendment made to it. Those who have served between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, as nurses are not young women at the present time. On page 3, lines 23 and 24, the following words should be stricken out, "and who are now or who may hereafter be unable to earn a support."

There can be no possible reason why you should allow a pension to the widow of a soldier who married after the war, and particularly before the passage of this act, and provide that a nurse who was in the service and who actually served and received an honorable separation from the service should not be given the same pension now as the widow, irrespective of her financial condition. I trust the committee having charge of the bill will offer the amendment to place all of these nurses on the same footing. According to the report, there are but 18 nurses now on the roll, but there may be and undoubtedly are a number of others who might find it quite hard to furnish the proof of disability required by this bill. They ought not to be required to prove it any more than the widow is required to prove it. During the late World War the service of the nurses was demonstrated to be as valuable and as necessary as that of the soldiers. In that war we not only recognized them, but we now give them rank so that they would have an official status. (See act of June 4, 1920, sec. 10.) This bill clearly recognizes the principle that they were a part of the Army, recognizes that they were legally in the service and participating with the Army during all its operations; yet when you offer them a pension you now require that they shall file an affidavit and that the evidence must be produced that they are practically paupers before you give them the recognition that you give to the others under the bill.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. ROBSION. The idea intended to be expressed by the bill is that it is physical disability?

Mr. RAKER. That is not what this says—

and who are now or may hereafter be unable to earn a support.

Mr. ROBSION. Unable to earn a support?

Mr. RAKER. Surely.

Mr. ROBSION. That must be because of physical inability.

Mr. RAKER. Therefore if they are able to earn a support, if they have a little meager home or a little amount to keep them alive and do not have to go on the charity of their friends, they will not get a pension. They must make an affidavit that they are in this deplorable condition before they can get a pension. After we have recognized the principle first that they are a part of the Army, that they are absolutely necessary, I do not think we should subject them to this condition. During the last war as well as during the Civil War and the Spanish-American War these noble women were always at the front, and then again in the hospitals resuscitating these men so that they might again serve and add that much to the Army. I trust the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] will offer an amendment to strike these words out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBSION. I yield to the gentleman another minute in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for one more minute.

Mr. ROBSION. Would the gentleman make it more easy for a nurse who was in the camp to secure a pension than for the man who went to the front? Under your law and under the other provisions of the bill the soldier must show his physical disability before he can draw a pension.

Mr. RAKER. The widows provided for in this bill are not required to show poverty before they can obtain this pension. Is not that true?

Mr. ROBSION. We are talking about the soldier.

Mr. RAKER. Is not that true of the widow?

Mr. ROBSION. The gentleman is putting it on the status of the soldier.

Mr. RAKER. I know, but here is a widow who has married this soldier since the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. ROBSION. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this bill, in my judgment, is a tardy partial recognition of a debt that we have owed for a good while. Whatever others may think about it, I think that from an American standpoint the Spanish-American War was, since the Civil War, the greatest struggle in which this country had been engaged, because it offered an opportunity for men who were descendants of the men who wore the gray and those who were the descendants of the men who wore the blue to unite in a common bond of blood brotherhood and to obliterate some of the scars that were left from the Civil War. It did us more good as a nation, I believe, than any struggle in which we had engaged since those days; and although it was a small war in the number of deaths and in the scope of its operations, it was great in its effect upon the American people, and it made it possible in these later days for us to breed a kind of young men who went out and made the best Army and the best soldiers in the history of the world. I have thought for some time that what is done in this bill ought to have been done sooner, and I think that the Spanish-American War veterans are to be commended for the reasonableness and modesty of their request. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has spoken here with all his usual vigor and has made the claim that we are not doing enough; that we are discriminating against the widows of the Spanish War veterans. He must bear in mind that the request for this legislation comes in large part from the Spanish War Veterans' Association, and if in their request upon Congress they have been moderate in their demands, it is something for which they ought to be commended; they should have the thanks of the American people for their patriotism and the reasonableness of their requests. It so happens that the national commander of the Spanish War Veterans lives in the same little town in which I live out in Illinois. During last week he was down here, and I talked with him a great deal and went with him to some of his gatherings. I know what he thinks about this. I know what the executive committee of the association think about it. They do not expect the Congress to give their widows the same pensions that the Civil War widows get. They are not asking for that. He has said to me, and I think those veterans of the Spanish War who are here will agree with him, that the time may come when they may need the same pensions as are now given to the Civil War widows, but at the present time they ask of the Congress only what they have asked in this bill. It is all they want. It is not, perhaps, all that any individual might need, but it is all that the Spanish War veterans in their wisdom think ought to be allowed at this time. What shall be done in the future will be a matter for the discretion of Congress in years to come, when these women have grown older with the weight of passing years.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. On that point may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Is it not true that some of the widows of Civil War veterans are younger than some of the Spanish-American War widows?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That may be true in some cases. Incidentally, I take the view that those who have in later years married veterans of the Civil War and are taking care of them in their declining years ought to have the bar removed which prohibits them from getting pensions, because I believe they are performing the same patriotic service that those women did who in earlier life were sharing the burdens of these same Civil War veterans. But that is beside the question. Now, as regards this nurse provision, this section of the act, if you will look at the existing statute, is in exactly the identical words of the statute formerly passed, which includes the Civil War veterans, except 90 days' service is substituted for six months' service. I hold in my hand the act of August 5, 1892. It reads:

That all women employed by the Surgeon General of the Army as nurses, under contract or otherwise, during the late War of the Rebellion, or who were employed as nurses during such period by authority which is recognized by the War Department, and who rendered actual service as nurses in attendance upon the sick or wounded in any regimental, post, camp, or general hospital of the armies of the United States for a period of six months or more, and who were honorably relieved from such service, and who are now or may hereafter be unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States and be entitled to receive a pension of $12 per month, and such pension shall commence from the date of filing of the application in the Pension Office after the passage of this act: Provided, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period.

That corresponds with the bill before us. I think, and I have suggested to the author of the bill, that there should be inserted in the second section the words "on account of physical disability," which will make it beyond question that we mean inability to earn a livelihood on account of physical disability. I think it is the idea of the committee to insert those words, and, although they are not in the existing law, I think it would be better to incorporate them in this. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN].

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to emphasize the thought that I indorse this bill because it has the indorsement and approval of the organization of the survivors of the Spanish-American War. Not being a veteran of that war, I assume that they who officially are speaking for such veterans and have canvassed the situation know what they can reasonably expect and what they are entitled to, morally. I can say that we found their requests reasonable, and I believe that every request and suggestion made finds expression in this bill. For that reason I approve the bill because it is reasonable in its provisions and because it meets the suggestions of those who are direct beneficiaries of it. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HAMMER].

Mr. HAMMER. Mr. Chairman, the Pension Committee after careful consideration extending over a period of several weeks, and after hearings, came to the conclusion that this was the best bill that could be reported out under the circumstances considering the financial condition of the Treasury. The only objection urged against the bill that I have heard was the fact that it is a service pension bill. The southern soldiers went home from Appomattox, cleared the fields, went to work and restored prosperity in the South, and that without any pensions of the State or the Federal Government. But to the glory of our civilization in the South we have cared for those soldiers in later years. Practically every State has given a million dollars or more to those old soldiers as service pensions. The State in which I live is giving each year more than a million dollars to the widows and soldiers of the Confederacy. I favor this bill, and I could not afford to do otherwise. To discriminate against that class of soldiers, the only soldiers who, in any of our wars in which the Army was composed entirely of volunteers, I think would be a fatal mistake. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, this bill appears to me to be a remarkably well prepared pension bill and a just one. In our history we have after all of our wars granted pensions. We did so after the Revolutionary War, we did so after the Mexican War, we did so after the Civil War, and all our wars. We have pensioned our soldiers and the widows as well. It has been the practice of our country from the beginning, based upon wise considerations.

When war comes our country is asking for soldiers, and the young man who thinks of going into the field takes into account what is going to happen in the future. If he be a man of family he thinks of what may happen. Relying upon the unbroken precedents and principles which have governed our legislation in the past, he thinks that if he goes and does not come back that his wife and his children are going to receive the sympathetic care of his country.

I was very much struck by the remarks of the gentleman who preceded me about the peculiar situation in regard to the soldiers of the South after the Civil War, and I am glad to know that the Southern States have pensioned those old veterans of the Confederacy. [Applause.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSBORNE. I will be glad to.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman from California is the only surviving Union soldier of the Civil War in the House. On this side the only surviving soldier of the South is Maj. STEDMAN—two as fine spirits as God ever gave the country or the world. [Applause.] I beg to say in this connection that there has been pending in this House for some time a bill, of which I am the author, to turn over the cotton tax, amounting to $68,000,000, illegally collected from southern cotton growers during and following the War between the States. Now, does not the gentleman think that this amount should be given over to the old Confederate soldiers, God bless them? [Applause.]

Mr. OSBORNE. I think nothing can be too good for the old Confederate soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSBORNE. Certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to correct one error of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN], and that is I think he overlooks one other soldier of the Civil War on that side of the House, Mr. FULLER, of Illinois. He was a Union soldier, was he not?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSBORNE. I will.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I think there ought to be a slight addition to the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas to the effect that this proposition which is now pending in the form of a resolution that has been offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SCOTT], proposes to refund to all taxpayers who paid that unconstitutional tax irrespective of where they are located. I understand there was $40,000,000 collected in New York and $30,000,000 collected in Pennsylvania. It was an unconstitutional tax, and so held to be later by the Supreme Court, because it was a direct tax on the commodities like cotton, and the proposition is to refund that tax to those who can show that they were directly interested in it.

Mr. OSBORNE. Of course, there are matters of consistency in legislation which would and always have stood in the way of any more direct recognition of Confederate soldiers. But for that consistency in national legislation, so far as I am personally concerned, I would be glad to see things very different from what they have been.

In respect to this particular bill, referring to the woman who has $72,000 and to her receiving a pension, of course, there are very few in those happy circumstances. In fact, most of the widows of soldiers are poor. As shown by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION], the widows' pensions were controlled until the last few years by the fact whether they had an income of $250 a year. That stood in the way. Any woman who had an income of $250 a year was not able to get a pension until quite recent years. In my own experience I have had cases rejected on that account.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. OSBORNE. Anyone knows that $250 a year is a very small amount for a widow to get along with, and realizing that fact Congress finally took off that restriction. That restriction is not employed in this bill as to widows. The language in section 2, which has been objected to—and who are now or may hereafter be unable to earn a support—

is in the present law with regard to Army nurses of the Civil War. It is a qualification. They have to have some sort of disability, and, as I understand it, that is the language to cover that disability. I think more direct language would be better, but that is the language of the present law.

I am extremely glad this measure of justice is about to be passed. Our comrades of the Spanish War did not have the glory that went to the veterans of some other wars, but they deserve just the same consideration from their country that they would have received if they had been called into more severe service than they were. As it was, it was distressing enough. This recognition of the widows of the Spanish War is well deserved, and I am glad to feel sure that shortly it is going to receive the approval of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that the House of Representatives is not any too soon in the consideration of this measure. The Spanish-American War veterans have never clamored as an organization for pensions, and the pension for the disabled ones is limited to the sum of $12 a month. Congress passed a bill in 1920 increasing that to $25 a month. This measure gives to the widow of the Spanish-American War veteran $20 per month in lieu of the $12 which she now receives. Considering what Congress has done for veterans of other wars, this is little enough. I know a poor woman whose husband volunteered in that war who to-day is penniless, in feeble condition, with one little child. She is drawing $12 per month for herself and $4 a month for the child. Under this bill she will get $20 and the child $4 a month. Her mind is gone. We have passed through this House a special bill increasing that pension to the maximum of $20 a month and it is hung up in the Senate now. I know of a man, and a strong man he was, who was in that war and who to-day has lost his health and is now unable to make a living. I have been for months trying to get his pension increased from $12 to $20, but up to this good hour the Pension Department after many examinations has failed to do anything for that veteran of the Spanish-American War. Is it right for the American Congress not to consider the soldier who volunteered when war was declared between this country and Spain? We all remember the cry that went up from one end of the land to the other—"Remember the Maine"—when our battleship was sunk in Cuban waters and all of the sailors on her sent to the bottom. These men who went out at that time to answer the country's call are entitled to the same consideration as those who fought on the Union side in the war of 1861–1865, and the same consideration as our brave men are who fought in this great World War against the enemies across the seas. Yet this bill is restricted to the sum of $20 for a poor, penniless woman and $4 for the child.

Surely no man on this floor can oppose a measure of this kind. If the Government had not handed out all of these pensions from year to year that it has and if the Government were not handing out, as it ought to, compensation to all those who are helpless and disabled because of the last war, this might not come to us under such trying circumstances, but while we are extending a lavish hand to the veterans of the Civil War and the veterans of the World War, it occurs to me that we should pass this measure and get the Senate to pass it. If the disabled soldier could come with a germane amendment in this bill, I would offer it, instead of having to go through all of the process of getting the Pension Department to raise the amount and finding after many months' trial that it can not be done, as happened in the case which I have just related.

It is my judgment that the soldiers of the Spanish-American War are entitled to all of the rights and benefits that this Government is giving the veterans of other wars, and that the widows of those veterans are entitled to the same rights as those of any other war. I am in favor of this measure and I hope that it will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, there is just one thought that I want to give to the House. No Member of the House wants to grant a pension to a woman who is worth $70,000, but there are two good reasons why a property restriction or an income restriction should not be incorporated in the bill. One is that it costs the Government more to administer the law because of that restriction than it would take to pay the pensions involved. But here is the greater problem: The cause of delays in granting pensions is because of this income restriction. It takes months and months to investigate each individual case to see whether a certain income is being passed. Instead of its being some advantage to some rich person, the law, as a matter of fact, bears heavily upon thousands of poor widows and children. We did not include that provision because we favored pensioning some rich person, but we did it in order to save the Government money and to not work any hardship upon those who actually need attention.

A further thought is this: This bill is not only indorsed by the legislative committee of the United Spanish-American War Veterans, but at their recent convention in Indianapolis, when they had their representatives there from all parts of the Union, they indorsed the bill unanimously, and while it has some features that some of us might want to change, yet it is the bill that the United Spanish-American War Veterans have asked us to pass and with which they feel they can be satisfied.

I want to join with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] in complimenting the Spanish-American War veterans for the smallness of their request and for the manner in which they approach the Congress, not demanding but setting forth their request in a proper manner and in a proper way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is not another reason why the property qualification should be dispensed with the fact that a pension is a roll of honor and should not take into consideration the question of a person's financial standing? If the husband was a soldier and wore the uniform of his country, she ought to receive the benefit of the pension.

Mr. ROBSION. Another good reason. Mr. Chairman, we are ready to have the bill read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the widow of any officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the War with Spain, the Chinese Boxer rebellion, or the Philippine insurrection, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, and was honorably discharged from such service, or, regardless of the length of service, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and line of duty, such widow having married such soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the passage of this act, shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed upon the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $20 per month during her widowhood. And this section shall apply to a former widow of any officer or enlisted man who rendered service as hereinbefore described, and who was honorably discharged, such widow having remarried either once or more than once after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife; and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $20 per month; and any widow or former widow as mentioned in this section shall also be paid $4 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16 years: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise mentally or physically helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability; and this proviso shall apply to all pensions heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted under this or any former statute: Provided further, That in case of any widow whose name has been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to renewal of pension under this act until the pension to such child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon renewal of pension to such widow, payment of pension to such child or children shall cease.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill, page 1, line 7, after the word "inclusive," in said line, insert the following: Or who fought to protect the frontiers of this country against Indians up to and including the year 1880, not otherwise provided for under existing law, and who were mustered into said service under sanction of State authority.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against the amendment as not being germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I call the attention of the chairman to the fact that it provides for the pensioning of those who enlisted in certain wars, and this is simply including one other.

Mr. KNUTSON. This is a bill granting relief to the soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and the Chinese Boxer rebellion, and has nothing whatever to do with Indian outbreaks in the earlier days.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I call attention to the fact that these men were fighting for this Government, and to-day there is a law permitting them to have a pension; that is, those who fought up until 1876. This is only extending the time four more years. Why should they not be given a pension if the others are paid a pension who fought up to 1876?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Were they in the service of the United States and regularly commissioned troops at the time of the activities for which they are now to be pensioned?

Mr. HUDSPETH. They were commissioned under State authority, and they were fighting for this Government, and they are recognized——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not talking about the moral aspect, but of the legal one. Were they in the United States service?

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not think so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This bill relates to pensioning people who were in the United States service.

Mr. HUDSPETH. This is a class of men, I will state, who are drawing pensions from the United States Government——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But you can not extend this bill to muster somebody else into the United States service who was not.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, while these men were in the service of the State of Texas, Congress has recognized their service by reimbursing the State of Texas for the money they were out for their service, thereby recognizing the legality of their service to the country. Let me say to the gentleman that the department has passed on that, and they are now on the pension list extending to a certain time, and now my colleague only proposes to extend that to others who rendered similar service and who were not on the pension roll.

Mr. HUDSPETH. We have nurses in this bill, granting them a pension, who were not in the Federal service regularly enlisted. And while I am in favor of granting these splendid women a pension, still I want these old pioneer Indian fighters recognized and granted a pension who fought to protect their country up to 1880. I do not feel that a nurse should have to almost swear that she is a pauper either before she is given a pension. I mean nurses who helped to minister to our soldiers during this war or any other war for this country.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is only one class of these people, and the gentleman is attempting to extend the scope of the bill by mustering in some new men into the service who were not originally mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. HUDSPETH. They are men of the same class.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I invite the Chair's attention to the language at the end of line 3, on page 3, which reads, "Hereafter to be granted under this or any former statute." Therefore this bill does not relate alone to those mentioned in the title, but also to others; and if this act relates to others mentioned in "any former statute," then the amendment is certainly germane.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I submit the reference to a former statute is a former statute bearing upon exactly the same class of people covered by this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This bill provides for pensions for persons who served in certain definite wars of the United States—the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the Chinese Boxer rebellion—and does not refer to indefinite periods of fighting to defend the country, but provides for a certain class of people participating in certain definite wars carried on by this Government. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas simply provides for the pensioning of anybody who at any time may have fought for his country to protect the frontier against Indian attacks. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is not germane to this bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 4, page 1, the first word "ninety" and substitute the word "sixty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLOUSE: Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "ninety" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty."

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want ultimately to reach the merits of the proposed amendment. Having observed that this is a very rapidly moving machine, I wanted to call your attention, first, to the provisions of section 3, because when we reach them we will be through with it before we have time to think about it. Section 3 provides:

That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll and all persons hereafter granted a pension, who, while in the military and naval service of the United States and in line of duty shall have lost both hands or both feet or been totally disabled therein, or who while in such service and in like manner sustained injuries that proved the direct cause of the subsequent total disability of both hands or feet, shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

Now, I want to know, gentlemen, what good sense there is in discriminating between that man who happened to lose both feet or both hands who had 90 days' service and one with the same disability who served 60 days? The reason I offer the amendment to strike out the word "ninety" and substitute the word "sixty" is this: Charles R. Etheridge volunteered his services in the Spanish-American War. He comes from my home town and from the same district that Alvin C. Yorke came from, and from the same district that furnished the first American blood in the World War. He volunteered his services, and immediately upon being inducted into the service he was stricken ill with that high fever that was prevalent in Cuba. He was discharged on the sixty-second day of his service. He is totally disabled. He has his hands, he has his feet, but he has lost something far more precious—he has lost his health—and under this bill you deny him any compensation at all. Why, I ask, is he not entitled to it? Only a few days ago I had this matter up with the Secretary of the Interior, and I was advised that there was no law on the statute books that entitled Charles Etheridge to any pension because he had not served 90 days.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. My understanding of the law is that the 90-day limitation applies not to men who were disabled in the service. That limitation applies only to men whose disability comes in afterlife. If he was wounded in the service and disabled, he could qualify under the existing pension law.

Mr. CLOUSE. I am telling you what I am confronted with in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. ROBSION. Does not the Pension Department hold that your man has not proved that he was disabled entirely?

Mr. CLOUSE. They reject him simply because he had not served the 90 days provided by the act of June 1, 1920.

Mr. ROBSION. If he served 90 days and is entitled to a pension, he would get it anyway. They reject his claim because he did not incur the disability in the service.

Mr. CLOUSE. But the gentleman overlooks this fact: They have held he is not entitled to it because of the limitation of 90 days. I can conceive of many cases of a similar character. This is not the only one. There are hundreds of cases of men who were inducted into the service during the Spanish-American War where their patriotism was as high as that of any man who went through and was declared discharged at the cessation of hostilities. He was broken in health, and I say that he deserves a fair consideration.

Mr. NOLAN. Does not the gentleman know that this amendment, if adopted, will not help that particular case?

Mr. KNUTSON. I want to say for the information of the committee, that if the gentleman to whom the proceeding refers was discharged for disability incurred in the line of duty, he will have no difficulty in being placed upon the pension roll, or such cases as the gentleman refers to can come before Congress and secure relief. There is no need at all for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. If we make it 60 days, why not 30 days? If 30 days, why not 15 days?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman has doubtless observed that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee does not relate to what he refers to at all. That relates only to widows.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; that is true, and the amendment is not really in order.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This 60-day proposition has come up, and I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that his man would not be excluded by the general law if he could show his disability was incurred in the service. And the reason they demand the 90 days is because he is now disabled, and under the act of June 5, 1920, he would be entitled to a pension without showing his disability was incurred in the service. This question came before our committee as to whether we would make it 90 days or 60 days, and the committee considered it carefully. We had before our committee officers and representatives of the United Spanish-American War Veterans, and they thought it wise to ask Congress to fix the time at 90 days and not 60 days.

Mr. NOLAN. Has it not been the customary practice for soldiers to take their cases up with the Pension Bureau, and after they have exhausted all their resources there to have special bills introduced for their relief? And can not a special bill be introduced for the relief of this gentleman just as well as anybody else? This committee is continually reporting out omnibus pension bills to take just such action.

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes. I hope they will take that course.

Mr. ROBSION. Those are the facts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I want to ask my colleague from Kentucky if provision is made in this bill for the pension of a widow of a soldier who had gone through the first 90 days of the war in which he was engaged?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes. The act of March 3, 1917, provides a pension of $25 to such widows.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do so for the purpose of asking a question of my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], chairman of the committee. Under existing pension law it is my understanding that if a widow has an income equaling $250 per year she is not entitled to a pension, and that if she has an income of $250 or more per year and has several minor children, under existing law the sum of so much per child can not be credited to her, either. In other words, if there is an income of $250, neither she nor her children are pensionable. If I understand this legislation correctly, it remedies that, so that, regardless of income, both the widow and children would be pensioned?

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I think it is a very worthy piece of legislation.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio rises in opposition to the pro forma amendment and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I simply want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I want to congratulate the veterans of the Spanish-American War on their modesty in recommending the passage of this bill. I would like at this time to offer an amendment to strike out the figures "$20," in lines 6 and 16, on page 2, and substitute the figures "$25"; and in line 18 to amend by striking out the figure "$4" and substitute the figure "$5." That is the natural human reaction in the consideration of a proposition of this kind. But as the committee and the chairman of the committee warn us and request that the friends of this bill should not revise it upward, or amend it upward, I refrain from offering an amendment.

And in closing I again want to say that as a Member of the House I want to congratulate the proponents of this bill on the modesty of their requests.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANKIN: Page 2, line 4, after the word "service," insert "who is without means of support other than her daily labor and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year," and also in line 15, on page 2, after the word "widow."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment makes this bill conform to the law as it now stands with reference to the property qualification. The law, as it now reads, provides that the widow of any soldier who has died or who shall hereafter die, being without means of support other than her daily labor and an actual net income not exceeding $250 a year, shall be granted a pension in the sum of $12 a month.

By adopting this amendment, the only change that would be made in the law would be to raise these pensions from $12 to $20 a month for the widow and from $2 to $4 a month for the children, but you would be acting with more consistency, it seems to me at least, by requiring a property qualification, and in that way eliminate the inconsistency of pensioning people who admit that they are worth from $50,000 to $75,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make that motion for the purpose of inquiring of the author of the bill if the word "minor," at the beginning of line 24, page 2, has been advisedly put in. The language is—

Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise mentally or physically helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability.

Now under the language that I have just read and under the following language, unless a child is found to be insane or an idiot, or otherwise mentally or physically helpless while a minor, it can not receive any of the benefits of this bill.

Mr. ROBSION. Yes; it can, provided the mother marries again.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; if the mother marries again and one of her children by the former soldier is in a lunatic asylum, then that lunatic in the asylum would get $4 a month but the mother could not get anything.

Mr. ROBSION. No. In lines 18, 19, 20, and 21 you will find that it does provide that other children may receive a pension, but this minor insane child comes under a different provision.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would it not be better if the word "minor" were out?

Mr. ROBSION. No.

Mr. KING. Why not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Reading further, the bill provides:

Provided further, That in case of any widow whose name has been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to renewal of pension under this act until the pension to such child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon renewal of pension to such widow, payment of pension to such child or children shall cease.

But if an insane child is violent and vicious and has been committed to an asylum, then the mother can never have the parental charge of it. The child in the asylum would get the $4 a month, but the mother who again is a widow can get no pension at all.

Mr. ROBSION. The child might get the full pension, the full $20 a month.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then you leave the mother unprovided for. Under the laws of your State and mine the pension which was given to the child would go to the payment of its maintenance in the lunatic asylum.

Mr. ROBSION. The purpose of the pension is to take care of the child, and if the mother does not take care of the child, but another does it for her, why should she still receive the pension?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But if the widow of one of these soldiers has a lunatic child more than 21 years of age in an asylum, and has other infant children by the soldier, then she can get no pension at all, while the child in the lunatic asylum does get a pension of $4 a month.

Mr. ROBSION. That is not the construction to be placed on this.

Mr. FIELDS. This provides that the Federal Treasury shall assume an obligation that is incumbent upon the State, to take care of the insane child.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe that the word "minor" ought to be stricken out, because the interests of the widow have been too severely curtailed by the language on page 3.

Mr. ROBSION. The word "minor" is carried in all pension bills of a similar character.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is no justification of it if in reality it works a hardship in this or any other instance.

Mr. ROBSION. But the practical working out of a law of that sort is not what the gentleman has construed it to be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But here it says in plain language—

That in case a "minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise mentally or physically helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability."

That minor child may draw the pension of $4 a month throughout life or during the continuance of the physical or mental disability; but unless it be provided before the child reaches the age of 21 years it can not be done at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I submit the question to the authors of the bill for their consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all women employed by the Surgeon General of the Army as nurses, under contract or otherwise, during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion, or who were employed as nurses during such period by authority which is recognized by the War Department, and who rendered actual service as nurses in attendance upon the sick or wounded in any regimental, post, camp, or general hospital of the armies of the United States for a period of 90 days or more, and who were honorably relieved from such service, and who are now or who may hereafter be unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States and be entitled to receive a pension of $20 per month, and such pension shall commence from the date of filing of the application in the Pension Office after the passage of this act: Provided, That no person shall receive more than one pension for the same period: Provided further, That all dependent parents of any officer or enlisted man who served in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion, whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now entitled to pension under any existing law, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I make the motion in this instance, as I did a moment ago, for the purpose of securing information. At line 24, page 3, I find this language relative to nurses:

And who are now or who may hereafter be unable to earn a support, shall, upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States and be entitled to receive a pension of $20 per month.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] a few moments ago waxed quite warm in protesting against an amendment which would make it unnecessary that the widow should be required to assert or declare her poverty before receiving a pension. I would be glad to be advised by the gentleman why he discriminates against the nurses by requiring them to make this alleged humiliating statement that I just quoted from the bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, there is no discrimination whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Continuing, Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], who is chairman of this committee, and who supposedly is the author of this bill, can see no discrimination between relieving the widow of pleading poverty or lack of ability to earn a support, and requiring that statement to be made, proven, and established on the part of the nurse.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANKIN: Page 3, line 23, after the word "service," strike out to and including the word "support" in line 24.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in order to put these nurses on the same footing as the widows. I submit that it is a violent and flagrant discrimination against those nurses who went into the camps and the hospitals and served 90 days——

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. In just a moment. I say it is a flagrant discrimination against them to make them plead poverty and at the same time say to the widow, "We do not care how much money you are worth or how able you are to take care of yourself, you are automatically placed on the pension roll." That is what this bill does.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think an important amendment such as he has offered should be considered by the Committee on Pensions rather than to take snap judgment on the floor?

Mr. RANKIN. No; not if it is as difficult to convince all the members of the committee of this discrimination as it is to convince the chairman [Mr. KNUTSON] in this instance.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to call to the committee's attention and read that part of the report from the Secretary of the Interior to the committee, found on page 2 of the report, which relates to what has been said about nurses, namely:

Section 2 proposes pension of $20 per month to women unable to earn a support who were employed as Army nurses and who rendered 90 days' or more of actual service in that capacity during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion; and a like rate to the dependent parents, now pensioned or entitled to pensions, of officers and enlisted men who served in any one of said conflicts.

I do not believe anyone who knows the facts can say that the nurses of the Civil War or the Spanish-American War or those in the World War did not render this service at the front and where it was dangerous many times and that they were subjected to all the dangers of disease and otherwise. Now, you require them, because the older law relating to those in the Civil War provides for it—forgetting that the world is moving and that this Congress has recognized by an act and placed on the statute books a law making the nurses officers of the Regular Army, and therefore in subsequent legislation when the House has an opportunity to correct the wrongs that have been done in the past will do so. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, and his able assistant, the gentleman from Kentucky, because the amendment was not offered in committee, will not refuse to accept it but will vote for it, so that these nurses, not only in this war but those of the World War, may be placed on the same footing. The amendment should be adopted, and the bill then pass as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything on this bill, because I thought it was so fair in all its provisions that very little explanation was needed.

I am going to take a few minutes to explain what I consider the salient features. One applies to a Pennsylvania regiment, where the men were mustered into the service a little later than some other regiments and the men were returned home from camp in the South because the Government was not in shape to care for them down there, under a furlough, and were furloughed before they had 90 days' actual service in the field. They were under military discipline all that time; they were not mustered out until after the 90 days, but had not seen 90 days' active service before the furlough was granted.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. There is a provision in this bill taking care of that.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; I was coming to that; and that is one of the salient features of the bill, as it will give these men and their widows a pensionable status. The bill also very properly increases the widow's pension from $12 to $20, and children from $2 to $4, and relieves the restriction as to $250 income per year.

Now, we come to the nurses. I will confess that at first I was not enthusiastic about that provision of the bill, but I think the gentleman from California with even his well-known desire to at all times extol the great influence and abilities of the ladies on every occasion, and who by his and other propaganda forced upon the Army the absurd idea of giving rank to the nurses, will not want to do more for the nurses than he would do for the real doughboy, the man who served two years in the jungles of the Philippines. Under the amendment offered, the soldier finds himself discriminated against in favor of the nurse who served 90 days in this country. In other words, the nurse's pension is based on something else than the widow's. It is based on service as the soldier's pension is, and the soldier could not get his pension unless he shows a degree of disability or inability to earn a support. These women may be worth $100,000 and get a pension under this provision. The nurse has her profession, and by that profession she can earn a support until she becomes of such an age that she can not practice it. When she comes to that age, it is proposed under the bill to take care of her as is the widow of the dependent soldier. I am not averse to paying the nurses something when they come to that age. Because when I was in the Army there were a few of them. I can remember, not distinctly, because my mind was very hazy, but I can remember a female nurse in the haze when I was taken to the hospital with a temperature of 104, and remained in that condition for more than a week, and during that time this figure was always about caring for me. That was about my only experience with that branch of the service. But I am willing that these women should be cared for by the Government when they are not by their profession able to take care of themselves. I do not know the name of this nurse, or whether she is living or not, but if she is living, I hope she may receive the benefit of this bill. It is not a discrimination, because they are placed upon a different status than the widow. The widow is pensioned because she is a widow of a man who wore the uniform and served his country in time of war, and took that time out of the days of his earning power to provide for his family. The nurse's pension is based on service just as the pension of the soldier is based on service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When I was on the floor a moment ago I alluded to the fact that, in my judgment, an amendment might be of some benefit in this section 2. The language in lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 3, alluding to nurses, contains the following:

And who are now or who may hereafter be unable to earn a support.

It occurs to me that that is pretty broad language. A pension is to be paid to anyone who is unable to earn a support. There is no reason given for it. It need not be on physical disability. It may be that they can not get a job. If a person is a nurse and is unable to earn a support, she is entitled to a pension under this bill. I suggested to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] that perhaps it would be advisable to insert, after the word "hereafter," the words "on account of physical disability." I am told by those gentlemen that they do not think the amendment is necessary. I am content to let it go, if they think it is not, if they believe the language is sufficient to guard against any such danger in this respect. They say that the words—upon making due proof of the fact according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe—amply guard against what I had in mind. They claim that the Secretary can provide it must be based on physical disability, and inasmuch as the existing law has the same language, I presume there are many rulings to that effect and that the line of decisions on this subject is well laid down.

I make this explanation in view of the statement I made a while ago and in explanation of the fact that I do not now offer the amendment that I suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I only do this for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] to what I think is an answer to his objection in reference to this matter. No woman, as I understand the language of section 2, can participate in the benefits of this proposed legislation unless she has been distinctly employed by the Surgeon General of the Army or employed by such authority which is recognized by the War Department. In other words she would have to prove——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I ask this question?

Mr. LAYTON. Just wait a minute. I would like to yield to the gentleman, but I believe I will not do so just now.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Very good.

Mr. LAYTON. Now, as a matter of fact I will ask the gentleman to consider whether or not that is not true, that no nurse can participate in any benefit under this law as proposed unless she can show a distinct employment by contract through the Surgeon General of the United States or some authority recognized by the War Department.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAYTON. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does not that apply to the proprietor of a private hospital who had a contract with the Government to treat certain soldiers and had in his employment certain women who were his nurses to treat his patients?

Mr. LAYTON. During this last war, the most gigantic that fell upon this country, we were not prepared with nurses regularly enlisted. We were not prepared for hardly anything under God's heaven, and therefore we took the splendid hospital service of the United States and put in there the good women who were supposed to be at all fitted for good nurses, and if there is any soldier boy on earth in France or the United States who did not recognize the angelic service of the women nurses, why he is insensible.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman answer my question as to whether that will not admit those persons?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. There was a motion to strike out that section which I think we should not ignore, although I think nobody favors it. I made the motion and I did not withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood it was a pro forma amendment?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the vote.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll and all persons hereafter granted a pension who while in the military or naval service of the United States and in line of duty shall have lost both hands or both feet or been totally disabled therein, or who while in such service and in like manner sustained injuries that proved the direct cause of the subsequent total disability of both hands or both feet, shall receive a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. WALSH. I reserve a point of order upon the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask what jurisdiction the committee has to report legislation pertaining to pensions for Civil War veterans?

Mr. ROBSION. The committee claims no authority to report such legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Why have they done so then?

Mr. ROBSION. That section was prepared by the experts of the Pension Department and is intended to include and does include only the soldiers of these wars.

Mr. WALSH. That is the way the experts may read it, but the language says:

That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll and all persons hereafter granted a pension who while in the military or naval service of the United States—

It does not say under the provisions of this act, and it does not say the military or naval service during the Spanish-American War or the Philippine insurrection or the Chinese Boxer rebellion, and would include and apply to those upon the pension roll and the legislation——

Mr. ROBSION. The committee is willing to accept an amendment limiting it to these wars.

Mr. KNUTSON. The bill is limited.

Mr. WALSH. No; the bill is not limited. The title is no part of the bill. The language is broader than the jurisdiction of the committee and I think the intention of the committee.

Mr. ROBSION. If the gentleman will permit, after the words "United States," in line 17, these words, perhaps, should be inserted, "under the provisions of this act."

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that would be sufficiently comprehensive, for soldiers who are granted Spanish War pensions are not included in this act.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make the point of order?

Mr. WALSH. I am reserving it for the purpose of seeing if the chairman of the committee feels that that language can be cured by a proper amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he knows or not the law in regard to the payment of pensions of soldiers who served in the Civil War suffering from the same disabilities described in this act. Do they receive $100 a month?

Mr. CRAGO. They do, and it simply puts this bill on a parity with the other wars.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the Chair will permit, the amendment proposed would not apply in this instance, because the paragraph does not relate to the bill that fixes the basis of the pensions for disabled Spanish War veterans?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. It is all right. There is no point of order against it.

Mr. WALSH. There is a point of order against it.

Mr. MANN. What is the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is as to section 3——

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment and offer this amendment in lieu of it:

After the word "States," in line 17, insert "under the provisions of this act and all other acts relating to pensions for soldiers of the Spanish-American War, Philippine war, and the Boxer rebellion."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. ROBSION. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can he not accomplish his purpose with putting those words after the word "pension" in line 16?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his reservation of the point of order; and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBSION: Page 4, line 17, after the word "States," insert "under the provisions of this act and all other acts relating to pensions of soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the Chinese Boxer rebellion."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, in line 21 of section 3, the words "of both hands or both feet."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLOUSE: Page 4, line 21, after the word "disability," strike out the words "of both hands or both feet."

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I said a few moments ago in the course of my remarks that the Pension Office in the city of Washington had declined to grant a pension to a Spanish-American War veteran whose discharge showed that he had a disability and was discharged on that account, having served for a period of time less than 90 days. And I repeat the claim was rejected. I have in my hand a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, in which he says:

You are advised that this claim under the act of June 5, 1920, filed October 4, 1921, is rejected on the ground that claimant rendered less than 90 days' service during the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and China Relief Expedition, in the Twelfth Company United States Volunteer Signal Corps, the only service alleged, as shown by reports from the records of the War Department, claimant having enlisted June 27, 1898, and been discharged on account of disability September 6, 1898.

I do not know what the law means. I know what the Bureau of Pensions says it means, because I have their letter here, over the signature of the commissioner, and he denies that this man has a pensionable status under your act.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. I have not the time to yield.

I want to call your attention to this fact: I want to ask you again, why do you discriminate between a man who has lost two hands or two feet during the Spanish-American War and a man that has lost his health and everything that it means to him? I do not object to paying this man that suffered the loss of two hands or two feet $100, but I do say that we ought to be fair and square with this man that lost his health and give him the same compensation that we give a man that lost his hands or feet.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. I have not the time.

I am told there are only 16 of these unfortunate men. Some member of the committee told me that; I do not now recall who it was. I do not know where they live, but I am speaking for the mass of Spanish-American War soldiers, it matters not where they live. I say let us be fair, let us be just, and let us be generous with these heroes of that great war. With the language stricken out, it will give to the man who lost his health in that war the same status as the man who lost his hands or his feet. In what better condition is the man who is deprived of his health than the man who lost his hands or his feet? I am going to vote for this bill, because I think it is high time that we were recognizing the deeds of valor of these heroes, but we ought to vote this amendment and make it apply to every man who is totally disabled. I see no sense in limiting it to 16 individuals, as it is claimed, who were so unfortunate as to lose their two hands or their two feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the section is passed, but I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] a question about section 5. Beginning in line 7, page 6, it says:

And nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent any pensioner thereunder from prosecuting his claim under any other general or special act.

What does "or special act" mean there?

Mr. ROBSION. That would mean this: That if any pensioner was turned down under this act, we could introduce a special bill and it would be considered by the Pension Committee of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Why the necessity of putting that in the law?

Mr. ROBSION. I doubt if that is necessary. I do not think it is; neither do I think the language necessary that his claim may be considered under any general law. I think he has both of those rights anyway.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This would seem to be providing that nothing in this act shall prevent a man from having a special act introduced in his behalf. It seems to be wholly unnecessary.

Mr. ROBSION. We may have had this thought: A great many men have filed their claims under the general law. They have been pending a good many years. I think it is intended to take care of that sort of situation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is all right; the special act. I understand a special act is where I introduce a bill to increase the pension of an individual.

Mr. ROBSION. I think the thought was that some men have already introduced special bills. If they want to pursue that course, it is up to them to do it. It gives them the right.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the meaning of those lines 7, 8, 9, and a part of 10, reading as just suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee—

And nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent any pensioner thereunder from prosecuting his claim under any other general or special act—

Means that nothing in this bill which we are now considering shall prevent anyone from prosecuting a claim under any general or special act?

Mr. ROBSION. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What I mean is should not the word "thereunder" be changed to "hereunder"?

Mr. ROBSION. "No prosecution of claims thereunder"; that is, under the general law or under special acts; not "hereunder." They do not have to come hereunder. They can continue thereunder.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. You say, "Nothing herein shall be so construed."

Mr. ROBSION. Nothing in this act shall prevent a man from prosecuting a claim under the law or under a special act.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that those words "or special acts" are a reflection on our own intelligence.

Mr. FIELDS. It possibly might apply to a man who served in the Civil War and in the Spanish-American War. Giving him the right to prosecute under this act might deter him from receiving a pension under Civil War acts. There are a few cases of that kind.

Mr. ROBSION. It is intended not to compel a man to quit a proceeding under the old law to get under this law.

Mr. FIELDS. To drop a proceeding under the old law and apply under this act. There are a few cases of that kind. I have one constituent, as I remember, who served in both wars.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 4) granting relief to soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign; to widows, former widows, and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors, and to certain Army nurses, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBSION, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that each Member of the House may have five legislative days in which to extend remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that each Member of the House have five legislative days in which to extend remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WALSH. I object to any general leave.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the bill be given the right to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the bill be given the right to revise and extend their remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Pensions any further business?

Mr. ROBSION. No.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will withhold that for a moment.

APPLICATION OF RECLAMATION LAW TO IRRIGATION DISTRICTS.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts, heretofore referred by the House, be rereferred back to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 4382 be rereferred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask what bill it is and what is it about and in what committee it has been heretofore?

Mr. KINKAID. It is a bill to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

Mr. WALSH. In what committee was it before?

Mr. KINKAID. In this committee. It is desired to correct a clerical error.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll of committees.

Mr. EDMONDS (when the Committee on Claims was called). Mr. Speaker, I would like to call up the bill H. R. 7912.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Claims, calls up the bill H. R. 7912.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is apparent that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets that he has just stated that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. MONDELL. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 11.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 293 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 7912, to provide a method for the settlement of claims arising against the Government of the United States in sums not exceeding $1,000 in any one case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 7912, with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7912, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7912) to provide a method for the settlement of claims arising against the Government of the United States in sums not exceeding $1,000 in any one case.

Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act the terms "department and establishment" and "department or establishment" mean any executive department, independent commission, board, bureau, office, agency, or other establishment of the Government, including the municipal government of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That authority is hereby conferred upon the head of each department and establishment acting on behalf of the Government of the United States to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine any claim accruing after the passage of this act on account of damages to and loss of privately owned property where the amount of the claim does not exceed $1,000, and for which damage or loss the Government may be found to have been responsible. Such amount as may be found to be due to any claimant shall be reported to Congress as a legal claim for payment out of appropriations that may be made by Congress therefor, together with a brief statement of the character of each claim, the amount claimed, and the amount allowed.

SEC. 3. That acceptance by any claimant of the amount determined under the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be in full settlement of such claim against the Government of the United States.

SEC. 4. That any and all acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question of consideration of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is Calendar Wednesday and that the House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The question of consideration should have been raised before we went into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman is right. I forgot for the moment that this is Calendar Wednesday. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, during the 10 years that I have been a Member of the Committee on Claims it has always been a subject of controversy upon the floor of the House as to the method to be pursued in paying claims. It was claimed that certain parties, either through favoritism or because of knowing members of the committee, were able to get bills passed through the House, and that a great many other parties who were damaged just as much by the actions of the Government were not able to obtain redress.

The last time the House had claims before it quite a number of Members raised this question, and it has been raised from time to time, as I said before, during the whole 10 years that I have been a member of the committee.

Membership on the Committee on Claims is not a very pleasant job. Most Members think their claims ought to get prompt attention. We have before the committee a large number of small claims. The committee has always felt that those claims could be adjusted and paid by the departments just as well, and in a great many cases with the saving of a great deal of money to the Government, by general legislation. The House has recognized that in a number of cases by placing on appropriation bills provision for some method for the paying of certain kinds of claims. We took up this matter with each department. We found that the War Department had two distinct methods of settling claims, provided for by legislation on appropriation bills. One was for the payment of aircraft damage cases up to $250. The other one was for the payment of damages arising out of the training and operations of the Army up to $500.

During 1919, $30,000 was appropriated to cover these claims. During 1920–21, $40,000 was appropriated, and in the last Army bill we appropriated $100,000 for this purpose. So you see these claims are settled, and certain persons whose damages are no worse than those claimed in a great many of the cases that are brought before the House are paid by the War Department. The Treasury Department has five cases of damages——

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that the War Department has the right to settle any kind of a claim up to a certain amount?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; only a certain kind of claims.

Mr. SNELL. What kind of claims are they?

Mr. EDMONDS. Damages by aircraft up to $250; training practice and operation of the Army up to $500.

Mr. SNELL. And those are the only two classes of cases?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. The Treasury Department has five cases which amount to $1,685 arising out of the operation of Coast Guard vessels. The Commerce Department has the right to settle claims up to $500 for collision occasioned by lighthouse boats. The Coast Survey Service can also settle damages arising out of the operation of their boats up to $500. There is no arrangement for the Bureaus of Fisheries, Navigation, of Standards, or of the Census to settle claims.

The Interior Department has no way of settling any claims that arise out of the operation of their department, although they made an estimate for it under contingent expenses, but action was not taken by Congress. The Post Office Department can settle claims up to $500, and we appropriated $30,000 for that purpose. There is no appropriation for the Labor Department.

In the Navy Department they have authority to settle claims up to $500 where the damage or loss is occasioned in the naval service or the Marine Corps, where the men are found to be responsible. This provision is continued in the current appropriation bill.

The Agricultural Department has authority to reimburse for horses and vehicles and other equipment lost, damaged, or destroyed while being used to fight fire on the western reserves. In order to get reimbursed for this the vehicle has to be hired by the department.

The committee thought it would be a very easy matter, and a proper matter, to pass a general bill covering these claims up to a certain amount of money. Some members wanted to raise it to $5,000. We compromised on $1,000. We thought that was a fair sum, and most of the department chiefs who were before us thought so also.

I want to say a little about the work of the committee. We have 1,000 claim bills before the committee up to date. We have 32 Senate bills before the committee. That makes 1,032. We reported 80 House bills out of the committee and 12 Senate bills. Forty House bills have passed the House and 5 Senate bills. Two hundred and ninety-five of the House bills are for amounts less than $500. Two hundred and forty of them are in amounts between $500 and $1,000. Eighty-seven bills before the committee are for the reimbursement of money or property lost by fire or theft. Eight bills are for the reimbursement for expenses incurred in line of duty. Seven bills are for reimbursement for embezzlement of employees. Fifty-one bills are for damages arising out of collisions on water. Twenty-two bills are for reimbursement for money erroneously collected by the Government. Thirteen bills are for amounts due under various forms of agreement. One hundred and seven bills are for money used or for labor or materials furnished, increased costs, difference in pay, overtime, such as were occasioned during the war. Eighty bills are for injuries or death caused by the operation of Government automobiles. Five bills are for injuries or death caused by airplanes. Twenty-eight bills are for damages caused to private property by automobiles. Four bills are for damages caused to private property by airplanes. Thirty-five bills are for damages to private property caused by various means excepting automobiles and airplanes, and 37 bills in cases of death caused by all means except by automobiles and airplanes.

Of course it is no easy matter for the committee to study carefully bills that involve larger amounts. Every once in a while we will pass a bill here for less than $100, and it would be cheaper to have the Government settle the bill at $100 because of the expense incurred in connection with the time of the House and the printing of the different documents that come along with the bills. We take up far more time than $100 would settle. We have passed bills as low as $5 and $6, and it seems to me foolish for the House to continue in a slipshod business method when we can by some general act take care of the smaller of these claims.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. The Navy Department has authority at the present time to settle claims up to $500, but the comptroller has ruled, I notice from the report, that this does not give authority for the settlement of claims for which civilian employees in the department are responsible. Does the gentleman think that the language of the bill is sufficiently broad to overcome the objections raised by the comptroller and permit the Navy Department to settle claims arising out of the acts of civilian employees up to $1,000?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, I think so.

Mr. WALSH. I can not agree with the gentleman. The language carried in the Navy appropriation act is very broad. It is to the effect that the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay the amounts due in all cases for damages to or loss of privately owned property occurring subsequently to April 6, 1917, where the amount does not exceed $500. That is very broad language, and yet the comptroller said that that would not comprehend the civilian employees of the Navy Department. There is nothing in this bill which would tend to include them under the comptroller's decision.

Mr. EDMONDS. The intention of the committee was that these provisions in the appropriation bills would be eliminated in the future, and this bill would cover the settlement of all claims under $1,000 by the departments themselves. If the language does not cover that, I would be glad to have the gentleman amend it to cover it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee (interrupting the count). Mr. Chairman, I withhold the point for a moment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I was about to ask a question when the point of no quorum interposed. Does the gentleman believe that the language—and for which damage or loss the Government may be found to have been responsible—is sufficiently comprehensive to overcome the objection of the comptroller?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the language is sufficiently broad to cover that.

Mr. WALSH. Of course it is a matter of opinion.

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, if there is any doubt as to the meaning, I think the insertion of the following language in line 4 might meet the objection of the gentleman—was due to negligence of any officer or employee of the Government acting in the line of duty.

Mr. WALSH. That was what I had in mind.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I would be glad to offer that a little later as an amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much, indeed, to keep Members of the House here at this late hour.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. EDMONDS. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I trust I shall not take half of that time, but there is not a Member of the House who has served more than one term but has been bothered by some of these claims from his constituents. They have had to go before the Committee on Claims and have not secured action, due to the fact that it is a physical impossibility for 15 members of the Committee on Claims to take care of the many, many thousand bills presented to it each and every year. Those of you who come in personally to see members of the committee and ask that some claim of your constituents may be taken up at once usually are granted the courtesy by members of the committee, but there are many, many claims of small amounts referred to the committee, where some poor individual has lost his means of livelihood by means of negligence of some Government employee, and they pass through the committee, are acted favorably upon, they go through this House favorably, they go over to the Senate, and are lost over there, or the reverse may happen when they go to the Senate and come to the House and are lost here. Now, the general procedure of the committee is to first refer claims to the departments for an investigation and report, and in each and every instance, so far as I have known, we have taken the report of the department for our guidance and have adjudicated the claims upon the recommendation of the department. Now, that being the procedure, it does not seem necessary that the committee should sit days and days on these small matters, and that the House should sit other days and days hearing discussion of them. They should be treated generally on a basis of equality and justice. Furthermore——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I can not; I have only 15 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think we need a quorum, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is the general attitude of the gentleman from Texas, and I thank him for it, after all I have done for him.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has not done anything——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. EDMONDS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 7912, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had asked a further conference with the House on Senate amendments Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 20, and 21, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. HARRIS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. PARRISH was granted leave of absence, until further notice, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 2, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1922.

The chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, our appeal this morning is for a stricken city, full of mourning and desolation. We ask Thy great comfort in the midst of the sorrow that oppresses the Capital. May Thy mercy be manifested, may grace sufficient be given in the stricken homes and where there are distressed circumstances. Manifest Thine own healing hand in the hospital wards and in the homes of sickness. Remember the family of him who was noted in the councils of our country and who mourn today. Minister to each one of them.

Teach us always, Father, that our lives are in Thy hands and help us so to dispose of them that agreeable to Thy holy will we shall ever recognize our dependence upon Thee and may our willingness be manifest to do Thy good pleasure. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE INTERNATIONAL LONGFELLOW SOCIETY,
LONGFELLOW BIRTHPLACE,
Portland, Me., November 11, 1921.

To the Disarmament Conference, Washington, D. C.:

In the name of our God, who commanded thou shalt not kill; in the name of our Saviour, who said thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself; in the name of humanity and our civilization, the very existence of which is imperiled by the merciless hydra-headed monster of militarism, the International Longfellow Society, numbering more than 100,000 members, in the light of the record of centuries showing the horrible futility and atrocious crime of war, urges as the first essential of world peace an international agreement for the immediate and permanent abandonment of all further armament and munitions construction, to the end that a saner use may be made of human life than its willful destruction or the wicked waste of its energies in the creation of implements of death and desolation. Then may be realized—

PEACE ON EARTH, GOOD WILL TO MEN.

Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals
The blast of war's great organ shakes the skies!
But beautiful as songs of the immortals,
The holy melodies of love arise.

—Longfellow.

Respectfully submitted for—

Mr. LADD. I present resolutions passed by the Tri-State Grain and Stock Growers' Convention at Fargo, N. Dak., favoring the enactment of necessary legislation for the benefit of agriculture, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committee.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions passed by Twenty-third Annual Grain Growers' Convention.

FARGO, N. DAK., January 20, 1922.

Whereas the cost of everything to the farmer continues far above his ability to pay; and

Whereas the present crisis of readjustment deserves special or unusual action; and

Whereas we are all agreed that as a matter of permanent national economy agriculture must be put on a permanent profitable basis; we therefore advise that over any series of years farmers must obtain for their product a price which will at least cover actual cash expended, including taxes, hired labor, etc., and also must include a fair interest rate on the investment in farm and equipment and payment for labor of the farm operator and his family. This does not mean that the prices shall be high enough to protect the most incompetent farmers on the poorest farm land during the poorest year or excess wages and salaries to bring about such a system of profitable agriculture. We deem it necessary in the case of farmers producing cereals to work for the development of cooperative marketing of such cereals through control by ownership or lease of sufficient local or terminal warehouses so that producers may in a large measure regulate in an orderly way the surplus and at the same time prevent shortages of glutted markets and great fluctuation.

We urge that in order to make the above effective it seems necessary to work for the improvement of the national financial and credit situation so as to finance this cooperative marketing plan.

Mindful that in order to carry out such a program laws now providing for control of the abuses of grain exchanges should be effectively carried out; and mindful that finances are absolutely necessary for such a program, and recognizing that the War Finance Corporation has been a source of credit for the conduct of such a program we therefore urge for a continuance of the War Finance Corporation or some other such similar plan for the advancement of credit to such agricultural cooperative proceedures.

Whereas large quantities of red clover and alfalfa seeds are annually imported into the United States; and

Whereas such imported seeds have been proven by careful and extensive tests to be decidedly inferior to American grown seed, both in hardiness and purity; and

Whereas we believe that the increasing number of failures to secure successful stands of clover and alfalfa are due in a large measure to the sowing of such imported seed either straight or mixed with domestic seed; and

Whereas it is possible to so extend the areas in the United States now producing clover and alfalfa seed that this country will produce ample supplies; and

Whereas such extension of producing areas would quickly follow if producers were protected against the competition of cheap, imported seed: Be it

Resolved by the members of the Tri-State Grain Growers' Association in annual convention assembled at Fargo, That we favor the enactment of a tariff on red clover and alfalfa seed, as well as on all grains imported into the United States.

We indorse the agricultural bloc.

We urge the enactment of necessary legislation whereby the projected deep waterway may eventually become a reality.

We request Secretary of Agriculture Wallace to so amend Federal grades on potatoes so as to eliminate from No. 1 grade all reference to growth cracks.

Whereas new problems and conditions require new solutions; and

Whereas existing institutions or machines constructed for one purpose are not necessarily useful for other purposes; and

Whereas with these two points in mind we recognize four specific financial needs of agriculture:

1. Long-time credit—10 to 50 years—for the purpose of buying farms, because free land is gone.

2. Shorter term credit—1 to 10 years—to finance equipping of farms, constructing buildings, etc.

3. Short-time credit—up to one year—to finance producing of crop and stock.

4. Short-time credit for financing marketing.

We note that present institutions only partly fulfill our needs. Present financial institutions are chiefly for other purposes and call for different kinds of collateral and shorter periods of time.

We therefore call for Federal and State legislation to extend the present system of farm loan banks to make permanent the principles of the War Finance Corporation and to provide the other types of credit referred to above.

Resolved, That Congress of the United States guarantee to the farmers of the United States $2 per bushel for all wheat actually raised and consumed in the United States; and that all surplus wheat may be sold to other countries upon the world's market, and that all imported wheat shall not receive the guaranteed price.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted by the Western Association of State Game Commissioners, at Salt Lake City, Utah, January 17, 1922, protesting against the enactment of Senate bill 1452, the so-called Federal public shooting ground and game refuge act, and favoring the making of an appropriation for the purpose of enforcing the migratory bird treaty act, and the establishment of public shooting grounds and game refuges under the direction of the biological survey, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by J. S. McCready Post, No. 456, Grand Army of the Republic, of Cadiz, Ohio, favoring early action by Congress on general pension legislation for the benefit of Civil War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NELSON presented resolutions adopted by the State Agricultural Society, at Hamline, and the Yellow Medicine County Farm Bureau Association, both in the State of Minnesota, favoring the construction of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence ship canal, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

W. Jones & Co., White Kitchen Restaurant; employees of Winsted Hosiery Co., Empire Knife Co., the Fitzgerald Manufacturing Co., Tiffany & Pickett Co., the Strong Manufacturing Co., New England Pin Co., New England Knitting Manufacturing Co., Winsted Hardware Co., and Carter & Hakes Co., and sundry citizens, all of Winsted, Conn., praying for inclusion of the American valuation plan in the pending tariff bill, so as to better meet foreign competition and maintain an American standard of living, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by employees of Frank Parizek, of West Willington, and employees of B. Schwanda & Sons, of Staffordville, both in the State of Connecticut, favoring inclusion in the pending tariff bill of an adequate specific duty on importations of pearl buttons, compounded with an adequate ad valorem duty on a sufficient basis of valuation, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by members of the staffs and faculties of the School of Medicine, the Sheffield Scientific School, and the departments of philosophy, psychology, education, and religion, all of the Yale University, of New Haven, Conn., protesting against the enactment of legislation imposing a duty on reference and textbooks as contained in the pending tariff bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William North Rice, of Middletown, Conn., praying for postponement of the payment of Austria's debt for 20 years, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REMOVAL OF SNOW AND ICE.

Mr. BALL. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably with amendment the bill (S. 3086) providing for the removal of snow and ice from the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia, and I submit a report (No. 461) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were in section 1, page 1, line 8, before the word "hours," to strike out "four" and insert "eight"; in section 2, page 2, line 2, before the word "hours," to strike out "four" and insert "eight"; on page 2, line 18, before the word "hours," to strike out "four" and insert "eight"; in section 3, page 3, line 4, before the word "hours," to strike out "four" and insert "eight"; page 3, line 18, before the word "hours," to strike out "four" and insert "eight"; in section 4, page 4, line 8, before the word "hours," to strike out "four" and insert "eight"; and in section 6, page 5, line 11, to strike out the words "$3 penalty" and insert in lieu thereof "a penalty not to exceed $25," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of every person, partnership, corporation, joint-stock company, or syndicate in charge or control of any building or lot of land within the fire limits of the District of Columbia, fronting or abutting on a paved sidewalk, whether as owner, tenant, occupant, lessee, or otherwise, within the first eight hours of daylight after the ceasing to fall of any snow or sleet, to remove and clear away, or cause to be removed and cleared away, such snow or sleet from so much of said sidewalk as is in front of or abuts on said building or lot of land.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, within the first eight hours of daylight after the ceasing to fall of any snow or sleet, or after the accumulation of ice on the paved sidewalks within the fire limits of the District of Columbia, in front of or adjacent to all public buildings, public squares, reservations, and open spaces in the said District owned or held by lease by said District, to cause such snow, sleet, and ice to be removed; and also to cause the same to be removed from all crosswalks of improved streets and places of intersection of alleys with paved sidewalks, and also from all paved sidewalks or crosswalks used as public thoroughfares through all public squares, reservations, or open spaces within the fire limits of said District owned or held by lease by the District of Columbia; but in the event of inability to remove such accumulation of snow, sleet, and ice without injury to the sidewalk, by reason of the hardening thereof, it shall be their duty, within the first eight hours of daylight after the hardening thereof, to make reasonably safe for travel, or cause to be made reasonably safe for travel, by the sprinkling of sand or ashes thereon, such paved sikewalks, crosswalks, and places of intersection of alleys with paved sidewalks, and shall, as soon thereafter as the weather shall permit, thoroughly clean, or cause to be thoroughly cleaned, said sidewalks, crosswalks, and places of intersection of alleys with paved sidewalks.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Chief Engineer of the United States Army, within the first eight hours of daylight after the ceasing to fall of any snow or sleet, or after the accumulation of ice upon the paved sidewalks within the fire limits of the District of Columbia, to remove or cause to be removed from such sidewalks as are in front of or adjacent to all buildings owned or leased by the United States, and from all paved sidewalks or crosswalks used as public thoroughfares in front of, around, or through all public squares, reservations, or open spaces within the fire limits of the District of Columbia, owned or leased by the United States, such snow, sleet, and ice; but in the event of inability to remove such accumulation of snow, sleet, and ice, by reason of the hardening thereof, without injury to the sidewalk, it shall be his duty, within the first eight hours of daylight after the hardening of such snow, sleet, and ice, to make reasonably safe for travel, or cause to be made reasonably safe for travel, by the sprinkling of sand or ashes thereon, such paved sidewalks and crosswalks, and shall, as soon thereafter as the weather shall permit, thoroughly clean said sidewalks and crosswalks.

SEC. 4. In case the snow, sleet, and ice can not be removed from so much of the paved sidewalks within the fire limits of the District of Columbia as front upon or abut such buildings or lots of land as are not owned or held by lease by the District of Columbia or the United States without injury to said sidewalks, because of the hardening thereof, the person, partnership, corporation, joint-stock company, or syndicate in charge or control of such buildings or lots of land, whether as owner, tenant, occupant, lessee, or otherwise, shall, within the first eight hours of daylight after the same has formed, make reasonably safe for travel, or cause to be made reasonably safe for travel, by the sprinkling of sand or ashes thereon, said sidewalks, and shall, as soon thereafter as the weather shall permit, thoroughly clean said sidewalks.

SEC. 5. That in the event of the failure of any person, partnership, corporation, joint-stock company, or syndicate to remove or cause to be removed such snow or ice from the said sidewalks, or to make the same reasonably safe for travel, or cause the same to be made reasonably safe for travel, as hereinbefore provided, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as soon as practicable after the expiration of the time herein provided for the removal thereof, or for the making of the said sidewalks reasonably safe for travel, to cause the snow and ice in front of such building or lot of land to be removed or to cause the same to be made reasonably safe, as hereinbefore directed to be done by such person, partnership, corporation, joint-stock company, or syndicate in charge or control of such building or lot of land, and the amount of the expense of such removal or such work of making the said sidewalks reasonably safe for travel, shall in each instance be ascertained and certified by the said commissioners to the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 6. That the corporation counsel is hereby directed and authorized to sue for and recover from such person, partnership, corporation, joint-stock company, or syndicate the amount of such expense in the name of the District of Columbia, together with a penalty not exceeding $25 for each offense, with costs, and when so recovered the amount shall be deposited to the credit of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 7. That in order to enable the said commissioners and the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army to comply with their duties under this act and to carry it into effect there is hereby appropriated the sum of $10,000, one-half out of the general revenue fund of the District of Columbia and the other one-half out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossd for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I intended to offer an amendment to the bill making at least any judgment that might be rendered a lien on the property, but I did not wish to do anything to delay the passage of the bill this morning. I think that is a matter which can well be considered by the House committee.

I think it would have been well for us to provide that the cost of removing the snow and ice in front of property, when not done by the owner, should be made a lien upon the property, enforceable as tax liens are enforced. At any rate, any judgment that is rendered in the suit authorized by the bill to collect the amount that the Government had to expend for the removal of snow and ice should be made a lien on the property. I hope the House committee will consider that suggestion when they are considering the measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

PROHIBITION IN ICELAND.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

The resolution (S. Res. 230) was read, as follows:

Whereas it is reliably reported that the Government of Spain has threatened the Government and people of Iceland with the prohibition of valuable trade opportunities of economic necessity to the Icelandic people unless the Government of Iceland will repeal or modify its laws prohibiting the manufacture, sale, importation, etc., of alcoholic liquors to such an extent as will provide for the introduction of large quantities of Spanish wines into Iceland; and

Whereas such laws were enacted in Iceland only after long-continued discussion of the traffic in intoxicating liquors and its results upon the health, morals, and economic condition of the Icelandic people; and

Whereas the universal testimony from Government and local police officials, educators, the clergy, business men, and the people of the island of practically every class is to the effect that these laws have resulted in a great diminution of drinking and drunkenness and a large increase in the general prosperity and happiness of the people; and

Whereas these laws are not discriminatory in their character, but are prohibitive alike of domestic as well as foreign liquors, and were enacted solely out of regard for the moral, physical, and financial well-being of the Icelandic people and as a purely domestic matter; and

Whereas other nations, like France, are reported to be threatening like action toward other smaller nations, situated similarly to Iceland, Norway furnishing a present instance, and where the same course of discussion and progress of the prohibition movement has been followed as in Iceland, resulting in a nation-wide vote of 489,987 to 394,773 in favor of prohibition in 1919; and

Whereas such pressure by stronger powers upon weaker ones is in disregard of the inherent rights of all nations to adopt such laws and regulations nondiscriminatory as to their own citizens and those of other countries as each may decide are best adapted to preserve the health, insure the economic progress, increase the comfort and happiness of its own people, and maintain its standards of morals, and is contrary to the spirit of present-day conceptions of international relations among the nations of the world, and especially contrary to the principles of self-determination; and

Whereas prohibition has been established as a permanent domestic policy of the United States by the adoption of a constitutional amendment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States has heard with profound regret and great concern of such threatened pressure upon smaller nations to change their internal policies, and express the sincere hope that to promote international comity and good will among the nations and in recognition of the right of small nations to self-determination such pressure may not be resorted to against weaker countries, and all such efforts to force the liquor traffic upon peoples like those of Norway, Finland, and Iceland and the opium traffic upon China may be abandoned by Christian and civilized powers, and that if such a policy is adhered to the United States should consider what proper means may be used to vindicate its domestic policy and secure the recognition of those principles of self-determination and the rights of small nations that should be fully recognized by all Christian and civilized peoples.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the resolution just read, I am sure, will attract considerable attention. May I say to my friend from Washington that I suggest at the same time that the appropriate committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives consider the attitude of the United States in establishing embargoes, American valuations, and prohibitory tariffs, so that we are oppressing small nations and cutting off their trade with us, interfering with their prosperity and with their development, and the reactions, of course, are unfavorable to the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But we are not doing that for the purpose of compelling them to adopt some domestic policy such as is disclosed by this resolution. That is what this resolution is aimed at; it is aimed at the policy of one trying to force upon a small country a domestic policy which that country does not desire to have.

Mr. KING. I am expressing no opinion as to the effect and the consequences of the admirably phrased resolution introduced by my friend. I merely challenge attention to the fact that the United States is pursuing a policy which imposes hardships and difficulties upon smaller nations and really compels them to pursue a different economic and industrial policy from that which they have pursued in the past, to their disadvantage as well as ultimately to the disadvantage of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER DEVELOPMENT—POWER FOR EAST AND TRANSPORTATION FOR MIDDLE WEST.

Mr. McKINLEY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, for more than a generation the Middle West has made repeated efforts to gain a nearer way to the sea. "It is the age-long desire of landlocked people."

As long ago as 1895 Thomas H. Canfield, a Vermont Yankee, builder of western railroads in the seventies, described the need of cheaper transportation routes from the Mississippi Valley to the seaboard as an emergency:

What can be done for the producers of the West to enable them to take their products to the eastern market in the quickest time and, what is much more important, at the lowest rate to enable them to compete with the rest of the world.

Suggesting the possibility of enlarging the Erie Canal or of developing the Oswego-Hudson route as a ship channel, he continued:

> And if these two active cities [Buffalo and Oswego] can not meet the case and it becomes necessary to fall back upon that ever-flowing canal which the Creator has given us, the St. Lawrence River, to the ocean by way of Montreal or by a short cut to Lake Champlain and the ocean at New York, they will not complain as long as their business is attended to. But take which route you may, it must be evident to everyone that a canal having at least 26 feet on the miter sill will sooner or later have to solve the problem.

That was in 1895.

The outcome of the International Waterways Convention, at which Canfield was speaking, was the report of the Deep Waterways Commission of 1897, which found that a shipway was possible by either of the routes he named, by enlargement of the Erie Canal, by the Oswego-Hudson route, or by following the course of the St. Lawrence.

Upon the recommendation of that commission, the Deep Waterways Board was created, which spent $500,000 upon elaborate surveys and reported in 1900, according to its instructions, confirming the findings of the first commission that either of these routes was feasible, but dismissing the Erie route as uneconomical; showing that the St. Lawrence route was easily practicable for a shipway down to Montreal, but finding difficulty in the development of the course to Lake Champlain and from Champlain to the Hudson—it was instructed to proceed to an Atlantic terminus in the United States—and recommending preferentially the Oswego-Hudson route along much the same lines as those now occupied by the New York State Barge Canal, though they noted that there would be great difficulty in maintaining a supply of water for the summit level. That was in 1900. The State of New York, the Erie Canal having become obsolete, as a result of its independent investigation determined upon the present barge canal, which was opened to traffic in 1918 and is just now entering upon a period of usefulness larger, it is hoped, than that of the Erie Canal which it supersedes, and less, it is evident, than that of a way for ships from the Great Lakes to the sea.

Meantime the Canadian Government had developed a system of St. Lawrence canals having 14-foot depths. The project depth of the New York Barge Canal when completed is 12 feet. Finding the St. Lawrence system with 14-foot depths and narrow locks obsolete almost before it was completed, the Canadian Government just before the war began an extension of the Great Lakes channels by the construction of the New Welland Canal from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario, having channels 25 feet deep, permanent construction giving 30-foot depths, and ample length and breadth in the locks to accommodate ocean-going vessels.

During all this time the Middle West never relinquished its efforts to establish direct communication with markets across the sea. In 1900 Charles Counselman & Co. put on the Lakes a small fleet stanch enough for ocean service and of dimensions that could pass the present Canadian canals. The limitations were too severe and the venture was not a success. A few years later a number of Norwegian boats came up the Lakes to fetch and carry cargoes from the interior. Their experience was not encouraging. At another time vesselmen in Cleveland put out boats designed to ply between the Lakes and the lower St. Lawrence. Their usefulness was found to be severely limited. When the war came these vessels, having gained no profits for their owners, were sold to France. The commerce of the St. Lawrence canals for the last 20 years has consisted largely of coal and of grain transferred at Port Colborne from the Great Lakes carriers to the smaller vessels that can accommodate themselves to 14-foot channels.

During all this time also an outlet was sought through the Mississippi River and the Gulf ports, for the Middle West was still pursuing its desire for a nearer road to the sea, for a water road to the ocean which, to repeat, "is the age-long desire of landlocked people." Progress has been made in that development. The promise of successful commerce on the Mississippi is brighter now than it has been for a generation; but not all the inland territory can be served by this means and not all the need of the territory which the Mississippi will serve can be met in this way. The demand for the sea outlet is to-day more urgent than ever.

For 15 years the growing inadequacy of railway transportation for moving the products of a continent has been apparent. The breakdown of the machinery of transportation in 1920, following the strain of the war period, was not a new phenomenon but an accentuation of a situation that had existed for years during every season of heavy crop movement. The necessary increase in railroad rates still further emphasized the need of the deep interior. In order to establish rates which would enable the railroads to live it was necessary to adopt schedules which would not permit the traffic to move. The country had come to an impossible situation in the problem of transportation upon which depend the industrial life and the productive power of the Nation. It is a situation that can be cured only by reshaping the national transportation structure so that from every producing section by a relatively short-rail haul the Nation's products may be carried to the universal water base.

The western roads can not earn a living when their earnings depend largely upon the shrunken proportion of a through rate across the continent; still less can they finance the extension of their facilities which is necessary for the further development of the territory they serve. Eastern roads are in a predicament which, if possible, is even more serious. They must greatly extend their terminal facilities if they are to care for the western traffic superposed upon that which originates on their lines. To earn the carrying charges on those very costly improvements they must include in their allowances some contribution from the traffic delivered to them from western roads. But that through traffic can not stand an increase of assessment nor can the western roads concede to their eastern connections a larger proportion of present rates. It is an impossible situation. No other country in the world in order to reach an outlet to the sea has tried to haul the production of a continent across the greater breadth of the continent, and such attempt in America is henceforth impossible. What has been for a generation the instinctive desire of the West to find a nearer road to the sea and to the markets of the world is now an economic necessity for the Nation.

The first question everyone asks himself is whether the New York Barge Canal, when its service is fully developed, will not fill this need. It is a question that is very quickly answered. The capacity of the barge canal as estimated by its friends is 10,000,000 tons a year in each direction. The movement from the Middle West to the seaboard is above 200,000,000 tons in what may now be considered a normal movement. In the further development of western resources production can and should be doubled. The movement to the seaboard can and should largely increase. The barge canal at its utmost capacity can not in any large way meet this situation. Still less does it promise any considerable reduction in rates, while it does not even promise the elimination of terminal costs involved in a transfer upon coastwise movement and a double transfer upon export tonnage.

The second proposal which occurs to everyone is that if a ship channel must be availed of why not enlarge the New York Barge Canal. That is also quickly answered. A ship canal from Lake Erie to the Hudson was long ago dismissed from further consideration. A ship canal from Oswego to the Hudson has been considered and reported on repeatedly and every report for the last 20 years has been adverse. The latest report is found in Document No. 890, House of Representatives, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session. In that report it is shown by the United States Engineers, approved by the Board of Engineers, and confirmed by the Chief of Engineers that the construction of a ship canal from Oswego to the Hudson would be far more costly than the improvement of the St. Lawrence route. And that is obviously true even to a layman, since the canal mileage to be constructed is so much greater than in the St. Lawrence, where natural channels suffice for almost the entire distance. The engineers report that the supply of water at the summit level presents a difficulty which is formidable if not insurmountable. And every objection that may be urged against ship movement through a canal, such as the loss of time in locks, the hazards of lockage to a ship's skin, and the retardation of confined channels, applies with greater force to this project than to the St. Lawrence, simply because the canal mileage is longer and the locks are more numerous. As for the notion that a ship canal could be made by an enlargement of the barge canal, that is directly contradicted by the engineers. Gen. Beach notes that the construction of the barge canal over this route now makes such a project more difficult of execution. The barge canal, the report (H. Doc. No. 890) says, has cost a very large sum, and "this would be practically all lost if a ship channel were constructed along the same route." Upon every consideration we are compelled to conclude that the enlargement or rebuilding of the New York Barge Canal to furnish a ship channel is not practicable, and in this conclusion we are confirmed by all the authorities of the State of New York.

From the report of the deep waterways board in 1900 down to the official report of the engineers for the Governments of the United States and Canada in 1921 all engineering opinion agrees that the St. Lawrence route is the natural outlet, forms the line of least resistance, that the improvement is feasible, and that it can be accomplished at moderate cost.

The official report upon which the recommendations of the International Joint Commission are based was prepared by Col. W. P. Wooten, United States Engineer Corps, for the United States, and Mr. W. A. Bowden, chief engineer of the division of railways and canals, for Canada, under instruction from their Governments to prepare and submit with reference to the St. Lawrence River "plans and estimates for the further improvement to make the same navigable for deep-draft vessels of either the lake or ocean-going type, and to obtain the greatest beneficial use of the waters."

The report filed in July, 1921, is the unanimous recommendation of these engineers. It has had the scrutiny of engineering bodies and of engineers approaching the St. Lawrence problem from other points of view. No criticism directed against the plan finds any fault in it. Other engineers having other purposes would prefer modifications, but they do not point out any fault in the plans. No engineer has discovered any flaw in the calculations. The estimates of quantity have not been called in question at any point. The engineers were proceeding upon certain knowledge of the conditions with which they dealt. The estimates of cost have not been called in question as to their sufficiency. They are liberal estimates. Where $12 a yard was adopted by the engineers as the unit price for concrete, contracts have since been let for concrete work on the new Welland, under similar conditions, at $9.50 a yard. After scrutiny for months, and after a public hearing before the International Joint Commission at which other plans were advocated, the plans of the official engineers were found to be wholly free from error. No other plan has been brought forward that is recognizable as an improvement upon them. The accompanying estimates have not been attacked, either as to quantity or as to unit prices.

The general plan is indicated by natural conditions. The St. Lawrence River flows from Lake Ontario a thousand miles to the Atlantic, but of this distance less than 350 miles is river. The Gulf of St. Lawrence extends as an open sea nearly to Quebec. Of the remaining distance, the river is improved for deep-sea navigation as far as Montreal, leaving 183 miles between Lake Ontario and Montreal as the subject of this project.

Nature has further indicated the plan of improvement by the character of the river bed and the stream. Because the Great Lakes constitute a series of enormous reservoirs, the flow of the river is strikingly uniform, with a seasonal variation of but 25 per cent above and 25 per cent below the mean, compared with a ratio of 30 to 1 between the spring flow and the late summer volume of the Mississippi at Keokuk. The bed of the St. Lawrence is a series of gorges. The river flows through sunken valleys. Except at terraces where there are cataracts or rapids, the river is rather a series of ponds, with depths varying from 40 feet to 40 fathoms.

Between Lake Ontario and Montreal there are three natural divisions. The first division is approximately 113 miles from Lake Ontario to the international boundary, including the level reaches of the river and the Galop and Long Sault Rapids. In the second division is Lake St. Francis, 32 miles long, and the rapids at its foot. The third division is Lake St. Louis, 16 miles long, and Lachine Rapids, immediately above Montreal.

In the first or international section there is a fall of approximately 92 feet, between Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis approximately 82 feet, and between Lake St. Louis and Montreal approximately 46 feet. In the first or international section of the river the engineers proposed to make the improvement by two dams, the first located in a very favorable position at Ogden Island, and the second at Long Sault Rapids, with the incidental power development at Barnhart Island. The Ogden Island Dam will be employed to control the level of Lake Ontario, and, by regulating its outflow, to regulate also the level in the pool immediately below it which will extend to the Long Sault Dam. Each dam will form a pool deep enough and wide enough to give free vessel navigation without any restriction whatever. To afford passage through the Ogden Island Dam there would be one lock. To by-pass the dam and power house of the Long Sault there would be two locks and some 8 miles of canal. Vessels will be hindered in this 113-mile section of the river only by the retardation of three lockages and 8 miles of canal.

Lake St. Francis affords open navigation. For the passage to Lake St. Louis a canal is recommended south of the main river 15 miles long, with two lift locks. The north side of the river may offer a better location, but the necessity of keeping the present canal in service until the new improvements are ready is a governing condition.

The location on the south side of the river, however, is very satisfactory; and this section of canal will not be unduly expensive and will be easily navigable. Land damages will be relatively light. If it is decided to develop the available power in this section of the river at once, this plan would be modified only by reducing the length of canal about one-half. There would still be two lift locks and one guard lock, which would normally stand open.

Lake St. Louis is an open pool in which there will have to be some channels dredged through shoals. From Lake St. Louis to Montreal a canal must be built parallel to the present Lachine Canal, covering a distance of 10 miles, with two lift locks and the usual guard lock.

In the international section of the river the head of water created by the dam will develop 1,464,000 horsepower. The plans are so drawn that the crest of the dam may be raised later, giving a substantial increase in the power development. The engineers recommend that this power be developed by the installation of 59 hydroelectric units of an aggregate capacity of 1,940,000 horsepower. The estimate of 1,464,000 horsepower is the minimum net continuous energy that can be generated, transformed, and put on the switchboard. The engineers were directed to consider the various schemes for improving the river. They found no workable plan for developing navigation in this section of the river in any better or more economical way than by this lock-and-dam method, so that this enormous power development can be made literally as an incident to the improvement of the river for navigation.

In the second division the potential power development offers a minimum net of 1,560,000 horsepower. In the last section there is a potential power of about 1,000,000 horsepower. The estimates made by the official engineers are that this work can be carried out from Lake Ontario to Montreal with minimum channel depths of 25 feet, with 30-foot depths in all permanent construction, and with ample width of artificial channels, for $252,728,200, including installation of turbines and apparatus for delivery of electric power at the switchboard for distribution.

Whenever it is desirable to establish channels with minimum depths of 30 feet, the necessary deepening of channels can be accomplished for $17,986,180.

By these improvements there will be between Lake Ontario and the ocean 33 miles of canal and 7 locks. In the 182 miles to Montreal, 149 miles will be open and practically unrestricted navigation. In the 33 miles of canal, vessels which normally make 10 miles an hour in open water, which is about the speed of the most economical freight carriers, would be restricted to about 5 miles an hour. The retardation of the canal passage would amount to between five and six hours. The delay for lockage will be perhaps three hours more. Experience at Panama and at the Soo Canal shows that one-half hour per lock is ample allowance. The total retardation in the passage of the St. Lawrence River between Lake Ontario and the ocean, due to restricted and confined channels, would therefore amount to no more than, say, nine hours.

Between Lake Ontario and the upper Lakes is the new Welland, which Canada is now building. It is 24½ miles long and will have seven locks. The time of passage of the new Welland, including lockages, is estimated at eight hours—a retardation of five and one-half hours as compared with the same distance in open water—so that between the upper Lakes and the ocean, 2,000 miles of lake and river and gulf, a 10-knot ship would be held back by locks and canals not more than 15 hours.

This engineering report is as a whole and in detail one of the most important and adequate engineering presentations ever made. It deals with a stupendous problem, great in its scope, but in its essential details relatively simple, in the sense that engineering practice with reference to handling such details is well established and no untried methods are proposed or suggested. The greatness of the scheme as a whole lies in its importance to the entire Middle West, embracing as it does more than a third of the area, population, and wealth of our country, all of which will be benefited tremendously by improved and cheapened transportation, and to the northeastern portion of our country, embracing practically all of New York State and New England, which will reap the benefits of ample and cheap hydroelectric power. Indeed, it can confidently be said that the whole country will be greatly benefited because of the added prosperity that will come so directly to these two great and important regions.

The economic benefit of this improvement to the undeveloped West is beyond all calculation. We know that the improvements at the Soo have paid for themselves five times over in a season in the actual freight saving. We can not attempt to calculate what the saving by the proposed St. Lawrence River improvement will be, nor to make any reckoning of the values that will be created and which will be made possible by the improvement.

As a single criterion the average grain production in the area influenced by this lake route is 3,664,000,000 bushels annually. The saving in freight upon the export grain will be, by any reckoning, approximately 10 cents a bushel. The price of the crop is fixed by the price of the surplus. If only half this saving were to attach to the producer, whose price is always the price at market less cost of transportation, the position of American farmers would be improved in the case of grain alone by not less than $180,000,000 a year. To steel production and all fabricated products there are similar gains apparent.

There is more involved than the saving in freight rates. New opportunities will be opened by the new line of communication. It will afford to the manufacturers of the Middle West a road to markets which are now closed to them; it will form an avenue by which they may draw raw materials from all parts of the world which are now inaccessible to them. The benefits can be indicated, but they are beyond reckoning.

The power development is capable of reduction to more precise terms. The potential energy of the St. Lawrence River, to be developed as soon as the market is ready to absorb it, will be 4,100,000 horsepower. This may be translated into an annual output of 26,000,000,000 kilowatt hours at the bus bar, and more than 24,000,000,000 kilowatt hours after transmission to the point of application. This is equal to the energy which can be produced from 24,000,000 tons of coal burned in the most modern steam plant, or 36,000,000 tons burned under the boilers of an average mill. It represents the continuous effort in mining, in transportation, and in handling of over 100,000 human beings.

This figure can be better comprehended when it is compared with the present production of less than 6,000,000,000 kilowatt hours as the total of all the utilities of New England and New York, a total of about one-quarter of the possible output of the St. Lawrence. The superpower survey has pointed out that the requirements of the zone from Washington to Boston will in 1930 only slightly exceed the potential energy of the St. Lawrence. Mr. H. I. Harriman, of Boston, has made a calculation upon the assumption that 25 per cent of the power in the St. Lawrence would be available for sale in New England, which lies wholly within the radius of electric transmission. He finds that there are 1,500 miles of railroad on which electrification would be economical, and that on these 1,500 miles the coal consumption is 4,000,000 tons, or 80 per cent of all railroad coal consumption in New England. Substituting for coal electric energy, which he assumes could be purchased for 1 cent per kilowatt hour, the annual saving would be between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000, which would in a very few years cover the cost of electrification and which would be equivalent to at least 2½ per cent on the bonds, the preferred stock, and the common stock of all the New England roads.

He reckons that the railroads of New England could consume 1,300,000,000 kilowatt hours, the public utilities 2,000,000,000 kilowatt hours, the industries 1,700,000,000 kilowatt hours as at present constituted, and if one-fourth the power of the St. Lawrence were available for New England there would be still a surplus of 1,000,000,000 kilowatt hours for future growth. Similar calculations would, of course, apply in the State of New York; and in the St. Lawrence Valley, hitherto singularly isolated from the tides of material development which have swept past it, there will be created, when this improvement is made, a hive of industry.

The saving by substituting electric energy for coal can be computed with a fair degree of accuracy. The benefit to the railroads of New England, though less definite, is unmistakable. By lightening the load of nonpaying company coal, by equalizing the demand for terminal service, and distributing more equably the peak load, it will greatly simplify their problem. But all such considerations sink into insignificance compared with the larger fact that when the Great Lakes are thus joined to the sea there will be made possible upon an entirely new scale the development of that great rich country stretching from the Allegheny Mountains to the Rockies. New access will be given to the markets of the world from the deep interior, and a new means of communication will be established between both coasts and the great central plain.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement with reference to a matter in which many Senators will be interested.

The bill (S. 3017) authorizing appropriations for the prosecution and maintenance of public works on canals, rivers, and harbors, and for other purposes, is a legislative bill, with reference to river and harbor matters. It does not make any appropriations. It simply makes provision that the Committee on Appropriations may make appropriations for projects which are approved and adopted in this bill. It is framed upon the theory now being followed in the other branch of the Congress, wherein the Rivers and Harbors Committee, as heretofore constituted, and within the jurisdiction heretofore held, has been making appropriations for projects; on the theory now that the appropriations will be made by the Committee on Appropriations, which will have authority to make appropriations only for projects which have been approved by law—in other words, to make appropriations authorized by law, the Committee on Commerce decided to hold hearings on Senate bill 3017. As I said, this bill does not appropriate any money; it does not deal with projects which have heretofore been approved or adopted, and will not deal with them. It does propose to adopt certain new projects.

Senators will probably be interested in projects which they think ought to have consideration, which may not be mentioned in this bill. The committee will start hearings on the bill some time next week, probably Thursday, and I would suggest to Senators who may have projects which they think ought to be adopted, or which are deserving of adoption, that they prepare amendments covering them, offer them in the Senate, and have them referred to the Committee on Commerce, so that when we have the engineers before us they can be asked about those projects, and we may get all the information that may be available with reference to them.

Mr. KING. Is it the purpose of the committee, so far as the Senator can speak for the committee, to inaugurate new projects before projects which are now in process of construction are completed?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the committee decides to report a bill, it will insert a provision in the bill covering some new projects. We are satisfied there are some projects which have never been adopted which are more urgent, really, from a commercial standpoint, than some of those which were adopted many years ago. I think the purpose of the bill will be very clear to the Senator from a reading of it. We propose to adopt new projects, assuming, of course, that a satisfactory showing is made to the committee of the necessity and the urgency of those projects. We also propose the abandonment of quite a large number of projects which have heretofore been adopted.

Mr. KING. I think that very wise, if the Senator will pardon me; but may I inquire of the Senator whether the committee has considered the feasibility and the desirability of inaugurating a different system, namely, having a board created, of a scientific and technical character, to determine what projects should be constructed and then make their recommendations accordingly, and Congress be relieved of the necessity of making anything except a superficial investigation and have the duty only of making appropriations?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The committee will be delighted to consider a suggestion of that kind, and it was really to bring out proposals which Senators might desire to have the committee consider that I am making this suggestion. The committee have not considered the sections of this bill particularly, and they have not given consideration to that proposal, but I would be glad, as chairman of the committee, to have the Senator frame an amendment to the bill embodying the idea he has in mind, and I assure him that it will have careful consideration, because the committee are desirous of getting river and harbor legislation upon a just basis and upon a basis which will commend itself to the people of the country.

Mr. KING. The Senator may recall that upon two occasions heretofore, the first time I think four years ago, I introduced a bill to place our river and harbor development upon an entirely different plane. I introduced a bill providing for the creation of a commission, to be named by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, consisting of technical men, engineers, men of high character, who would make a comprehensive investigation throughout the United States and determine which projects they thought were meritorious. That would prevent the logrolling and the unseemly scramble and waste of appropriations which heretofore have characterized the handling of these matters. We have spent over a billion dollars on rivers and harbors, and we have wasted more than five hundred million.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The committee are trying to get rid of the system the Senator condemns, and during the last few years we have taken some important steps in getting rid of some of the policies which were pursued heretofore, which resulted in the conditions the Senator describes. I hope the Senator will prepare an amendment embodying the idea he has in mind and have it referred to the Committee on Commerce.

I merely rose to call to the attention of Senators that the committee propose to start hearings some time next week, and I wanted to give Senators an opportunity to offer any suggestions which they think the committee ought to consider. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if this bill has yet passed the House?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it has not.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to have one matter cleared up in my own mind, because I am vitally interested in some projects which have suffered for a long time, which I was in hopes we would take care of this year, as well as other projects throughout the country.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Our committee is proceeding on the theory that, by reason of the situation in the House, the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, we assume, will not itself make appropriations for projects. In other words, the only jurisdiction it will have will be to recommend proposed legislation, and then the Committee on Appropriations will make appropriations to carry out that legislation. We think we have equal legislative authority with the House committee, and therefore we do not need to wait for their bill to come over from the House, as we have done heretofore. We have always waited heretofore because the bills carried appropriations, but they will not carry appropriations this year, we assume, so that it is within the legislative power of the Senate and our committee to act without waiting on the House. We have decided that we ought to have legislation with reference to these matters, and we are proposing to act. The bill to which I call attention is merely a suggestive bill, prepared by myself and referred to the committee as a basis for hearings.

Mr. HARRISON. The bill which the Senator has introduced, and which, of course, will be the basis for the committee's work, is based upon recommendations of the War Department?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator that it is based on a letter from the War Department under date of May 5, 1921, in answer to a letter from me as chairman of the committee making inquiry with reference to various projects. The letter has a great deal of valuable information in it.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it a public document?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is not a public document, but the Senator can get a copy of it in the Commerce Committee room. It is a committee print.

Mr. HARRISON. If it is not too long, I was going to suggest that it might be well to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is rather long, it covers eighty-odd pages.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask what was the estimate of the War Department for river and harbor work during the coming year?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know what the War Department estimated, but it came down in the Budget. My recollection is that it was twenty-seven million and odd.

Mr. HARRISON. Was that for maintenance and improvement?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Maintenance, improvement, and so on, and it is for projects already adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. It does not carry any new projects?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it does not.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Bureau of the Budget cut the estimate of the War Department?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That I am not prepared to say. I think they did, very materially. As a matter of fact, I understand that the Bureau of the Budget at first decided to send to Congress an estimate of about $15,000,000, but upon an additional showing made they raised it to about $27,000,000. I think that is much below the Army engineers' estimate upon all the projects.

Mr. HARRISON. The amount the Senator's bill carries is $17,000,000?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand the bill. It merely authorizes every year hereafter an appropriation of not to exceed $17,000,000 for maintenance. In other words, the Appropriations Committee can appropriate whatever amount it deems necessary within that limit. An amendment within that limit would not be out of order on an appropriation bill and could not be excluded on a point of order. This bill is simply an authorization.

Of course, the sum of $17,000,000 is merely tentative. In this letter of the engineers they estimated for the first year or two $12,000,000, and they thought $10,000,000 annually after that would accomplish the purpose, but in subsequent conferences with Gen. Taylor he came to the conclusion that we ought to have at least $17,000,000 to start with. So that amount was put in here as the basis of the investigation the committee will make. We may decide on a less amount and we may decide on more.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice that some projects are not named in the bill. If they are on continuing contracts they would not be designated, I take it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill as we have it here does not deal with any project that has heretofore been adopted by Congress. Those do not need any dealing with; so far as they have been adopted, they are in order for consideration by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Committee on Appropriations appropriates a lump sum it will be up to the War Department to make the allotment to the various projects?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suppose if Congress appropriated a lump sum we would probably leave it to the War Department to make allotments; but that is a question, of course, which will have to be determined.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator thinks if we pass a bill such as this the Appropriations Committee would follow the instructions carried in the legislation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Appropriations Committee could not go beyond this legislation. Of course, Congress can do it, but any Member on the floor of the Senate could make a point of order against any item that was contrary to existing law.

Mr. HARRISON. The thing I am worried about, and I think the Senator agrees with me, is that for the last few years we have not provided a sufficient amount of money to care for these projects. I know the people have suffered in certain sections with which I am familiar and in other sections of which I have heard. I am not worried so much that the committee will appropriate too much, but I fear that they will not appropriate a sufficient sum.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We are proceeding on the theory now that we will not make a direct appropriation in the river and harbor bill, so we will have to work out the amount on an appropriation bill within the limits of the existing law. The bill is framed along the line the Senator has in mind. We have not had a river and harbor bill for seven or eight years and we have had no new projects adopted in that time, but there are some projects that are more pressing than projects we have already adopted in the interest of commerce, and so we are starting out on the theory that we ought to act on some of those projects and get them in a shape where appropriations can be made for them.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator one further question? The Committee on Rules, of which the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is chairman, has under consideration a rule which was proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to confer jurisdiction upon the Committee on Appropriations to make all the appropriations, and so forth. If the Rules Committee should adopt some other procedure—for instance, instead of a committee being appointed to which these bills shall be referred as they come over from the House, providing that they shall go to the Committee on Commerce so that appropriations might be made directly by the Committee on Commerce—that committee would follow the old rule of making appropriations there and not send them to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; if they provide that method.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, under that system I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to this situation: In the first place, the Bureau of the Budget will act. The Bureau of the Budget will report, "We are going to allow $20,000,000 this year for rivers and harbors." When that Budget report comes in then the other body will act. The Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House not having anything to do with it, only the Committee on Appropriations can act, because the Rivers and Harbors Committee has no power to make an appropriation. No committee except the Committee on Appropriations can appropriate the money. The Committee on Appropriations will meet and say, "We will just appropriate a lump sum, the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget, $20,000,000 for rivers and harbors."

The bill will come over here. When it comes here it may be included in a general bill that covers appropriations for the Army, appropriations for the Navy, appropriations for the payment of salaries, and all that sort of thing. We can not very well split up the bill. We have to refer that general bill to a general committee and it naturally would go to the Committee on Appropriations. So the Commerce Committee no longer has anything to do with appropriations for rivers and harbors under that beautiful system.

The Appropriations Committee here will meet and consider what amount of money they will appropriate to take care of the rivers and harbors of the country. They may amend the House bill and specify a different project, and may possibly appropriate for specific projects instead of a lump-sum appropriation, but they will be limited to the $20,000,000 recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. So it will be seen that the Bureau of the Budget has the power to direct Congress, to restrict and restrain Congress in the matter of making appropriations to take care of these public improvements. We can not go beyond the amount recommended by the Budget. When the Committee on Appropriations takes up the item of rivers and harbors they will consider within this limit of $20,000,000 recommended by the Budget Bureau certain items. They can not go beyond that, and they may parcel it out as they see fit to different projects throughout the country, but they are all limited to that Budget amount of $20,000,000. If that system works out, I think we are going to be very much embarrassed by that sort of a situation in handling these public questions.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as I read the bill hastily, because it was not called to my attention until just a moment ago, I assume that the reason for the authorization of an appropriation not to exceed $17,000,000 annually is that we have already lost confidence in the Bureau of the Budget and fear that it may not do the right thing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not clearly hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. POMERENE. I merely made the statement that it seems to me as if the first section of the bill was inspired by the thought that we have already lost confidence in the wisdom of the Budget law or the policy or attitude of the Director of the Budget.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken in that. I understand the Director of the Budget can make only appropriations as authorized by law. He may not recommend all that is authorized by law, but he can not submit estimates to us for projects that we have never adopted. So he can not submit estimates for the maintenance of projects except as Congress authorizes them. Heretofore the amount for maintenance of river and harbor work has always been itemized, so much authorized for this project and so much authorized for that; five thousand dollars for this item, two thousand dollars for that, fifteen hundred dollars for another, and a thousand dollars for another. The Director of the Budget could not estimate any more than those amounts. We thought it more advisable to make a lump sum for maintenance rather than to specify the projects in that way; and that is the policy which, of course, will be up for consideration when the bill comes before the Senate.

The thought suggested by the Senator never occurred to me, I will say to him.

Mr. POMERENE. Assuming that $17,000,000 is the right sum, it seems to me that we ought to go further and assume that the Director of the Budget is going to do the right thing and authorize him accordingly. If not, why should we try to tie his hands by such a proposition?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We are not trying to tie his hands. We are trying to provide what we think is proper for the maintenance of projects without leaving it to the Director of the Budget to make estimates that the law does not authorize.

Mr. POMERENE. Why, then, can we not leave the situation exactly as it is at the present time and have the report of the Director of the Budget? Then, under the terms of the law, we can either accept what he says or we can do something else if we have the necessary votes. It looks to me very much as if the real reason for the proposed legislation is that we are just a little fearful that the Director of the Budget is not going to do for rivers and harbors what we want to have done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to assure the Senator that that never entered the mind of the Senator introducing the bill. It never occurred to me until the Senator suggested it just now.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator does not need to speak to me about his good faith. There is no one for whose honor and integrity I have a higher regard than I have for that of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thank the Senator, but I thought the Senator was suggesting that I had some ill-conceived motive.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no. If the Senator drew that conclusion from what I said, I desire to disabuse his mind. I would not make a statement of that kind. The thought that I wished to leave was that this was susceptible of that construction and that that construction could be placed upon the bill. I would not question the motives of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If there is any way that we can make the bill perfectly clear so as to avoid anything of that kind, we will do it, because it was not intended to do anything of that kind.

MESCALERO INDIANS, NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am called out of the Senate for a few moments, but before I leave I wish to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2022) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] will probably know about it. It is asked for by the department and by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000 for the purpose of promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico, to be expended or distributed in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, under such regulations as he may prescribe; to remain available until used, and to be reimbursed to the United States from the sale of timber on said reservation.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has asked me to make a short statement of the bill. These Indians have property to the value of about $5,000,000. The timber thereon is worth about $4,000,000. Under existing law they may sell the matured, down, and dead timber. The administration has made a contract and has sold $450,000 worth of the timber, to be distributed each year until 1931, I think, running along for some 8 or 10 years. The department wants to advance the $250,000 appropriated by the bill so that they may buy sheep for these Indians. They are sheep-raising Indians, but have no sheep at this time. This plan has been tried on other reservations and it has proven very successful. As the Indians have this amount of timber already sold and the money coming in, the department feels that the Government would be justified in advancing the money and being reimbursed.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ATROCITIES IN ASIA MINOR.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand, morning business has not yet been concluded. Under the head of resolutions I desire to submit a resolution (S. Res. 231) and ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I will read the resolution. It is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that the Government of the United States should, if it enters the proposed international conference at Genoa, request that the agenda for such conference shall include the subject of the political and economic conditions in the Near East and the discussion of measures to secure to racial and religious minorities in Asia Minor the rights and guaranties awarded them by the treaty of Sevres.

Mr. President, every few days we obtain information, which is authentic, from our own representatives in and about Constantinople and from those who are engaged in the Red Cross work, of atrocities committed by the Kemalists. Senators will recall that the nationalist movement, so called, has taken possession of Asia Minor, that Kemal Pasha has organized an army, and that he has back of him perhaps 6,000,000 or 7,000,000 Turks. They have butchered over 300,000 of the Pontian Greeks and other Greeks in Asia Minor within the past five years; they have murdered thousands within the past three months; they have almost exterminated the Armenians, driving the remnants that have not been massacred into bolshevik Russia or down into Cilicia, near the Mediterranean Sea.

I read a report the other day from representatives at Smyrna to the effect that when the French troops were withdrawn from Asia Minor undoubtedly the remnants of the Armenians in the vicinity of Cilicia, perhaps numbering from 50,000 to 100,000, would be butchered.

We sit idly by in the United States, and other Christian nations of Europe do the same, paying no attention whatever to these atrocities. The treaty of Sevres required the protection of racial and religious minorities, including Greeks, Armenians, and Nestorians, and of other races who were within the boundaries of the Turkish Empire. Notwithstanding the treaty of Sevres called for this protection, it has not been accorded; and I regret to see that France has entered into an agreement, which is known as the Angora pact, with Kemal Pasha, which is violative of the terms of the treaty of Sevres, and thus leaves the Christian peoples of Asia Minor to the further depredations and the exterminating orders of the Kemal Pasha government.

In this morning's newspaper I find that in one little town in the northern part of Pontus 300 Greeks were a day or two ago taken out and massacred; a few days ago I saw where 4,000 had been massacred; and another report received less than a month ago stated they had driven out from a large number of towns some 6,000 or 7,000 into the hinterland back of the southern boundary of the Black Sea, where they were decimated by the wild bands of Kurds. More than 1,000,000 Pontian Greeks have been driven from their homes or have been massacred in the past five or six years. At one time there were scores of splendid cities, towns, and villages in Pontus; to-day most of them are in ruins, and their people have been driven from their homes or have been murdered.

In the resolution which I have submitted I have asked that, if we participate in the Genoa conference, we shall insist that a part of the discussion shall be devoted to a consideration of the Sevres treaty. I regret, Mr. President, that the American people and that the American Government have not been aroused to these terrible atrocities. We ought to lift up our voices through the churches, through our civic organizations, and through our political organizations in protest against this wicked, brutal, exterminating policy of Turkey. I think the President of the United States should call the attention of the European nations who signed the Sevres treaty to the obligations which they assumed; and in a resolution which I offered on December 22 last I asked that the Senate express itself in the following manner:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States expresses abhorrence and condemnation of the brutal and ruthless persecution of the Greeks of Pontus by the Government of Kemal Pasha and by Ottoman Turks in Anatolia, and deplores the failure of the European powers to take effective measures to restore and maintain order in Anatolia in conformity to the treaty of Sevres, and to exercise the authority reserved by said powers in that behalf; and the Senate respectfully requests that the President of the United States bring the atrocities in Pontus to the attention of the European powers and the Council of the League of Nation, to the end that adequate and expeditious measures be taken, in accordance with said treaty, to arrest the persecution and extermination of the inhabitants of Pontus who are of the Greek race and religion, and generally to enforce and vindicate the rights accorded racial and religious minorities in Anatolia by the said treaty.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senate of the United States should adopt that resolution, and that, pursuant to that resolution, or upon his own motion, the President of the United States, in a friendly manner, should call the attention of the European powers, particularly Great Britain, France, and Italy, who are represented in the Washington conference, whose delegates are meeting with delegates from this country, to the fact that the United States would look with satisfaction upon the enforcement of the treaty of Sevres and upon the course of Great Britain, France, and Italy if they should stretch forth their hands, as they should do under the Sevres treaty, and prevent the ultimate destruction of the remnants of the Pontian Greeks and Armenians, who are now within the confines of Anatolia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE AGRICULTURAL BLOC.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there have been some criticisms of the "agricultural bloc" on the part of certain eastern Senators. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement from the Dairy Farmer, a magazine published in that section, and also a statement from the Rural New Yorker, as expressive of the views of the farmers in reference to the activities of the so-called "agricultural bloc."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statements will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It is regrettable that any combination is necessary for the purpose of securing justice for so large a percentage of our people as is represented by the farming population, but when a situation exists, as has been the case for a great many years now, even a necessary evil like the bloc system seems commendable. There has always been more or less class legislation and sectional legislation at Washington, and the rule has been that such legislation has not been for the direct benefit of the farmer. The farmers' bloc can not be done away with now without calling direct attention to this fact, and it will be necessary for the Republican Party to make haste slowly and cautiously in getting rid of any system that promises as much justice and service to agriculture as the farmers' bloc does. (The Dairy Farmer, Jan. 15.)

Whatever else you may say, it seems clear that this "agricultural bloc" has learned how to get results. * * * There would have been no progressive farm legislation in this Congress but for this new feature in political life. There is a great outcry from the party managers and politicians, yet for years they have been using their secret power to secure special privilege. At least the open methods of the "bloc" are far superior to the old wire-pulling ways. Aside from any advantage to agriculture, this "bloc" is working out two most desirable things. It is drawing things out into the open, where we can see what is done, and it is breaking up the old sectional hostility between the North and the South. It is the most hopeful plan for bringing the North and the South together that we have ever started in this country. (Rural New Yorker, Jan. 28.)

AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, House bill 2373, and that it be proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of serious illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, one of the greatest movements of modern times for the relief of the agricultural population of this country, and I might say of other countries, is the formation of cooperative marketing associations. In this country it has passed the experimental stage. There are thousands of cooperative associations now operating successfully in this country. On account of the individualistic nature of the farmer's occupation, and the inability to consolidate into great aggregations of capital, the farmer finds himself at a disadvantage, and also, I believe, the consuming public. There is not any doubt whatever that the difference between what the farmer receives for his products and what the consuming public pays is unreasonably great in the case of many if not all of the products grown and marketed to-day, and I believe that one of the means for the alleviation of this condition is marketing associations among the farmers themselves. They have, I think, already had considerable experience, and I believe will develop the ability to handle their own products properly and place them in the markets of the country and the markets of the world.

Mr. President, I do not wish to decry the Sherman Antitrust Act. It came into being as a protest against the great aggregations of capital that were oppressing the country, oppressing their competitors, and unreasonably monopolizing certain avenues of trade and commerce; but the Sherman Act was not intended to prevent and has not prevented reasonable consolidations and combinations of capital and individual energy. The tendency, I am aware, is to force to the highest degree competition. I believe in competition. I believe that healthful competition is the basis of trade; it is the incentive to commerce; but excessive, unreasonable competition does not benefit trade. As time has passed it has become necessary for the States and the Congress to adopt modifications in some degree of the antitrust act to permit reasonable aggregations of capital and reasonable cooperation among producers, manufacturers, and traders; and we have, as I shall show, adopted several measures looking toward that end. I believe that one of the most important measures now before the Congress and the country is the one to encourage and reasonably to protect cooperative marketing associations.

Nearly two years ago, in response to a strong public sentiment, the House passed a cooperative marketing bill. The Senate amended the bill. It was sent to conference, and after a long conference between the two Houses the conferees disagreed. At the next session of Congress the House passed the bill now before the Senate. It came to the Senate, and in July, 1921, the Senate committee reported a substitute for this bill. I desire that the House bill in its main features be adopted, and my argument to-day will be directed to an explanation of that bill and the reasons why I think it should be adopted. I believe that it fully protects the public against unreasonable restraint and monopoly.

The bill to which I refer is Order of Business 246, H. R. 2373, entitled "An act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products." I shall ask the Senate to adopt the measure as passed by the House, with one amendment, which I understand will be offered by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], and to disagree to the Senate substitute on pages 4 and 5 of the bill.

Let me explain what the House bill accomplishes.

The House bill provides that persons engaged in the production of agricultural products may act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce such products of persons so engaged, and that they may have common selling agencies, provided that such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof as such producers and conform to one or both of the following requirements: First, that no member of the association is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein, or, second, that the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent per annum. Certainly these provisions are very restrictive, and the earnings allowed to such cooperative associations are very moderate as compared with the earnings of many commercial and industrial corporations.

Now, I come to the features for the protection of the public in the event that any restraint of trade or monopoly unduly enhances prices, for, after all, the principal object of the Sherman Act is to prevent great organizations of capital and business from getting control of the business of the country and enhancing prices to the damage of the public.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator leaves the subject that he was just discussing, I should like to inquire of him how the value of the capital stock of those who belong to the association is to be determined. Are the farms or the orchards or the sources and instrumentalities of production to be taken into account as the basis of the capital stock of each of the stockholders?

Mr. KELLOGG. Not at all. The farmers do not consolidate their farms or their properties under this bill. The 8 per cent is on the capital of the cooperative association, whatever that may be. In most instances it is very small. It has nothing whatever to do with the property of the farmer. It simply refers to the selling agency.

Mr. KING. That is what I understood; and I wanted to use that question as a premise for this: Then it is clear that the profits to be derived by the organization are not so much the object of consideration but the profits will flow to the farmers because of the enhanced prices of the products of which they dispose.

Mr. KELLOGG. The main object of the cooperative association is to get reasonable prices for the farmer, principally through lessening the cost of marketing and selling his products and cutting down the difference between what the farmer receives and what the public finally pays. That is the main object.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator if it is not true that under paragraph 1, which appears on page 2, the true basis of cooperation is not protected and guarded, in that no member of the association is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein? That is the true cooperative principle, and prevents large capital from controlling the organization.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is the very object of it. It is to make it really a cooperative association. Incorporation is used because of its convenience, instead of having a mere loose, general association unincorporated.

Now, I wish to come to those provisions of the bill which are intended to, and which I think do, adequately protect the purchasing public. The bill provides:

That if the Secretary of Agriculture shall have reason to believe that any such association monopolizes or restrains trade to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced by reason thereof, he shall serve upon such association a complaint stating his charge in that respect, to which complaint shall be attached, or contained therein a notice of hearing, specifying a day—

And so forth.

The bill then provides that the evidence taken before him shall be reduced to writing, and if the Secretary shall be of the opinion "that such association monopolizes or restrains trade to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced thereby, he shall issue and cause to be served upon the association an order reciting the facts found by him, directing such association to cease and desist therefrom." That is, to cease and desist from the undue restraint of trade and the monopoly or any acts which go to enhance the price or to cause the restraint of trade.

Should the association neglect for 30 days to obey the order the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to bring a suit in the United States court, and the United States court has complete jurisdiction "to enter a decree affirming, modifying, or setting aside" the order and enforcing the same, and in order to make sure that the court will have complete jurisdiction, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] has offered an amendment which provides, "or enter such other decree as the court may deem equitable." Therefore, if the Secretary of Agriculture finds any restraint of trade or monopoly and undue enhancing of prices, it is made his duty to have a prompt investigation, the testimony taken by him to be certified to the court in order to expedite the proceeding, and the court is then given complete jurisdiction to do justice in the premises as much as could be done to-day under the Sherman Antitrust Act.

The first question which has arisen is why the Secretary of Agriculture should be named as the officer to find whether the association has unduly enhanced prices. I know of no officer more competent to deal with that question than the Secretary of Agriculture. He has in his department a Bureau of Markets. He keeps track of the cost of production, the cost of selling, and what the public is paying. He has the statistics and he, through his Bureau of Markets, can determine better than any other agency of the Government whether such a cooperative marketing association is really being operated in restraint of trade as a monopoly and is unduly enhancing prices.

The Attorney General has the duty placed upon him to take charge of the suit in the court and to prosecute it, but the Attorney General has not the machinery to study these cooperative associations, to find out the cost of production, the cost of selling, the reasonable prices to the consumers, and various other elements which it is easy for the Secretary of Agriculture to find out.

It may be said, therefore, that before such associations can be prosecuted under the Sherman Act for any restraint of trade or monopoly, whether it is a mere technical monoply or not, the Secretary of Agriculture must investigate and make a finding that the cooperative association is in restraint of trade or is a monopoly and is unduly enhancing prices.

This provides a reasonable protection to the public. The farmers, unlike the great aggregations of capital, can not keep in their employ highly paid lawyers. The officers of these cooperative associations with whom I am personally acquainted are farmers. They are men of experience in their business. They are operating some of these associations with a great deal of ability. But they are unable to keep highly paid counsel to advise them of every step they take, like the great aggregations of capital in other lines of business. They are less experienced in the commercial business of the world than these men who have control of these other aggregations of capital.

Mr. KING. It is intended, then, as I understand the Senator, to make all such organizations absolutely immune from criminal prosecution.

Mr. KELLOGG. They are immune from criminal prosecution, and I think they ought to be. I have never known much to be accomplished by criminal prosecution under the Sherman Act; if anything, very little.

Mr. KING. It denies the right of the Attorney General to initiate proceedings, even though he should believe from uncontrovertible evidence that a monopoly stupendous in character and oppressive in results exists by reason of combinations of the character contemplated.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator understands from the statement I made that the Attorney General can prosecute suits instituted by the Secretary of Agriculture. I wish the Senator would let me go on with my remarks, and when I am through I will be very glad to answer any questions.

One provision of the Senate substitute is as follows:

That the association shall not deal in products of nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled by it for members.

Personally I do not think there is any particular objection to that provision.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In view of the statement of the Senator that nothing has been accomplished by criminal prosecutions under the Sherman Act, I merely desire to say that there have recently been some convictions under that act in the State of New York, and a sentence, which was a very modest one, was rendered ineffective by a speedy pardon, the Senator will remember.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not say nothing had been accomplished; I said very little had been accomplished. I so qualified my remark.

Mr. President, one of the objections to the Sherman law as applied to these cooperative associations is that any district attorney can go into court and get them indicted, and get them indicted upon a state of facts many times which I defy any lawyer to prove constitutes a monopoly. I spent some years in enforcing the Sherman Antitrust Act, and in some cases, after three or four years of litigation, the Supreme Court, by a divided court, held them illegal, and in other cases, by a divided court, held them legal, and the farmer is unable to tell, until he reaches the end of an expensive litigation, whether he is breaking the law or not. In the case of these cooperative associations I think I can demonstrate that there ought to be some supervisory authority perfectly capable of determining whether they are organized and acting for illegal ends or whether they are for the benefit of the country.

I have not the time to go into details, but many of these associations have been prosecuted over the country in cases where I believe there was no foundation for their prosecution, and it is deterring to-day the organization and the effectiveness of many of these perfectly legitimate cooperative associations.

There are many features of the Senate substitute which I think are objectionable, but one of the most objectionable is where it provides that—

Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the creation of or attempt to create a monopoly, or to exempt any association organized hereunder from any proceedings instituted under the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, on account of unfair methods of competition in commerce.

The Senate substitute proposes, therefore, that if there is an attempt to monopolize, or a technical monopoly, whether it has been of benefit to the public or not, if it is a mere technical monopoly, or an attempt to create a monopoly, the association is subject to all the pains and penalties and prosecutions provided for in the Sherman Antitrust Act.

If I had the time I could state a great many cases as to which I would defy the Senator from Montana to pick out five lawyers who would all agree whether they were monopolies or not. In a business carried on by thousands of farmers, with small holdings, with small production, such a condition as that is not conducive to reasonable cooperation in their selling agencies.

Suppose all the farmers of one State, which is very unlikely, should have one agency for the sale of their stock. Would it be a monopoly? Would it be an attempt to create a monopoly which would be void under the Sherman Act, or would the fact that stock may be shipped in from other States render it innocuous and not a monopoly? No one can tell, and perhaps it would end in long litigation, going to the Supreme Court of the United States. The object of the Sherman Act is to protect the public and not to harass business and prevent reasonable cooperation.

This bill does not stand out as an exception, exempting the farmers. Congress and the States have passed many laws changing the Sherman Antitrust Act in some regards.

In 1914 Congress passed an act, approved October 15, 1914, exempting labor, agricultural, and horticultural associations instituted for the purpose of mutual help, from the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act. The section reads as follows:

That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Now, there was a reason for that. I do not know whether that law went too far or not.

So far as the agricultural cooperative associations are concerned, they are limited to voluntary associations without capital stock. It has been found that it is much more convenient to have a nominal capital representing the membership of the farmers in the association. The bill provides that each owner of capital stock shall have but one vote, and that they can not pay over 8 per cent upon the capital.

I am quite aware there has been much criticism of the act in relation to labor unions. I believe that individuals ought to be allowed to cooperate and organize unions. The individual laborer is placed very much in the same disadvantageous position that the farmer is. Of course, if it goes to the extent of a monopoly or undue restraint of trade which is oppressive to the public, either the labor union or the farmers' organization or any other organization ought to be stopped by the legal authorities of the Government.

The only objection to the law as it now stands is, first, as I said, the cooperative association can not have capital stock; second, it must not be operated for profit. Of course, any association or selling agency is operated not necessarily for profit on the stock, which is not large, but for the benefit and ultimate profit of the producer, and, I might add, results in the ultimate profit and benefit to the consumer, so that it is questionable whether that law goes far enough. In fact, it does not. The testimony shows that in many cases such associations have been prosecuted, I do not know whether effectively or not, but it certainly has been harassing to the farmers who undertook to organize reasonable cooperative associations.

In relation to the other proposition, we have passed other laws in degree changing and modifying the Sherman antitrust law, notably the Webb-Pomerene Act, which exempted organizations or corporations and common selling agencies in foreign commerce from the terms of the Sherman law. Why did we do that? We found that the individual manufacturer and merchant was not in a position to place his products in foreign markets without cooperation with other producers and other manufacturers, and that by reason of the very large number of small manufacturers and merchants as well as large manufacturers and merchants the cost of individual action in placing products in foreign markets in competition with other countries of the world was practically prohibitive, so that in the interest of the trade and commerce of this country it was proper to allow them to combine into selling agencies.

Now, the farmer is in very much the same position. He is a small holder of land. His means and his opportunities are not sufficient to allow him to take any steps whatever in placing his products with the ultimate consumer or, usually, with the middleman. He is dependent upon buyers in the various local communities, the wholesaler or retailer, the organization existing everywhere, for the marketing of all his products. He is much in the position of the merchant and manufacturer who wishes to go into foreign countries to compete with the manufacturers and merchants of other countries in the sale of their products.

Mr. President, this principle has been so general and the demand for it is so widespread that it became an issue in the last campaign with both the Republican and Democratic Parties.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply wish to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that we have been constantly amending the antitrust law, and one of the conspicuous instances in which we amended it was in the transportation act of 1920, when we exempted the railroad companies of the country from some of the most stringent features of the antitrust law.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thank the Senator for reminding me of that. That is true. We found, as I believe had become the settled conviction of the people of the country, that unrestricted competition by hundreds and hundreds of railroads was expensive and was not conducive to the public interest, so we authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission and gave that commission plenary power to permit the consolidation of railroads into systems, whether the railroads were parallel and competing or not.

I wish to preserve the principles of the Sherman Act against the oppressive power of wealth and great aggregations of capital or any other organization which may oppress the people. Time has taught us that there may be a competition so destructive of individual enterprise and opportunity and effectiveness as that reasonable coordination and cooperation is necessary,

Because the Sherman Act was passed a great many years ago and has done much good is no reason why, as conditions change and we progress in commerce and production, it should not be changed in some respect.

This question became so generally discussed, so widely considered, that it became an issue in both political parties. In the last Republican convention the platform declared for—

> The right to form cooperative associations for marketing their products and for protecting against discrimination—

Referring to the farmers. The Democratic platform also provided:

> We favor such legislation as will confirm to the primary producers of the Nation the right of selective bargaining and the right of cooperative handling and marketing of the products of the workshop and the farm and such legislation as will facilitate the exportation of our farm products.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the President of the United States in his message to Congress delivered on the 6th day of December, 1921, said, and I wish to read this, as it is a very clear declaration of what the President considered a fulfillment of the obligations of the Republican Party under its platform:

> It is rather shocking to be told, and to have the statement strongly supported, that 9,000,000 bales of cotton, raised on American plantations in a given year, will actually be worth more to the producers than 13,000,000 bales would have been. Equally shocking is the statement that 700,000,000 bushels of wheat, raised by American farmers, would bring them more money than a billion bushels. Yet these are not exaggerated statements. In a world where there are tens of millions who need food and clothing which they can not get, such a condition is sure to indict the social system which makes it possible.
> In the main the remedy lies in distribution and marketing. Every proper encouragement should be given to the cooperative marketing programs. These have proven very helpful to the cooperating communities in Europe. In Russia the cooperative community has become the recognized bulwark of law and order and saved individualism from engulfment in social paralysis. Ultimately they will be accredited with the salvation of the Russian State.
> There is the appeal for this experiment. Why not try it? No one challenges the right of the farmer to a larger share of the consumer's pay for his product; no one disputes that we can not live without the farmer. He is justified in rebelling against the transportation cost. Given a fair return for his labor, he will have less occasion to appeal for financial aid; and given assurance that his labors shall not be in vain, we reassure all the people of a production sufficient to meet our national requirement and guard against disaster.
> The base of the pyramid of civilization which rests upon the soil is shrinking through the drift of population from farm to city. For a generation we have been expressing more or less concern about this tendency. Economists have warned and statesmen have deplored. We thought for a time that modern conveniences and the more intimate contact would halt the movement, but it has gone steadily on. Perhaps only grim necessity will correct it, but we ought to find a less drastic remedy.

Mr. President, how long will 30 or 35 per cent of the population of this country feed the teeming millions of the cities? Only when their labors are reasonably remunerated, only when production upon the farm is possible, only when they are independent, and when they have a hope of bettering themselves. In my opinion, the greatest problem confronting the statesmen of the country is the tendency to drift to the cities, the decline of agriculture, the increase of landlordism and tenancy.

I also wish to call to the attention of the Senate a remarkable speech made by the President at the opening of the farmers' conference, for it is a better argument than I could make. The President said:

> A great manufacturing industry can consolidate under the ownership of a single corporation with a multitude of stockholders a great number of originally separate establishments, and thus effect economies and concentrations and acquire for itself a power in the markets where it must buy and in the markets where it must sell such as have not been made available to agriculture. The farmer is the most individualistic and independent citizen among us. He comes nearest to being self-sufficient, but precisely because of this he has not claimed for himself the right to employ those means of cooperation, coordination, and consolidation which serve so usefully in other industries.
> A score or more of manufacturers consolidate their interests under a corporate organization and attain a great increase of their power in the markets, whether they are buying or selling. The farmer, from the very mode of his life, has been estopped from these effective combinations. Therefore, because he buys and sells as an individual, it is his fate to buy in the dearest and to sell in the cheapest market.

Mr. President, of course, the farmer can not consolidate his land into great holdings or into corporate ownership, and he should not do so. The hope of this Nation, the hope of any nation, the hope of the independence and the prosperity of our people, our very civilization, depends upon the individual ownership and proprietorship of the soil. Destroy that and you destroy the strength of the Nation. What enabled France to go through a war unequaled in its intensity and its horror and its expense? It was because her civilization was founded upon individual ownership and occupation of the soil. The roots of her civilization for centuries have reached down into the soil—the bedrock of permanency and the bedrock of prosperity. The great aggregations of capital in this country undoubtedly are necessary in modern economic life, but the farmer can not create such great aggregations of capital. The law should encourage him in his ownership, in the occupation of his farm, and in the cultivation of his own land, and should encourage him in the one way which it can do—in obtaining better marketing facilities for the products which he raises. I wish to quote one further paragraph from the President's speech:

> Take cooperative marketing. American farmers are asking for, and it should be possible to afford them, ample provision of law under which they may carry on in cooperative fashion those business operations which lend themselves to that method, and which, thus handled, would bring advantage to both the farmer and his consuming public. In countries where these facilities and opportunities have been afforded such cooperative organizations have been carried to the highest usefulness and are recognized as aiding both farmer and consumer. They make the farmer's selling price higher and the consumer's buying price lower.

Mr. President, I believe there are a greater number of cooperative associations in my State than in any other State in the Union, and that the percentage of farm products placed in the markets by the farmers by that method is greater. About a year ago, in the campaign of 1920, a public issue was raised in Minnesota between cooperation and State ownership. An organization known as the Non-Partisan League declared for Government ownership of railroads, public utilities of all kinds, elevators, mills, selling agencies, banks, and many other institutions. The opposite party, the Republican Party, declared against State socialism and in favor of cooperation. No greater issue was ever raised in any State, and it was fought out on the basis of cooperation of the farmers on the one hand and State ownership on the other. Cooperation was indorsed by the voters.

Mr. President, I shall deplore the day when we forsake individual enterprise and energy which must produce and do great things in the world, and resort to State ownership, which paralyzes energy, destroys enterprise, and is expensive to the people and ruinous to progress.

Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss the conditions of agriculture throughout the United States and the necessity for some improvement looking toward their prosperity. Everyone knows those conditions. Why do they exist? Of course, I realize that the great World War raised the prices of farm products, raised the prices of merchandise, raised the prices of labor; that the enormous demand brought these prices away up above anything we had ever seen; but when the end of the war came and readjustment commenced it is admitted by everyone that farm products decreased in price more rapidly and to a greater extent than did any other products.

The Government experts have taken 250 products entering into general commerce and compared the present prices of these products with prewar prices, and it has been found that farm products are far below the average, that the purchasing power of a bushel of wheat or of live stock has been reduced far below the average of the things the farmer has to buy.

The farmer produced his crops of 1919 and of 1920 at high cost, and, in 1920 especially, he sold them at bottom prices. The condition is well known to everybody. Of course, I realize that Congress can not legislate prosperity and that much of the readjustment must come through the natural result of economic forces; but there are some things that we have done and some things that we can do in order to help the farmers of the country.

We can aid in improving his market conditions; we can aid in securing for him more stable and cheaper credits; and I am heartily in favor of doing both. I do not say those are the only things we can do, but they are two outstanding, prominent things that Congress can and should accomplish.

Everyone knows that the difference between the price the farmer receives for his products and the price the consumer pays is, in the case of many articles, exorbitant and unreasonable, and the improvement of market conditions and procuring for the farmer better credits will in the end aid him, with the natural readjustment of economic forces, again to place himself upon a prosperous and firm basis.

I can not go into details, but there are many articles where the price the farmer receives is inordinately low as compared with the price the consumer pays. Take, for instance, the item of milk, which occupied considerable attention at the hands of the subcommittee examining this bill. Ninety thousand farmers tributary to New York received in the month of June, 1921, an average of 4.6 cents a quart for milk, while the city consumer paid 14 cents a quart.

Mr. President, I will not stop to read it to the Senate, but I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD at the end of my remarks a list of some of the principal cooperative associations in my State and what they have accomplished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, in 1920, for instance, 642 cooperative creameries in Minnesota manufactured 91,716,231 pounds of butter, which sold for $52,278,251. The creameries have been organized into cooperative associations for some time; they were about the first branch of the agricultural industry in my State to organize, and they have been less affected by the tremendous decrease in the price of farm products than any other branch of the farming industry, and, though the price of butter was high during the war and after the war, the price to the consumer was lower compared with the price the farmer received than in the case of any other product of which I am aware.

Last summer the live-stock raisers in Minnesota started to organize a live-stock selling agency. We have in Minnesota but one large stockyard. We have in the State several smaller stockyards and packing houses, but the large stockyards and packing houses are situated at South St. Paul. My recollection is that from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000 of live stock is annually marketed there. The ordinary charge of the commission man to the farmer for selling a carload of stock in South St. Paul, with the services attending the sale, was $25 a car. The cooperative association placed all of its products in the South St. Paul market at an average cost of $8.07 a car. That association, of course, does not comprise all the farmers of the State, although it comprises a good many farmers, for I think they handle about 25 or 30 per cent of the stock at the South St. Paul Stockyards. That saving alone justifies their incorporation. But suppose all the farmers of the State joined this cooperative association, I ask Senators would it be legal or would it be a technical monopoly or an attempt to monopolize? Is it not perfectly easy for the Secretary of Agriculture, with his Bureau of Markets, to determine, in the light of the cost of production and in the light of market prices at other stockyards, whether or not their cooperative selling association has unduly enhanced prices?

Take many of the products of the farm, such as potatoes. We raise enormous quantities of potatoes in Minnesota, and formerly when the digging time came before the frost they were dumped on the railroad stations, with inadequate provisions for warehousing and marketing, and the price went down so low that the farmers did not get the cost of production from their sales.

Much has been said about the fruit growers' associations. I can remember, and I think the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] will bear me out, when the fruit growers of California were practically bankrupt. The farmers were not getting the cost of their production. They have organized various fruit growers' associations. They have built their own sorting warehouses. They box and ship their own fruit. They have their own selling agencies. To be sure, the product is retailed through the stores and the machinery which now exists, but the fruit is scientifically handled. It is shipped daily to the markets which will take care of it and sell it in a reasonable way; and I venture to say that not only have those associations brought prosperity to the fruit growers but they have brought cheaper fruit to the people, regularly furnished them throughout the year, than would otherwise have been the case.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The suggestion made a moment ago by the Senator from Minnesota prompts me to ask him this question, which has perplexed me somewhat.

The first two lines of the bill, together with the first word of the third line, read as follows:

> That persons engaged in the production of agricultural products as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, nut or fruit growers—

May act together, and so forth. Are the words "as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, nut or fruit growers" used to exclude all others who may be engaged in the production of agricultural products, or are those words merely descriptive of the general subject?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think they are descriptive of the general subject. I think "farmers" would have covered them all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator does not exactly catch my point. Take the flouring mills of Minneapolis: They are engaged, in a broad sense, in the production of an agricultural product. The packers are engaged, in a broad sense, in the production of an agricultural product. The Senator does not intend by this bill to confer upon them the privileges which the bill grants, I assume?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly not; and I do not think a proper construction of the bill grants them any such privileges. The bill covers farmers, people who produce farm products of all kinds, and out of precaution the descriptive words were added.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They must be persons who produce these things.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; that has always been the understanding.

Mr. CUMMINS. I knew that was the understanding, but I think it is susceptible of doubt as to whether those words are used in the way of exclusion or whether they are used simply as describing—"such as," and so on.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The only thing that occurred to me was whether there was any product not specified there which would be considered as an agricultural product without having the advantage of this law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not suggesting that there ought to be, but I am suggesting that without those words there is no doubt that a producer of meats would be a producer of an agricultural product, or a producer of flour would be a producer of an agricultural product; and I take it that the words "as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, nut or fruit growers" are intended to exclude all other producers of agricultural products.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think, if the Senator will permit me, that flour-mill owners and packers are manufacturers. They are not farmers or producers of the products. They are manufacturers of the products.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. Do I understand the term "farmers" to include gardeners and truck growers?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I supposed that was what was intended, but I wanted to be clear on the point.

Mr. KELLOGG. In fact, I might say that the cooperative association is most helpful and its widest field of operation is in those products which are not sold upon exchanges, and do not have a standard market from day to day, like potatoes and butter and poultry and eggs and many other things, although some of them are sold on exchanges. The fact is that during last year you would pay more for a mutton chop in a New York hotel than a sheep would bring in Colorado, and I guess you do now. The fact is that the price the farmer gets for many of these products is so small compared with what the consumer pays as to be shocking; and the farmers will not raise these products unless the production can be reasonably prosperous.

As I said before, take the fruit crop, the apple crop, the potato crop. It must be harvested at a certain time. It must be stored in warehouses, put in barrels or boxes, and shipped to the great cities where the consuming public reside. You can not dump all the production on the country at once and have the farmer receive a good price. Intelligence must be used in the marketing practices. The product must be shipped at times so that the public will receive it and consume it. How many times have you seen, in days past, the apple crop in New England rotting on the ground, and apples at a high price in the city of New York?

This requires study, experience, and cooperation among the farmers. I do not say that the farmers are going to set up all their local stores and sell at retail everything. They will use, as they have in the great California fruit growers' associations, the marketing facilities already established; but they have their agents who understand the market, know where to ship, when to ship, and what kind of fruit to ship, and they guarantee quality and quantity; and to-day the buyer who buys a box of oranges or a barrel of potatoes knows what he is going to get.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain the meaning of the language on page 4, lines 14 and 15:

> Of the persons so engaged and in processing or preparing such products for so marketing the same.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is in the Senate amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The same language is in the House bill, on line 6 of page 1.

Mr. KELLOGG. The language is:

Persons engaged in the production of agricultural products as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, nut or fruit growers may act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce, such products of persons so engaged.

The object of that, of course, was to confine these privileges to the cooperative associations of farmers who not only produce but prepare their production, like oranges, for the market. The Senate committee suggested an amendment to read:

That the association shall not deal in products of nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled for it by members.

That is in the Senate substitute.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For instance, would "processing" include shelling corn?

Mr. KELLOGG. Undoubtedly, if the farmers' cooperative association did it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would it include grinding the corn into corn meal?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not sure about that. I should think it would.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then would it include grinding wheat into flour?

Mr. KELLOGG. It would not include the manufacture. It includes the processing by the farmers' own association of the product which the farmer himself produces.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator says it would include the shelling of corn and that it would include the grinding of corn into meal. Would it include the grinding of wheat into flour?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not sure about that. That might depend upon how it was done. Certainly it would not include the ordinary miller who manufactures flour. If the Senator will let me proceed I shall finish in a moment.

As I said before, it is not claimed, I believe, by anyone opposing this bill that it is possible for the farmers in this country to monopolize farm products generally. In fact, the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, which reported the substitute for the House bill, said:

Inasmuch as it is utterly impossible to establish a monopoly of any of the ordinary farm products—cereals, cotton, live stock, etc.—an inhibition of monopoly must be unobjectionable to the producers of such.

I agree that it is not possible for the farmers producing the great staple cereals, live stock, cotton, and ordinary farm products to monopolize them so as unduly to raise the prices, but it is rather difficult to convince some district attorneys that there is not a technical monopoly. For instance, why is it that these principal products of the farm can not be monopolized? Take wheat raised upon the western farms. The surplus goes first to feed the people in all of the great cities of the East and West, and then to Europe or Asia. The fact that freight rates are so made as to enable the farmers of the West to compete with the farmers of the East and the South renders a monopoly practically impossible. Again, a difference in time of harvesting, a difference in climatic conditions, the necessity for the farmer to realize promptly upon his crops to pay his help and his farm expenses, makes it exceedingly improbable that he can get into a single organization in the country and hold all his crops for higher prices and force the public to pay them.

It is claimed, however, that there are some products of local production and sale which might be monopolized, and the monopoly become of great danger to the public. For instance, fluid milk, I believe, can only be shipped economically four or five hundred miles. It is claimed that raisins, which I understand are raised principally in two or three counties in California, can be monopolized by the selling associations of farmers in the counties where the fruit is produced. But, Mr. President, because there are a few products of which the committee feel there is danger of monopolization, they propose to hold the sword and the threat of the Sherman Act over all the farming activities of the country, and subject them to unreasonable prosecution and harassments in order to protect the public in a few articles. This bill furnishes ample protection against undue exactions in those articles which it is claimed may be monopolized.

The farmers are not demanding the right to monopolize all the products of the country. They are not demanding excessive prices, and are not getting them. Mr. President, provided there is reasonable competition in the country between them, we permit aggregations of capital equaling 50 per cent of the production of certain articles. They have undoubtedly cheapened the production to some extent, and they are permitted under the law. Why not let the farmers cooperate to a reasonable extent in the marketing and in the sale of their products? Congress is not giving up all its power. Does anyone believe that if the Secretary of Agriculture and the courts would finally hold that under this law all the farmers could monopolize the crops of this country to the detriment of the public the Congress would stand it? Does anybody believe that the Secretary of Agrieulture and the courts together are going to permit any abuse of this power?

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for information; I am not expressing any opinion of my own now. Both the bill as it passed the House and the proposed substitute provide that there may be corporations with or without capital stock. Then each of these bills provides that the associations shall not pay dividends on stock or membership capital, except at 8 per cent per annum.

Of course, I understand, if there is a capital stock, what 8 per cent on that capital stock is; but what is 8 per cent per annum on membership?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will explain that to the Senator. In some of these organizations the stock is called membership stock. For instance, in the Cattle Raisers' Selling Association in Minnesota the stock is called membership stock. It is $3.50 a share, and each farmer must have one share; and in many of these organizations the stock is called membership stock. It is simply intended to give them a vote and membership in the corporation under the laws of the State.

Mr. POMERENE. Then do I understand that in the case of membership stock, where a share is only $3.50, the only return to the farmer would be 8 per cent on that membership, 8 per cent on $3.50?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; that is not the only return he has, because he has the profit naturally incident to better market conditions, the higher prices he gets, and saving expense in marketing, which is the greatest item, of course. That is the main one. I assume that that clause was put in there so that these associations could not become merely corporations to handle farmers' products and not really cooperative asssociations. That was the object of the limitation.

Mr. POMERENE. Let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that there are a hundred members in the corporation, that the membership fee is $3.50, and that the net profits of the corporation for a year are $100,000. How are those profits divided up?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the object of these selling associations is to handle their products at as nearly cost as possible, so far as the handling is concerned. I cited in illustration of that the cooperative marketing associations for live stock. Their capital, I believe, is only six or seven thousand dollars—though I have not the figures before me—and instead of paying $25 a car to the selling associations for handling their live stock they reduced the cost of selling their live stock to $8.07 per car.

Some of the voluntary associations have what is called patronage refund. If they make a greater profit in the rates they fix for handling the products, it is refunded to them as a part of the purchase price of their products on the farm.

Mr. POMERENE. I am trying to understand this bill, if I can. I am in entire sympathy with the proposition that there ought to be a cheapening of the processes of marketing; I have not any doubt about that at all. But with all due respect, I insist that my question has not been answered. If this corporation had $100,000 profit, and there were 100 members, and the membership fee were $3.50, and there were a limitation of 8 per cent on membership, I do not know what the result would be. I do not understand that expression, "membership stock." It is a novel one to me, I repeat, and I would like to know how these profits are to be distributed, if they are to be distributed.

Mr. KELLOGG. They can not be distributed except through dividends or through a practice of paying for the products and refunding any surplus left after the cost of selling as a part of the payment of the purchase price.

Mr. President, I have already taken too much time, and I wish to close my remarks. I do not for a moment advocate any measure which will monopolize or cause the monopolization of one of the great industries of the country. I do not believe this will. I believe the public is amply protected, and I believe that the cost of marketing must be reduced if the farmers are to be prosperous.

It is true that all our industries are going through a period of depression, and there are losses in many, many lines of business; but, Mr. President, lying at the very foundation of all prosperity is the great farming public in this country. Show me any nation where agriculture is declining and I will show you a decadent nation. Show me a nation where the basic industry is agriculture, with individual ownership and with the independence and enterprise which go with such proprietorship, and I will show you a progressive nation. All our industries are founded upon agriculture, and all prosperity is dependent upon it.

As the President said, give them an opportunity to cooperate. Why not do it now?

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. DIAL. I am heartily in sympathy with the object of the bill, and I was going to ask the Senator whether or not in his opinion he thought an amendment should be added along this line, that the President of the United States, when requested by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of Commerce, should be authorized to suspend future trading in agricultural products, when, in his opinion, they were selling, say, at less than 20 per cent of the cost of production. We realize that agriculture in my part of the country suffers greatly on account of dealing in futures on the exchanges. I am not so positive that such an amendment would reach the trouble, but I rather believe that authority should be lodged somewhere to prevent speculation in futures in regard to agricultural products under certain conditions.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think such an amendment would be wise. In the first place, Congress has just passed a bill for the regulation of the exchanges, under which great powers have been given to the Secretary of Agriculture, and I would deem it unwise to adopt such an amendment to this bill. The enactment of laws arbitrarily fixing standards of prices is, in my judgment, very unwise. No law fixing prices ever was or ever will be successful unless behind the law is a Government ready to purchase all the products at the fixed price. I hope the Senator will not offer such an amendment.

APPENDIX.

Farmers in Minnesota are endeavoring to solve their marketing problems through cooperation, and have succeeded to the extent that they have established thousands of local associations and are now engaged in organizing and operating central or State associations. Notable among these associations are the Minnesota Potato Growers' Exchange, Central Cooperative Commission Association, Minnesota Cooperative Creameries Association, Minnesota Cheese Producers' Association, and several other organizations of similar character embracing the membership of a large number of local associations. Cooperative marketing associations in Minnesota have increased remarkably during the past decade. The volume of farm commodities marketed through such associations has assumed very large proportions, as evidenced by the following facts and figures:

In 1920, 642 cooperative creameries in Minnesota manufactured 91,716,231 pounds of butter, which sold for $52,278,251. Of the 830 creameries in the State 77.3 per cent are cooperative. In the same period 69 cooperative cheese factories, representing 79 per cent of all the cheese factories in the State, manufactured cheese, which sold for approximately $1,565,441. In addition to these products cooperative creameries manufactured and sold large quantities of ice cream and other dairy products. The Twin City Milk Producers' Association, comprised of about 3,500 dairymen within a radius of 40 miles of St. Paul and Minneapolis, sold through their own sales agency during 1920 milk and cream to the value of $3,410,943.

During the year ending October 1, 1921, 430 farmers' elevators marketed 47,427,551 bushels of grain and corn. When it is stated that this immense quantity of grain represents the sales of approximately 78,530 farms, the importance of cooperative marketing in Minnesota as related to the interests of the individual producer can be easily understood.

The Minnesota Potato Exchange, a cooperative sales agency comprised of 96 local potato growers' associations, in the few months of its first fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, marketed about 2,700 cars of potatoes and disbursed to its member companies over $2,500,000. Forty similar associations not connected with the exchange operated at the same time, and it is reported that 22.6 per cent of the 1920 crop of 28,025,000 bushels of potatoes were marketed through cooperative associations.

In 1919, 654 cooperative live-stock shipping associations in this State marketed stock valued at approximately $83,000,000. The Central Cooperative Commission Association, of South St. Paul, on November 1, 1921, had a membership representing 267 local shipping associations, the business of which from August 8, 1921, to November 1, 1921, aggregated 2,243 cars, representing a sales value of $2,498,908.

During 1920, 75 per cent of all the wool produced in Minnesota was marketed through pools established by local associations in each county of the State.

In 1919, 161 township mutual fire insurance companies had 195,887 policies in force, covering risks which amounted to $556,800,980. Losses paid during that year amounted to $856,993.50.

There are 1,739 farmers' rural telephone companies in Minnesota and a large number of associations engaged in general store business, lumber yards, and various other enterprises.

The dominating position of Minnesota with respect to the cooperative marketing of farm commodities among all the States of this country is the more clearly indicated as the agricultural records for the year 1921 are announced. The scope of this movement in Minnesota is broader and its acceleration greater than elsewhere. Certain statistics and other items of information relative to the above statements are herewith submitted to indicate this relationship.

Federal reports, made available November 7, 1921, convey the information that during 1919 43.9 per cent of the farms of Minnesota marketed their products through farmers' cooperative organizations. To indicate clearly a significance of this statement, it is necessary to announce what other States have accomplished along similar lines. South Dakota ranks next to Minnesota with 27.1 per cent of her farms so marketing their products. Nebraska comes third with 26.2 per cent; Wisconsin next with 22.6 per cent; North Dakota, 22.4 per cent; California, 21.9 per cent; Michigan, 21.4 per cent; Iowa, 20.3 per cent; New York, 12.2 per cent; and Illinois, 10.5 per cent. All other States drop below 10 per cent, some being as low as less than 1 per cent so marketed. The average of all the States is 7.9 per cent. The west north central group of States has an average of 22, while the east north central group averages 13.3 per cent, and the Pacific States 15 per cent. The New England group averages 2.6 per cent, and the remaining groups rank low.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, on January 27, while the refunding bill, H. R. 8762, was before the Senate, my esteemed colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], took occasion to make certain observations concerning the action of the Senate in declaring that Henry Ford had not been elected a Member of this body and that TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY had been elected a Member of this body and was entitled to his seat, and at the same time expressing the condemnation and disapproval of the Senate of the expenditure of as much as $195,000 in any primary election.

With the language which my distinguished colleague was pleased to use, I have at this time no desire to deal. Villification is not evidence, and vituperation can not be substituted for facts in the Senate of the United States. I can not, however, refrain from calling to the attention of the Senate some of the glaring misstatement of facts which occurred whenever my distinguished colleague left for the moment the realm of vituperative fancy and deigned to give a passing reference to the evidence.

In the first place, there was no caucus, at least on the Republican side of the Chamber, ever held in connection with the Newberry case or any phase of it, and this the Senator, with his great intelligence, either must have known or could have ascertained by mere inquiry.

The action of the Senate was, at least so far as the Republicans were concerned, entirely uninfluenced by any party caucus or conference. What may have been true upon the Democratic side, I do not know. The fact is that not a single Democratic Senator voted to seat Senator NEWBERRY.

My colleague expressly stated that the Senate had voted that—> the acts done by Newberry were of a kind "calculated to endanger the Republic," and then voted to ratify his acts and to seat him in the United States Senate.

The Senate voted no such declaration, but voted precisely the opposite. If the senior Senator from Missouri had been in attendance during the debate or even on the day the vote was taken he might not have made the statement which I have quoted.

There can be no quibbling of words about the action of the Senate that will deceive any intelligent American.

No substitution or rearrangement of phrases can accomplish anything but temporary misinformation.

No smoke cloud of venomous vilification can obscure the clear outstanding facts which bring their own conviction when once an impartial mind or heart will give to them consideration.

The Senate declared to the country—

1. That Henry Ford, who sought, with the aid of the then President of the United States, to run in Michigan as a Democrat on the Democratic ticket at the primary, and at the same time and in the same election to run as a Republican on the Republican ticket, was not elected by the people of Michigan as United States Senator, though Mr. Ford vehemently contested that he was so elected and again and again charged that the ballots were miscounted and that voters were intimidated and bribed and that the result of any recount or examination would prove his right to the seat in the Senate.

Every one of these charges were not only absolutely unproven but were entirely dropped, even by the counsel for the contestant, Mr. Ford, himself, so that one fact that remains absolutely beyond contradiction is that Henry Ford was not elected the Senator from the State of Michigan in the November election of 1918.

2. The Senate declared to the country in effect that when the people of Michigan came to the general election in November, 1918, to determine whom they desired as their representative in the Senate of the United States they approached the decision of that question with a full knowledge of everything that had happened in the primary election in which Henry Ford had been nominated on the Democratic ticket and TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY on the Republican ticket. The people of Michigan had before them all the evidence that $195,000 had been spent in the Newberry primary campaign. This fact was public property. It was published everywhere. It was the main campaign charge which the Democratic Party made in the general election, and the people of Michigan had it told to them over and over again in every conceivable form, and yet with full knowledge of all the facts, so far as Michigan is concerned, the people indicated by substantial majority that NEWBERRY was their choice and not Ford. They realized—

a. That NEWBERRY was a loyal American, serving in the Navy of his country; that he had three stars on his family service flag, and they compared this record with the record of Henry Ford.

b. They knew NEWBERRY was absent from the State of Michigan during the entire campaign, and that all the money spent in connection with his primary campaign was spent entirely by his friends and without his knowledge in their determination to escape the menace of a Ford election and was not the money directly or indirectly of TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY. The Attorney General of the United States, when asked directly before that august tribunal as to whether the money which had been spent in the campaign was the money of NEWBERRY or not, was honest and frank enough to at once reply that it was the money which the friends of NEWBERRY had contributed and was not in any sense the funds of Mr. NEWBERRY himself. The people of Michigan knew the facts were precisely as indicated on the floor of the Senate in the address which was delivered by Senator NEWBERRY himself, in which he said:

> The amount expended was large, more than ought to be necessary to expend in any ordinary campaign. But this was not an ordinary campaign.
> I shall not dwell upon the reason which the committee thought imperatively demanded a campaign of newspaper publicity involving this expenditure of money. I can only say that I regret exceedingly the fact that so large an amount of money was necessarily expended. I can further say that in the acquisition of that money, in the use of that money, I had nothing whatever to do. I knew nothing whatever about it—not even the amount of it.
>
> As God is my witness, I am not to this day and hour conscious of having done in connection with either the primary campaign or the general election of 1918, in the State of Michigan, a single act that was or is in any way unlawful, dishonorable, or corrupt, and this I say to the Senate of the United States, without reservation or qualification.
> Upon these facts, as I then believed them to be, and as I now believe them to be, I shall abide the result with a clear conscience.

The people of Michigan knew the truth about the danger of Henry Ford and the desirability of TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, and that it could not have been known to the 3,668,000 people in Michigan without the widest publicity, and they knew as every other sensible man knew that such publicity required an expenditure of money, and that for this publicity the friends of NEWBERRY had to pay and did pay.

They knew that Ford was getting five times as much publicity as NEWBERRY was getting and without cost to Ford, because of his industrial connections which gave him an inside hold on publicity; they knew that the great cost of the Newberry primary campaign was for publicity and was commendable, and they knew what the Senate of the United States now knows, that there was no corruption or bribery in the expenditure of a single dollar in the campaign.

Theodore Roosevelt, with all the facts of the Michigan primary election before him, wrote on October 22, 1918, a fair statement of the way multitudes of people in Michigan felt.

> Michigan is facing the test, clear cut and without a shadow of a chance for misunderstanding, between patriotism and Americanism on one side, and on the other pacificism and that foolish sham cosmopolitanism, which thinks it clever to deride the American flag and to proclaim that it would as soon be a Hindu or Chinaman as an American.
> If there should be at any time in the future a Hindu Senate, and it should choose in a spirit of cosmopolitanism to admit outsiders, there is no reason why Mr. Ford should not aspire to membership therein; but he would be signally out of place in the American Senate so long as that body is dominated by men who zealously believe in the American ideal and faithfully endeavor to serve the American people.

The Senate of the United States sustained the election of TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, the man whom Michigan had selected.

The Senate believed, as the people of Michigan believed, that Senator NEWBERRY had no part whatever in the acquisition of the money that was used in his primary campaign, or in the use that was made of it. They understood perfectly that it was the result of the efforts of friends in their exceeding anxiety to escape what they believed was the menace of the possibility of the election of Henry Ford to the United States Senate and that the need of publicity in Michigan was so great, the occasion was so unusual, that practically any sum of money honestly spent for publicity in order to inform the people of Michigan as to the true situation was entirely commendable.

The Senate came to the following conclusions:

That there was no doubt whatever about the election of Senator NEWBERRY.

That there was no doubt whatever about the wishes and intention of the people of Michigan.

That there was no connection between Senator NEWBERRY himself and the primary fund, which was used in connection with his nomination, and that therefore he was entitled to the seat for which he had been elected.

The Senate of the United States felt precisely as the majority committee indicated in their report and precisely as Senator NEWBERRY himself, in clear and striking language announced upon the floor of the Senate, as he had previously done on many occasions, and that was to deplore and condemn the use of large amounts of money in a primary election.

The use of large sums of money in primary elections is, as a matter of principle, dangerous to the Republic. There are occasions when the need of money for legitimate purposes is greater in some States than in others, and in some elections than in others, but as a principle the use of very large sums of money in a primary election or in the general election is to be condemned and deplored. No one is foolish enough to overlook the difficulty of laying down any hard and fast rule. It is obviously ridiculous to say, for example, that a man of great wealth, a candidate for office, may purchase the leading newspapers of his State and own them as an investment in his own name or be so related to them as a great industrial advertiser, and thus secure all the personal publicity which he desires without any criticism, because such advertisement is ostensibly free, while his opponent in the election is required to pay for whatever advertisements appear in his behalf, and thus paying for such advertisement is compelled to expend a sum of money larger than ought to be spent in a primary election. There is a rule of reason in connection with campaign expenditures which can not be overlooked. The great controlling fact is that money must not be spent dishonestly or for bribery or for corruption, and there is not a single word of evidence to indicate that there was any bribery or corruption or dishonest expenditure of money in either the primary or general election of Senator NEWBERRY.

To have unseated Senator NEWBERRY would have been a brutal act of injustice so revolting as to shock the conscience even to contemplate it.

I am persuaded that there are few, if any, Senators in this body on either side of the Chamber who do not know in their hearts that Senator NEWBERRY is a Christian gentleman, a man of the highest patriotism and character, and that he told the truth in every word he spoke before this body. I can not believe that even my colleague really thinks of Senator NEWBERRY in the language he used:

> This is a dog with the rabies. Every time he sinks his fangs into the flesh they carry with them deadly disease. Therefore we will turn the dog loose on the community.
> This is a deadly leprosy that introduced into the body politic will destroy the virtue of the Nation. Therefore we will introduce it in the Senate.
>
> This office was sold for money. Therefore he who bought it shall be confirmed in his title.
> The thing is crimson in its crime and reeking rotten in all its parts. Therefore its originator and beneficiary shall be seated in the Senate Chamber to vote on bills concerning the welfare of the States.

Such language, when read in the cool light of reason, carries with it its own refutation. However vicious or extensive may be a propaganda to destroy the character of an honest man, right and justice sooner or later in this Republic will prevail. They prevailed with the people of Michigan when with the full knowledge of all the facts they triumphantly vindicated Senator NEWBERRY at the election. They prevailed in the courts of the land when the Supreme Court of the United States announced opinions, different as to their reasons, but unanimous as to their result, to the effect that the trial which convicted Senator NEWBERRY in Michigan was unwarranted in law, and that his conviction was not only based upon an unconstitutional law, but that even in the interpretation of that law by the trial judge justice had been so outraged that the verdict could not be allowed to stand.

They prevailed in the Senate of the United States when after a full investigation and protracted debate the Senate in no uncertain language declared not alone that Senator NEWBERRY had been elected by the people of Michigan to represent that State in this body, but that he was himself entitled to retain his seat, and no amount of unfounded generalities, of unsupported charges, or of bitter vindictive language can ever change this trinity of complete vindication which has been given to Senator NEWBERRY by the people of his State, by the courts of the land, and by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is a very interesting apology and post-mortem examination. I want to give it a few moments' attention. As was suggested by the Senator a moment ago, it seems like a motion for a rehearing filed in a bad case by an attorney who is ashamed of his part in the transaction.

I do not intend to review the evidence in the Newberry case, because I have a written confession signed and sealed by the majority party, and conspicuous among the names of those appearing as signers to the document is the distinguished name of my eminent colleague from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. I say it is signed. Technically that is not correct. It was a resolution solemnly introduced in the Senate, spread upon the records, advocated by the junior Senator from Missouri, and voted for by a majority of the Senate. I do not intend to go outside of that resolution for my facts, and I do not intend that those who adopted it shall escape its consequences.

A man can not stand at the bar and plead guilty and not guilty in the same breath; he can not condemn an act as an act of infamy and wrong and then justify it. In such an attempt he stands before the public condemned by his own act.

What is the resolution that was adopted after the protracted debate and the long investigation? It reads:

Resolved, (1) That the contest of Henry Ford against Truman H. Newberry be, and it is hereby, dismissed.

(2) That Truman H. Newberry is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1919, and is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States.

(3) That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

Any man who can vote for that declaration and in the same breath seek to justify the beneficiary of the act thus condemned is possessed of an amount of "nerve" that would do credit to a first-class orthodox devil.

What is the answer? The answer is that Michigan ratified and confirmed the crime. Michigan ratified it; but those who seated NEWBERRY condemned it. They could not plead the ratification as a justification and in the same breath condemn the act as utterly defenseless.

If this act—and I employ the language of the resolution—was "contrary to sound public policy," if it was "harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate," if it was "dangerous to the perpetuity of free government," then no ratification could justify it. If all the politicians on earth were to ratify it, they could not purge it of its crime or wash it of its stain. The Senator has voted that it was an act "contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government." Then he has the cool effrontery to stand on the floor of this Chamber and say that the ratification by the people of Michigan is a justification for that which he has himself condemned in as strong language as can be penned.

How did the people of Michigan ratify it? My understanding is that Mr. NEWBERRY squeezed through by about 4,000 plurality and that the other men running on the ticket with him came through with something like 150,000 plurality. That is not a ratification; it is a condemnation. When 146,000 men will repudiate the nominee of their party in a hot political campaign it is a condemnation in itself. If there had been a unanimous vote in Michigan, then either Michigan was right, and its unanimous vote proved it was right, and NEWBERRY'S election was purged of all offense, or else the vote amounted to nothing. But if one takes the view that Michigan was right, and that its vote purged NEWBERRY and cleansed his election, then this resolution as adopted was an act of infamy, for it specifically condemns that which the Senator says has been through the fires of purification.

Again, the Senator tells us that NEWBERRY was absent and did not know what was being done.

A man can not be absent in the sense that he escapes criticism or responsibility when he employs agents who are present and accepts in toto the benefit of their acts. A man can not arrange for a campaign committee to manage his campaign, finance the campaign from the coffers of members of his own family, turn loose a thousand agents and agencies in his State to work in his interest, accept the fruits of their work, and then deny his responsibility. There was only one course open for Mr. NEWBERRY. If this money was wrongfully expended, as says the resolution; if it was contrary to the dignity of the Senate, as says the resolution; if it was dangerous to the perpetuity of free government, as says the resolution, there was only one course open for Mr. NEWBERRY if he did not know of the conduct of those who managed his campaign, and that was to say: "This election was harmful to the dignity of the Senate, it was dangerous to the perpetuity of free government, and therefore I will not accept the result. I will repudiate the acts of those who expended this money, and when I repudiate their acts in expending the money I will repudiate the benefit of those acts."

He did not choose that course, however. A man might just as well say that he is the receiver of stolen goods; that he did not know they were stolen, but that, although they were stolen, he will keep them, and hope to stand acquit before the bar of American conscience, as for NEWBERRY to receive this election which your own resolution condemns, keep his office, and at the same time seek to escape the responsibility of the acts of the men who put him in office.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] states—and I quote his language—

To have unseated NEWBERRY would have been a brutal act, which would shock the conscience.

To have unseated a man whose election was accomplished by means which the Senator declares were "harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of free government," would be a brutal act! What is this office in the Senate? It is not the property of the man who happens to be elected. He does not own this office. He is a mere agent, selected by the people of a State; and if in the selection there be fraud or corrupt practices or acts which shock the conscience then he has no title to his office. Fraud voids everything, and crime destroys every title. If, therefore, this election was tainted, as the resolution declares it to be tainted, how can any man say that it is a brutal act to undo that wrong, to deny that wrong fruition, to deny that fraud a consummation, by a ratification in this body?

Again, the Senator says that this election was held according to "the American ideal"!

Is it the American ideal that elections shall be held in which—I quote from the resolution—the amount expended is too large, "much larger than ought to have been expended"?

Is it the American ideal that the expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, is sound public policy? The resolution recites that it is contrary to sound public policy.

Is it the American ideal that we shall have elections harmful to "the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of free government"? Is that the American ideal? If that is the Senator's conception of the American ideal, then I should like to have him tell me what sort of an ideal exists in the brain and heart of Satan himself.

If you had said of the arch fiend that his ideal was and is that elections should be held in such manner as to be "dangerous to the perpetuity of free government," I could understand how that sort of an ideal might be ascribed to the devil himself. But I can not understand how any man could so defame the name of America, and could so abuse the word "ideal," as to say that this election, thus condemned in the language of the resolution, is in accordance with the "American ideal."

I have thought that the American ideal was pure; that no matter how, in practical life, we might err or step aside, the great ideal of our Nation was a thing as resplendent as the sun, as pure as the unspotted snow, as clean as the soul of a babe; that it aspired to great and noble things; that it desired to perpetuate and keep forever sweet the fountains of our public life; that it involved even the element of sacrifice for others; that the American ideal pointed always with the finger of an angel to higher planes, to nobler aspirations, to greater achievements. But we are told now by the Senator from Missouri that the American ideal is corrupt and rotten elections; that elections which are so corrupt and rotten that they are a menace to the State and to the perpetuity of free government are "the American ideal."

Let the Senator picture his own ideal. I prefer another. My opinion is that this is the Senator's ideal—an ideal born of a partisanship that justifies everything if it only will bring votes to a party. Oh, yes; I am justified in saying that. He says that "the rule of reason" must apply; that Ford had money, Ford advertised in newspapers, and hence, applying the rule of reason to the case in hand, it was entirely right and justifiable to expend this money. Let us see where that will land us.

This, first, was not a question of seating Mr. Ford if Mr. NEWBERRY was unseated. The plea, therefore, is bad, for it is unfounded in fact. The resolution offered from this side of the Chamber declared that Henry Ford had not been elected. If there was anything in the statement made by the Senator as to Ford's money or his influence it would avail him nothing. Nobody here proposed to seat Henry Ford, for the very good reason that he did not have a plurality of votes. But, second, as I understand the Senator's language, "the rule of reason" is that while the expenditure of money is bad, while corruption is an evil thing, the rule of reason will permit it to be employed if it is done in behalf of a Republican candidate.

The Senator said there was reason for this great expenditure, that they had to beat Henry Ford, and because they had to beat Henry Ford, therefore, applying "the rule of reason"—and now I quote the Senator's language—"the expenditure of practically any sum of money was commendable." That is to say, the Senator does not like Henry Ford, he does not approve of Henry Ford, and when he does not approve of a man, then "the expenditure of practically any sum of money whatsoever is commendable"—quoting his language.

Then why did you not say so in your resolution? If the expenditure of practically any sum of money was commendable, why in the name of common sense did you not say so in your resolution instead of saying that "whether the amount expended in the primary was $195,000 or more, the amount expended was in either case much larger than ought to have been expended"?

The Senator tells us that the expenditure of almost any sum would have been justifiable, and then tells us in his resolution as adopted that the expenditure of $195,000 was "harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate and dangerous to the perpetuity of free government."

Can absurdity go further than that? Can the lack of logic be better proven than by the mere contrast of these two statements?

Again, we are told that Mr. NEWBERRY is a "Christian gentleman." Mr. President, I do not know anything about the religion of Mr. NEWBERRY. But when I find those who make great professions of Christianity saying upon the floor of the Senate that the expenditure of almost any sum of money would have been justifiable; when I find that only a day or two ago they voted that the expenditure of $195,000 was an offense to the Senate and was dangerous to the Republic, I wonder how many times gentlemen of that kind will have to ask forgiveness for abusing the words "Christian gentleman."

I think, if I know anything about the tenets of the Christian religion, it commands men to be honest; it commands men to be just.

It is written, "Thou shalt not steal," and every line of it, from the Ten Commandments and the Divine Sermon on the Mount down to the last word of the Revelation, commands that all men, at all times, and in all places, shall observe the rules or rectitude and honor, and that they shall not be guilty of conduct that is "dangerous to the perpetuity of free government."

Which one of the Ten Commandments recites, "Thou shalt do acts contrary to the perpetuity of free government"? What one of the Apostles has ever declared that a man, in seeking public office, should do acts calculated to destroy the fabric of the greatest Government ever erected by the hands of man, under the providence and guidance of God? What part of the shorter catechism recites that a man may get office by means destructive to the State? Who has written this infamous thing into the creed of Christianity, before the Senator from Missouri introduced it a few moments ago?

But the Senator says the court decisions, the vote of the people of Michigan, and the vote of the Senate, constitute a trinity of vindication. That is the first time the name of the Holy Trinity was every employed for such a purpose. Let us examine this trinity a moment. A learned trial judge and a jury of 12 men brought in a verdict of guilty. A supreme court did not say the acts of the defendants were justifiable; it did not say that NEWBERRY and his cohorts were good and pure men. The Supreme Court of the United States did say that Congress, under the Constitution, did not possess the authority to limit the expenses in a primary election. Through that crack in the fence these gentlemen all escaped. But there was written by no jurist, there was declared by no jury, "These men go forth with our commendation."

The third act in this trinity of vindication to which the Senator refers was the vote in this body, when every Democratic Senator voted against Mr. NEWBERRY and condemned his acts, and when nine Republican Senators voted likewise. The rest of them, with the exception of my distinguished and eloquent colleague from the State of Missouri, as they voted held their noses. Some of them were only induced to vote because they were permitted to put in a resolution condemning the election and its practices, although they took the fruits of the criminal conduct of which Mr. NEWBERRY was the immediate beneficiary.

Mr. President, I am obliged to leave the Chamber, because I have arranged to leave the city, and must go in a few moments, so I shall not have the benefit of hearing the replies, if replies are made, to what I have said. But it is just as well that they shall be preserved in the archives, and when I get back we can try the Newberry case all over, if my friends wish it.

I thank the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize associations of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I listened with very great interest this afternoon to the able and exhaustive discussion of the cooperative marketing bill by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. No one in this body or out of it, I think, has shown as great an interest in the cooperative movement and in the legislation which is being sought, no one is better informed on the cooperative idea, and no one better prepared to discuss it in all its phases, and especially to discuss the legal questions involved, than the junior Senator from Minnesota.

The Senator from Minnesota quoted the public utterances of President Harding in support of the cooperative legislation. I am very glad to say that the friends of cooperation everywhere recognize and appreciate the great help the President has been to the cooperative movement. I want particularly to call attention to the resolution which was adopted at the agricultural conference in this city last week; and let me say that I believe that it was the most representative agricultural meeting which has ever been held in Washington. The resolution on this subject adopted by that conference reads as follows:

Resolution on cooperative marketing passed by agricultural conference.

We further urge that Congress promptly enact affirmative legislation which will permit farmers to act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, for purposes connected with the production, processing, preparing for market, handling and marketing in interstate commerce such products of persons so engaged with specific statements of their rights, powers, remedies, and limitations; and which will permit such associations to have marketing agencies in common and to make such contracts and agreements as are necessary to effect such purposes.

Any and all doubts as to the legal rights of farmers to market their products through cooperative associations of their own formation and under their own control should be swept away by clear-cut national legislation.

The Senate of the United States is hereby requested and urged to pass the Capper-Volstead cooperative marketing bill in substantially the same text as it passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, the cooperative marketing bill as it was offered in both the Senate and House seeks simply to make definite the law relating to cooperative associations of farmers and to establish a basis on which these organizations may be legally formed. Its purpose is to give to the farmer the same right to bargain collectively that is already enjoyed by corporations. The bill is designed to make affirmative and unquestioned the right which already is generally admitted, but which, in view of the Sherman law, is subject to nullifying interpretation by those whose interests are not identical with those of the farmer, and who for one reason or another may be in a position to obtain an interpretation advantageous to themselves and embarrassing or detrimental to the members of cooperative organizations.

The original bill—

(a) Authorizes and validates cooperative associations of producers regardless of technical form, limited only by certain test requirements as to cooperative character.

(b) Permits them to develop their activities to a natural extent, which involves a tendency toward great commodity organizations.

(c) Safeguards the public against any possible abuse by such cooperative marketing associations by appeal to and action by the Department of Agriculture.

The amendment offered by Senator WALSH of Montana for the Judiciary Committee strikes out practically all of the original bill and substitutes therefor a declaration with no regulatory features, but with direct prohibition of monopolies and direct privilege of handling the products of outsiders and direct inclusion of the terms of the Federal Trade Commission act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rise to correct the statement the Senator just made. Evidently his statement is an inadvertence. The amendment does not strike out substantially the whole bill as passed by the House. It leaves intact section 1, authorizing the organization of these cooperative marketing associations under exactly the terms and conditions described in the bill as passed by the House. It simply strikes out section 2, which gave to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to exercise some supervisory control over these organizations with the additional provisions to which the Senator has adverted.

Mr. CAPPER. I shall discuss that phase of it a little later.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desired to correct the statement made by the Senator to the effect that the bill as reported by the committee strikes out the text of the House bill and substitutes something else. The substance of the House bill authorizing the cooperative marketing association is left intact.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I hope the substitute offered by the Committee on the Judiciary will not be agreed to. Whatever differences of opinion there may be as to the merits of the proposed legislation Congress should not say to the farmers, as it does in section 1, "You may combine to market your products," and then by proviso say, "You must not combine," which would be the effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

It is evident, Mr. President, that this proviso nullifies the act, as no association can efficiently operate that does not control and handle a substantial part of a given commodity in the locality where it operates. Middlemen allege that farmers in selling their products individually are competitors with each other, and that by combining into associations to market collectively such competition is eliminated and the farmers thereby undertake to form a monopoly. Though it is conceded that the inevitable effect of cooperative marketing is to lessen competition between farmers, it nevertheless remains that farmers must market collectively or, in the most correct sense, they can not market at all, but must usually turn over their products to a noncompetitive buyer who operates the only elevator or milk station accessible to the farmers in that locality.

Middlemen who buy farm products act collectively as stockholders in corporations owning the business and through their representatives buy of farmers, and if farmers must continue to sell individually to these large aggregations of men who control the avenues and agencies through and by which farm products reach the consuming market, then farmers must for all time remain at the mercy of the buyers. In so doing they are not in the most accurate sense marketing their products at all, but are forced by conditions to turn over such marketing to powerful associations of middlemen.

With the legal status of their organizations clearly defined, Mr. President, farmers can do something to cut down the spread between the prices they now receive and those paid by consumers. Even though the farmers should keep all of this saving it will stimulate production, thus insuring more adequate supply of necessities. The consumer is not interested so much as to who shall distribute farm products—that is, whether it is the farmers themselves or middlemen—as they are in the prices they must pay.

The bill as it passed the House, and which I hope will have the approval of the Senate, gives to consumers a protection which they do not now have as against middlemen, in that if such farmers' marketing associations unduly enhance prices a complete and adequate remedy is provided in section 2. If such associations unduly enhance prices, the Secretary of Agriculture may order them to cease and desist from monopolizing and restraining trade and commerce. This provision of section 2 is taken from the Federal Trade Commission act, and the Secretary of Agriculture can, as the Federal Trade Commission has repeatedly done, issue orders to cease and desist from specific acts. But if the bill is enacted into law in the form reported by the committee it will be a trap for the farmers and in no sense a measure of relief.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask it for information. The bill as it passed the House provides for the incorporation of associations either with or without stock. The Senator is now speaking of profits. The last paragraph of section 1 reads:

> That the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent per annum.

Of course, I understand that there is capital stock, and I understand what 8 per cent dividend on the capital stock is; but what is an 8 per cent dividend on membership capital? What does that mean?

Mr. CAPPER. On the stock held by the members.

Mr. POMERENE. But if there is no stock; if there is simply a membership in the corporation?

Mr. CAPPER. Each stockholder owns one share of stock.

Mr. POMERENE. What is that share worth?

Mr. CAPPER. It might be worth $100, or it might be worth less.

Mr. POMERENE. How is that determined? Take the case to which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] referred. He said that memberships were sold in some of these cooperative associations at $3.50 a share. In a case of that kind am I to understand the only dividend to which the member would be entitled would be on the monetary value of that share, namely, $3.50? It seems to me that part of the bill is confusion worse confounded. I do not understand it at all. It may be because I am dull of comprehension, but I am eager for information on the subject.

Mr. CAPPER. Did the Senator from Ohio hear the discussion of that question by the Senator from Minnesota? I think the Senator from Minnesota covered it very fully and covered it better than I could.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator from Kansas understands the explanation of the Senator from Minnesota, I wish he would explain it to me, because I do not understand it.

Mr. CAPPER. I can not put it any clearer than did the Senator from Minnesota. To me now it is entirely clear.

Mr. President, the farm organizations of the country, without exception, believe that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana would not only prevent the development of farmers' cooperative marketing associations along commodity lines, but it would actually cause the destruction of certain great cooperations which have saved their respective industries from destruction.

I have a letter from Aaron Sapiro, one of the ablest authorities in the United States on cooperative marketing, and legal counsel of more than 50 cooperative associations, including growers of wheat, corn, cotton, rice, wool, fruit, and potatoes, in which he says:

> The Walsh amendment to the Capper-Volstead bill will not give to the growers of the United States any important single thing which they do not have now in their rights, and will do definite harm to cooperation. It will make it impossible for the growers of the country to achieve the development they must have, the development promised to them by both political parties and public utterances of the President of the United States. The Walsh amendment would be a dangerous step backward and the farmers' organizations would rather see no legislation at all than such an act.

The Capper-Volstead bill, so called, was designed simply to give to the growers or the farmers the same opportunity for successful organization and distribution of their products that the great corporations of America have enjoyed for many years. More and more it has become evident that the growers must have an opportunity to merchandise their products in an orderly way, instead of being compelled to dump them on a glutted market at prices below cost of production.

Mr. President, every statesman looks forward to a condition as ideal when the whole country will be dotted with small farms, each operated by its owner. Every statesman deplores the spread of tenantry and insists that best citizenship can be developed only upon the individual system of farm production. Because of this peculiar characteristic of agriculture, the growers have never been able to adopt a corporate form of organization; they have, therefore, gradually fitted into the cooperative form of organization, which maintains individuality of production but enables them to unite for marketing purposes.

Marketing is always a group problem. No man can intelligently distribute his product without knowing what the markets will absorb; the amount of that particular commodity grown in this and other countries; competition of other commodities of similar use or character; conditions of transportation; possibilities of storage and credits.

Individual growers can not begin to handle marketing problems on an intelligent basis, because these problems are essentially group problems. The individual farmer has no more chance of selling his production fairly and intelligently over a longer period of time than has the individual shoemaker in a great shoe factory of selling his particular share of manufactured product distinct and separate from the whole of the products of his fellow workmen. Therefore the cooperative marketing associations have developed along commodity lines and tend to dominate their respective lines of industries.

The producer of food under the present system is compelled to see his products go on the market subject to the whims of speculators and gamblers. He knows from long experience that to function the speculator buys as low as he can force prices down, buys to the extent of his resources or the resources banks will lend him, and exerts a powerful control over the food supply of the Nation between the time it leaves the hands of the producer until it reaches the consumer, at greatly inflated prices, utterly unjustified by the actual cost of their physical distribution.

From the other side, the consumer sees the farmer receiving low prices for his products—corn, pork, cattle, wheat, potatoes, and cotton—and he turns to the sources from which he obtains these products. But he never buys them on the basis of what the farmer receives. In between, in addition to the reasonable compensation he is willing that the man who actually handles the products should receive, there is a wide margin representing the rake-off of the speculative middlemen.

Mr. President, this annual tribute, gouged from the pockets of citizens already struggling with the problems of living and squeezed from commodities necessary to their existence, is a national outrage—an evil that demands correction and that must be corrected.

It has been in foodstuffs and the raw material of which apparel is made, products coming from the farm, that the speculator has reveled, buying low, selling as high as the market could be forced by manipulation, collecting his tribute from both the farmer and the consumer. The result has been and is that the producer is being forced to sell his products for less than the cost of producing them, and the consumer is compelled to pay for these same products an excessive price, dictated solely by the greed of speculative parasites.

At present there is no recourse. The farmer is in a large measure helpless. He knows that as an individual he is handicapped, and, due to the ambiguity of Federal laws, he fears he will lay himself open to persecution by interests opposing him if he seeks to act collectively through cooperative organizations. While it seems evident that Congress intends that the farmer shall not be prosecuted for acting collectively in the marketing of his product, yet the Federal law is such that these prosecutions may be threatened or actually brought against him. The farmer does not relish the possibility of being prosecuted for an alleged violation of law, even though he feels fairly certain that he would not be convicted.

Mr. President, the farmers do not ask any privilege or special favor. They simply request an opportunity to adopt the system of group marketing which the law has made inevitable with ordinary industries for many decades.

Some economists have maintained that this might permit a possibility of abuse and create a monopoly. But a farmers' monopoly is impossible. If the cooperative marketing association makes its price too high, the result is inevitable self-destruction by overproduction in the following years. No other industry except agriculture has this automatic safeguard. With corporation activities the group producers, such as the United States Steel Corporation, can reduce the quantity of steel rails it will produce at any given time or completely close down its mills and reduce the supply. Therefore the possibilities of abuse by monopoly and by monopoly prices exist with ordinary industries but are safeguarded automatically in agricultural organizations. Nevertheless the Capper-Volstead Act as it passed the House contains specific provisions permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to discipline any cooperative marketing asssociation which might set unduly high prices on its product. If it does not desist, then under the provisions of this law the courts can bring it to time promptly or put it out of business.

Mr. President, I believe the public wants the grower to have an opportunity to make a fair return on his investment and labor and to maintain a decent standard of living. The public surely wants to stop the constantly increasing movement from the farm to the city. The public surely wants the food supply of this country made certain and permanent. At the same time the public wants to be certain that if it permits the growers to form these great cooperative marketing associations to bring them increased returns and give them an opportunity for profit, this power will not be used against the interest of the public as consumers.

I say this fear is completely satisfied by the provision in the proposed act which permits a review of the prices to be fixed by cooperative marketing associations. The representatives of the farmers have accepted this provision, although it is the one case on record where any American industry, not a public utility, has deliberately consented to have a public official state when the price of its products is too high, and to discipline it for exercise of its price-fixing power. The bill as it passed the House will absolutely satisfy the desires of the farmer in cooperative marketing and will at the same time safeguard the consuming public from the danger which some economists fear.

Mr. President, cooperative marketing by farmers is not theory. It has proved successful despite handicaps wherever it has been attempted. The various citrus fruit growers' associations in California have been a boon to the producers. They have eliminated, to a large extent, the speculator, but they have not injured the legitimate middlemen who perform a necessary service in the process of distribution, and no one wants to eliminate him or deprive him of a fair profit. They have brought greater returns to the producer, while the consumer has not been asked to pay more.

There is a nation-wide demand for greater efficiency all along the line. Cooperation will apply that efficiency to the marketing of farm produce because it will prevent loss to the average farmer through more equitable marketing. It will cut costs of production and risk and reduce the spread between the consumer and the producer. Thus it will give farm products to the consumer cheaper and at the same time yield larger returns to the man who produces by eliminating much of the excessive cost of distribution under the present system in which speculation plays so dominant a part. Furthermore, participation by farmers in the marketing of farm products through cooperative associations, giving them the right to bargain collectively with buyers, will result in stabilizing the market, preventing waste, and, as I have said, bring about more efficient distribution.

Mr. President, for years evidence has been piling up to convince us that we have the most expensive marketing system in the world, also the most inefficient, if we except China. The need of practical legislation to correct this evil, and more particularly the clear legal establishment of the farmer's right to market his products cooperatively, grows daily more imperative and urgent. To-day there is no legislation the enactment of which would accomplish greater good for this Nation.

We can never again become a truly contented, normal, and prosperous people except through bettering the condition of American agriculture. The situation to-day is critical. It is dangerous. American agriculture has never reached so low an ebb as it has to-day.

In an organized world of business and industry we must put our $80,000,000,000 farming industry on an equal footing and a permanent basis or be prepared to see it die through economic inanition and suffer more and more disastrously from evil times when we should be enjoying good times. The more promptly we do this the sooner we shall again enjoy the prosperity which should be ours.

Agriculture is this Nation's life preserver, its "meal ticket." Agriculture is, and always has been, the basic industry of every nation and every civilization. Only through its oppression or neglect have nations become decadent, then moribund. If there is anything more important to national welfare and progress than getting enough for a people to eat, I do not know what it is.

As have all Old World civilizations before us, we now have reached the economic stage of our development where there must be a readjustment in our laws and our economic system. American farmers must be able to market their products at an assured fair profit to them or must abandon what has now become an otherwise too hazardous industry.

It is equally true that manufactured goods must be more nearly on a parity with farm products, or that farm products must be more nearly on an equality with manufactured goods. There can be no question that a cooperative marketing system will aid in bringing this about painlessly and beneficially.

While the present situation of the farmer is more acute than normal, the evil economic conditions from which he suffers have long been present and been accumulating. Farm history for the last 15 to 20 years is strewn with the financial wreckage of our cattlemen. Some of the shrewdest and smartest men in the live-stock industry have failed. On top of this the last three years have been so steadily disastrous that the country is being drained of its live stock.

No kind of price juggling can ever restore to this country a healthy trade balance and bring to general business a solid and wholesome prosperity. We have got to go back to bedrock to obtain a genuine equality of values. We shall have to build from the farm up a marketing system which will guarantee as well as give the producer his due in an otherwise logically organized world of business and industry, and also give the consumer his money's worth. The one vital industry on which the Nation's welfare and prosperity depend must have its chance to live and prosper if the rest of us expect to.

Mr. President, a farmer who borrows money on mortgage for five years now knows he has signed an obligation he can not meet at maturity if conditions continue as they are. As a consequence he overcrops his farm, does without needed improvements, overworks, and skimps his family in order to make as good a showing as possible in the hope that he will be able to renew his loans. He never has sufficient working capital but must apply every available dollar on his loan and depend upon the local banker to finance his every need. Every such farmer is this year at the mercy of his banker.

The tenant farmer, who has now become our typical American agriculturist, raises his crop under mortgage or lien and in a normal year makes just about enough to pay his debts and meet his living expenses and start on the next year's crop. This year he has gone deeply into debt, finds his credit gone, and is lucky if he can pick up anything to do that will bring in wages. In 1910, 37 per cent of the farms of the United States were worked by tenants. From 1890 to 1910 farm mortgages increased 27 per cent. The census of 1910 showed a marked decrease in country population and in country wealth as compared with the cities, the last census a still greater one.

With the exception of potatoes and poultry which have just about held their own, the volume of food products had declined regularly for several decades.

Mr. President, startling facts are disclosed by the new census figures. The drift from the farm to the city is everywhere evident. In Illinois every county except five shows a decrease in rural population, and the cities show an increase. This is typical of the Nation.

Less than half the population of the United States now lives on the farm. Ten years ago less than 46 per cent live in the cities. Forty years ago more than 70 per cent of the people were farmers.

It is difficult to see how the cost of living is going to come down and stay down with producers leaving the farm and joining the ranks of the consumers. Our farms are being depopulated because a farmer no longer knows, after weathering all other vicissitudes of his hazardous calling, whether he can count on getting back the actual value he has put into his products.

It is true that one man with a tractor can do more work than one with several horses used to do, but things have a way of gaining momentum down hill. If farming can not be made a less hazardous and a more certainly profitable business, before long it may easily cease to be the great industry our needs demand.

Yet yearly, Mr. President, we go on increasing the number of toll takers between the producer and the consumer, to the misfortune of both. These toll takers prosper and multiply on the products of the farmer's toil and the exorbitant prices charged the consumer, while stockmen and farmers go broke or are forced to abandon these pursuits.

A farmer sells a bushel of wheat and is paid for a peck; the consumer buys a peck and pays for a bushel.

Merchandise, according to one definition, has not been produced until it is in the hands of a satisfied consumer. This applies to agriculture with even more force. It implies a direct and economical marketing system such as can only be had through cooperative organization.

Our market system every year offers the strange spectacle of thousands of bushels of potatoes rotting on our farms while our importations of potatoes from abroad increase, and this is by no means the only striking indictment that can be brought against it.

As a means of reducing the string of toll-taking middlemen between producer and consumer, Herbert Hoover, engineer and great administrator, recently recommended to the House Agricultural Committee a national marketing board of experts, under the Department of Agriculture, to improve marketing conditions. "Such a board," said Mr. Hoover, "could give great assistance to the development of cooperative marketing and other improvements in our marketing processes."

Mr. Hoover would not only make a cooperative marketing system possible, he would even have this Government give such a system great assistance after it had been developed.

In addition to supporting a great host and variety of profit takers, American agriculture has become the football of the market manipulator and the market gambler, the legitimate good thing of the organized buyer and the organized seller, until at last it is breaking under the strain.

I sincerely believe, Mr. President, that we shall never again enjoy true prosperity in the United States until one of two things shall happen: Either manufactured goods must be more nearly and permanently on a parity with farm products, so far as the farmer is concerned, or farm products must be more nearly on a parity with manufactured goods.

The best way, the only feasible way, to bring this parity about, it seems to me, is to increase the producer's profit by shortening the road to market. The way to accomplish this is through cooperative marketing, which eliminates the unessential and speculative middleman, and which gives the producer and the consumer their due. A bushel of wheat, a bale of cotton, or a pound of pork or beef must in future buy more goods for the farmer or farmers will continue to desert the farms in search of something that will.

When the farm boys who came back from the war took up other kinds of work, as a large per cent of them did, that indicated there was something radically wrong with the farm industry and that that wrong was no new thing. When we make farming pay a fair return for the hard work and brains invested, there will be plenty of farmers to farm. We can help to make farming pay a fair return; we can help to stabilize it as a paying industry; we can put it on a parity with organized business by making it legally possible for American farmers to do business as cooperative units. Europe has done this for generations, and would have starved if it had not. With Europe it was a case of self-preservation, as it is now becoming the case with us.

Eventually the consumer pays for every short-sighted agricultural policy we adopt, as well as for every farsighted agricultural policy we fail to adopt, and all this reacts on general business and national welfare.

It should be the chief concern therefore of the American people, as the surest guaranty of an enduring national life, to make farming as reliably profitable as any other occupation requiring the same amount of capital, hard work, and ability. It is now further from fulfilling that condition than any other American institution.

During the investigation of the high cost of living by the Senate District Committee some time ago it was found that a bushel of potatoes for which a farmer in Michigan received $1 was sold for $4 to $6 in Washington. We traced that bushel's many sales. The farmer sold it to the village dealer; that dealer sold the potatoes to the agent of the Detroit buyer; the Detroit buyer sold them to a commission agent from Washington; the Washington wholesaler sold them to the retail dealer, and each of these men took a commission or profit. Cooperative marketing would probably eliminate at least four of these profit takers to the mutual benefit of producer and consumer.

The public is not getting the benefit of the sacrifices made by the producers. It is also evident that freight rates are relatively too high when the railroads get more for hauling many farm products than the producers are paid for them.

When a farmer sells a bushel of wheat there is a sales tax of 5 per cent, an elevator charge of 10 cents, another charge of 10 cents by the terminal elevator, then a broker or two and the miller and the jobber must add their toll to that bushel, and at last the retailer, after a high freight rate has been added. By the time the farmer buys it back in the form of flour he pays about $2.50 a bushel for it.

I have yet to hear, Mr. President, of any farmer at the present time, however hard hit, who would not be willing to take the slump in farm prices and sell at a loss if he could buy at the same ratio. In that case he would relatively be no worse off than anyone else, instead of being as he now is by far the greatest sufferer. He could then maintain himself at least. But he is suffering from a marketing system 50 years behind the times, the only difference being that he is suffering from it a little more at the present time than usual, because we are in the throes of a readjustment. It is not that his products are not marketed, but that he has nothing to do with the marketing process. This is in the hands of others, of far too many others. He parts with his products long before the consumer sees them or needs them. A host of toll and profit takers meanwhile busy themselves with these products, transfering them from hand to hand and absorbing as much profit as they with their skill at that sort of thing are able to extract from the marketing business.

If the farmers' cooperative associations performed this service, there would be only one or two groups of profit takers where we now have five or six. Not only would this bring us to the solution of our marketing problem but automatically and naturally it would give us the sound and much-desired system of farm finance which national welfare has come to recognize as an imperative necessity for the farm industry. We could provide him the necessary credit to handle his annual turnover.

City people complain bitterly that the burden of prices is too heavy, even in years of ample supply. We all know of the wide disparity existing between the farm price of products and the price the consumer pays; it is seldom less than 100 per cent, and in many cases within recent years as high as 600 per cent in the case of cotton. It is quite apparent that a cooperative marketing system by simply reducing the cost of distribution can make possible a safely profitable return to the producer with lower costs to the consumer. A saving of 10 per cent in the food supply of a city like New York would mean a saving of $150,000,000 a year to the consumer; and a saving of 20 per cent to the cities is probably within the possibilities. I believe cooperative marketing would save the people of America billions of dollars a year in middlemen's profits.

As a result of intelligent cooperative marketing the 11,000 members of a California citrus fruit-growing organization distribute $75,000,000 worth of their products annually to jobbers at a cost of less than 1½ per cent. It costs the individual grower from 7 to 10 per cent to do the same thing. Here is a saving of from 5½ to 8½ per cent, due to cooperation in the handling of one of the most expensive crops put on the market.

There are already hundreds of small farm cooperative enterprises in every strongly agricultural State. They only need to be linked up to a cooperative marketing system to become a great blessing to the American people and to American agriculture.

For many years cotton growers have complained that their crops have never brought them a profit. Meanwhile the middlemen, the speculators, and the spinners have more than prospered.

To partly explain why the cotton raisers can not make a living it is only necessary to say that cotton probably passes through more hands and has more profit toll taking than any other crop produced in America. Under our present marketing system a bale of cotton passes through an average of nine hands from the time it leaves the farmer until it arrives at the mill.

To continue to grow the crop and do more than barely exist, Oklahoma cotton growers are looking forward to cooperative associations as the only practical relief. Such associations would be able to hire expert "classers," who would see that the growers were paid according to the actual grade of cotton they produced, and experienced salesmen would market the product direct to large buyers or mills, overleaping the heads of numerous small middlemen.

Mr. President, all over this country a great cooperative movement is taking form and will not be denied. Our American farmers are beginning to see that their very existence depends on pushing cooperative organizations. They are going to organize whether our laws expressly say they may or not, because it has become compulsory. Without the protection of the proposed law now before us, legalizing cooperative marketing and cooperative buying of certain commodities, their cooperative activities are likely to take on many forms and ramifications, resulting possibly in some radical and disastrous experiments, bad for the producer and also for the consumer and the country.

This has now become the most vital economic step in support of our rapidly declining agricultural industry and in behalf of the general welfare. All history emphasizes the fact that the downfall of every bygone civilization and nation was preceded by the breakdown of its agriculture. Cooperative marketing is a necessary step at this time in the evolution of a permanent and prosperous system of American agriculture. Instead of hampering and placing obstacles in the way of this natural development, we should do our utmost to aid it and help it along. The bill I am advocatitng is a forward step in the right direction at the right time and is based on the world's ripest experience. There is no cure-all for all the farmer's economic ills. But the definite legalization of cooperative activity in marketing, together with lower transportation charges and more adequate credit accommodations, will go a long way toward enabling the farmer to correct the evil from which he is suffering. Given an opportunity he will do it. He should be given the chance.

A cooperative marketing system is bound to come, Mr. President, for it means the country's salvation. It means a newer and stronger national stability, resting on a genuine and general prosperity such as we have never before enjoyed and in which all who labor will more fairly and equitably participate than ever before. By all means let us give this movement a helping hand.

ARTICLE BY S. H. COWAN.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD an article on the railroad question by Hon. S. H. Cowan, of Fort Worth, Tex., which appeared in the Fort Worth Record of Sunday, January 8, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RAILROAD PROBLEM IS SERIOUS, SAYS COWAN—ROADS CLAIM THEY CAN NOT SURVIVE; THIS PROBLEM MUST BE SOLVED, IS BELIEF.

(By S. H. Cowan.)

The average 3 and 4 year old Texas steer from Kansas pastures and from pastures of the Northwest sold at the markets last fall on the basis of 1,100 pounds, $65. I assume that to have been an average price for 10 years previous to the war and the total fare for three movements from the time the yearlings left the breeding ground until they reached the market to have been $12. The aggregate transportation cost was 18½ per cent on the final sale value. The increase during the war amounted to 70 per cent, raising the amount per head to $20.40 aggregate, or 31½ per cent of the sale value. This attaches between the calf and the steer and is vital to Texas. The equivalent applies on feed stuff, grain, and practically all supplies. This dilemma faces the country, namely, the business can not survive on these charges. The railroads claim they can not survive without them. The problem must be solved.

SO IT HAPPENS.

So it happens: Everyone is asking, addressing the open air with not a chord of response, what is to become of the railroads? Everyone knows we must have them, they must live, and to live and to thrive they must be well managed. In ignorance of the facts as to whether the roads are economically and efficiently operated with only real expense items essential to that sort of operation charged in the cost of operation, the uninformed man withholds an answer of his own question. The peak of high rates that freezes up by prohibiting or limiting the flow of business, destroying or curtailing reasonable profits and future prospects, have brought an enormous reduction of tonnage and produced the necessity for people to do without, and to haul their own traffic in enormous quantities as to which there are no statistics. The same has provided the jitney and the autobus. Once learning how to do it that way, costs of that method will be reduced by experience and economics and the business extended as good roads are extended. Continued reduction of railroad business is sure to follow unless they give the incentive to ship by returning to prewar rates and give good service to stimulate it and meet the competition; that is, revive business by making it desirable and possible for people to carry it on at some profit.

Any other policy tolls the death knell of private ownership of railroads without a subsidy to keep them alive till sustenance from increased traffic shall bring the cow back to her milk upon which the railroads must feed or perish. This is no idle dream; it is a stern fact. Rates must be restored so they are commensurate with the value of the commodity at the market, or there can be no prosperity. Let men think about this situation for themselves, and not rely on some apologist whose knowledge is a void, but who is listened to merely because he has a position with a railroad or expects to have to parrot propaganda with little thought above a whisper, with ignorance for an audience. There is no use to ride to destruction the boat labeled "It will right itself." To-day we have the merchant marine, costing over a billion dollars; the Nation can't operate it because the cost is too high compared to other nations. The press says the President wants it subsidized so it can live and get to doing business as cheap as other vessels. The propagandist says sell it and then subsidize it. If so, we must guarantee rates that the country must have to prosper. It should carry our products from port to port in this country and by competition cheapen rail transportation, and would do it but for our inability to employ labor and pay their wages on the 8-hour limit, so our ships rot.

SAY SUBSIDIZE SHIPS.

So they say subsidize our ships and meet competition on the seas till we get business enough to stand alone. We have the rail example before us, where the guarantee of 6 per cent as a rate-making rule is ruining business. Our ships must have a subsidy from the Government or stop; our railroads by the decision of the commission in Ex parte 74, under section 15a, providing that it must adjust rates to earn a certain percentage in the aggregate on an aggregate value figure for rate making twice too high, take their subsidy from the pockets of the people who can not shift the burden. The producer whose traffic moves by rail pays the subsidy under this iniquitous law and that has destroyed prosperity by imposing a burden that agriculture can not stand—that must grow worse and worse under that method, because it is destroying by the high rates railroad traffic, and, although cost of operation may be reduced, the volume of business must be restored or the roads can not thrive. If the railroads must have a subsidy don't destroy the business of the country with the burden, but let it be the Nation's business to provide it, only on consideration, however, that every road be required to strip down to the fighting trim so the country can see what support the railroads are each entitled to that they cannot provide for themselves. All industry is doing that of necessity. Only stern necessity will do that in case of the railroads. If every law fixing rates and commission were abolished the railroads can not earn 5½ per cent in the aggregate on the inflated value used by the commission. I say that the means of finding out the real facts as to economy and efficiency of operation has not been provided or has not been used to furnish the knowledge. Their own reports comprise the information and we are in no position to gainsay their figures. If the section 15a were repealed, then the commission would be left free to make reasonable rates from the best information that it can get; not by a percentage method to produce net aggregate revenue, but at an amount of charges that will let people live and thrive, so that the railroads may live, and thus build up the fallen structure. To-day a valuation around $60,000 per mile in the western half of the United States is taken for the rate-making purposes of the interestate commission; it exceeds the par value of all the bonds, stock, and trust equipment obligations by over a hundred million dollars, yet with rates on paper and what they charge 70 per cent above prewar rates, they are not making as an aggregate 2½ per cent net on that fanciful value. They and their financial operators and their associates, newspaper periodicals, and writers having access to the press, the great combinations of capital and property in most important lines insist on retaining this iniquitous law, under which this value has been declared, and with the 5½ per cent in the aggregate basis of rates. That all property has declined in value no one doubts. Railroads are not sold like land or cattle or grain. Their values are evidenced by the issued capitalization and debt obligations that are bought and sold. What they sell for is the only evidence of sale value. To-day the aggregate of such issues for the western half of the United States are probably not on the average selling for over 40 per cent of the par value except in a few cases, like the Union Pacific, for example, peculiar unto itself.

Yet the law that Congress passed on turning the roads back told the commission to divide the country into groups and find the aggregate value of property devoted to transportation in each group and to so adjust rates as to produce an aggregate net operating income equal to 5½ per cent in such value, to which the commission might add one-half per cent for betterments, which it did, making 6 per cent. On that basis these exorbitant rates were promulgated and the State required to advance the State rates the same percentage by the Interstate Commerce Commission directing the railroads to do it and the Federal courts enjoining the State from interfering. Unless the commission changes that value how can it reduce the net revenue by reducing rates? If in the aggregate the roads are entitled to 6 per cent on that value, can the commission deny them that right? That was the very ground on which the States were denied the right to fix lower rates. It is the ground on which Henry Ford was not permitted to reduce coal rates. To reduce on one road forces it on competitive roads, which under this new scheme reduces revenue.

The rates are admittedly too high. The railroads have decided they must be reduced. That is to say they are about to experiment with voluntary reductions for six months of 10 per cent on farm products. But this will not be sufficient to effect the object of increasing traffic to make up for the reduction, considering that the total advance of 25 per cent during the war and 35 per cent on the high rates added by Ex parte 74. Had prices the farmer gets remained up, he could have paid the rates, but the dilemma came about that his prices went below prewar levels, retail prices remained up, so that there was no increased consumption and the cost of living and rents in cities presents a wall against reducing wages.

MUST HAVE RAILROADS.

The Nation, all its industries, must have the railroads, and to have them they must be self-supporting in the end, but during the process of getting back to a live and let live basis it is plain that after the railroads shall have reduced their operations to the maximum of efficiency and economy, if they still can not live on rates that permit basic industries to thrive, there is every reason for the Nation to provide by loan, to be repaid after restoration on an amortization plan, enough to make it possible to conduct transportation for rates that will let the country survive. The foolish policy to take it out of the producer's pocket and bankrupt him must of necessity end. Undoubtedly in the long run railroad labor must see to it that no more is possible to continuously collect and keep the roads going than the business of the country can stand. What they are demanding in the way of reduced expenditures has great merit, but as labor is 55 to 60 per cent of the operating cost, they must likewise reckon with that and adjust their wages accordingly.

The same principle that calls for ship subsidy will to greater or less degree apply to the railroads, for the traffic must move. Everyone familiar with public sentiment senses the unpopularity of either the subsidizing of ships or national support of the railroads. But the time must come when somebody has to tell the truth about the situation and the people have to face it as affecting every business interest of the country. It is the paramount subject of legislative consideration today. If we export we must get our products to the ports, and from there to the ultimate destination at the cost that will permit exportation. The export of domestic merchandise for the 10 months ending October 31, 1921, was $3,898,308,000, whereas for 1920 it was $6,831,201,000; for 1916 it was $4,443,240,000. The excess of exports for the 10 months of 1921 over imports was $1,842,545,000, whereas for 1916 it was $2,433,407,000. That our home consumption at the great centers of population is to be affected by the cost of transportation goes without saying. That the return to prosperity of the live-stock and agricultural interests of the country must depend upon production at a profit is manifest.

NEW METHOD NEEDED.

Considering, therefore, all these things the point to the whole matter is that transportation cost can not be restored and the transportation companies survive without a comprehensive and well-planned method of some character that will lift the burden off of the shoulders of the individual producer. That requires a repeal of section 15a of the transportation act, which imposes that burden. Following that the rates must be reduced to be commensurate with the value of the commodities produced or production must stop.

To accomplish these things is a national problem which must be faced whether we want to face it or not. For the three years next previous to the war on the rates then prevailing the railroads had the average highest net operating revenues than in any period in their history upon the rates then in existence. The repeal of the new scheme of making rates so that the former method may be restored is essential in order that things may be brought back to their former relationship. Whatever of Government aid may be needed to accomplish that is at least worthy of serious consideration. What form it may take will depend on Congress. If we escape it in some form, that plan has not been devised.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I rose a few moments ago simultaneously with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], but the Chair very properly happened to recognize that Senator first. The Senator from Kansas has discussed a measure which I favor, and the passage of which I do not desire to delay. I did think to address myself very briefly to some of the remarks and unfounded charges that have been made by Senators on the other side of the aisle. Many of those Senators are not now in the Chamber, and I therefore feel disinclined to discuss that subject at this time, particularly since I am advised by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] that he is very desirous of having an executive session of the Senate to attend to some important executive business; but perhaps at a more convenient season I shall have opportunity to express my views.

For one, the humblest Member on this side of the aisle, I simply want now to say to Senators that I am perfectly willing to concede honest differences of opinion about this case that has been discussed, and in the discussion of which arguments have gone through a pretty wide range. I am perfectly willing to concede that a man may have a view different from my own and still be honorable; but for one I resent the foundationless charges that are made here from time to time, in language absolutely unfair and intemperate, that anyone who happens to disagree with certain self-appointed censors of the morals of the Senate is moved by dishonorable motives. I have as high a sense of honor as Senators who have a different view upon the question. But I shall not delay the executive session which is desired, and I therefore yield to the Senator from Kansas.

KNICKERBOCKER THEATER DISASTER.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield if the matter which the Senator has in mind will not take any time, as an executive session is desired.

Mr. HARRIS. I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask to have read, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 232) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That mindful of the inadequacy of words to express the degree of its sorrow and regret for the appalling loss of life and the terrible injuries caused by the collapse of the Knickerbocker Theater on January 28, 1922, the Senate of the United States hereby extends its most sincere and heartfelt sympathy to the injured and to the relatives and friends of the deceased victims of that catastrophe.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 3, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, how much we need Thy presence, the gift of Thy grace, and the blessing of Thy wisdom. Teach us how to live by blessing the truth to us. O, be gracious and impart this mercy to every Member of this Chamber. Thou hast given us a life of the highest in all the earth, and, oh, inspire our zeal to approach it. May our lives speak well in wise precept and by exalted example. In all our obligations to our God and to our country may we eagerly seek the best and the wisest and in all things never break faith with ourselves. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I call attention of the House to the proposal now pending to fix control or affect the extent of the armed forces on land and sea to be maintained by the United States through the operation of a treaty. I do not want the question to be considered as raised in hostility to the purposes of that treaty. Regardless of what may be thought of its objects, I challenge the power to effect them by this method.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly. I wish to make this suggestion: Although I submit this resolution now, I think it would be well to take plenty of time to consider it. Its purpose is simply to raise the question whether the Congress must be consulted upon the momentous question of the size of the Army and Navy to be maintained by the United States. I would like unanimous consent to submit that question now, Mr. Speaker, and I think it would be wise to refer it to some committee with the understanding that it will be reported for consideration on some future day.

I understand the gentleman from Minnesota wants me to give way for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see where the gentleman has presented any question of privilege. The gentleman has a right to introduce his resolution through the basket.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am calling attention of the House to the fact that there is now pending a proposal made by officers of the Government to determine the size of our Military Establishment by treaty with other Governments, and I am raising the question that there is no power to do that by treaty, and that the privileges of this House, as a part of Congress, are invaded by the attempt to accomplish something without its concurrence, which concurrence is required by the Constitution of the United States. That surely presents a question of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the size and nature of the Military Establishment to be maintained by the United States is a matter to be decided exclusively by the Congress, and any attempt to affect or control the extent of our armed forces on land and sea by treaty between this Government and the Government of any foreign power or powers is an invasion and breach of the privileges of this House as a branch of said Congress.

The SPEAKER. It does not seem to the Chair, at first blush, that anyone can present an abstract question as to the right of the House and claim that it should be immediately considered. If so, the Members of the House could constantly be presenting resolutions which stated the rights of the House, and they could thereby interrupt the business of the House.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, such resolutions have been repeatedly introduced here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to be referred to some precedent.

Mr. COCKRAN. I have not got them here at this moment. I will be very glad if the Chair would withhold——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad if the gentleman would withhold the resolution.

Mr. COCKRAN. For the present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order upon it.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand it is only presented for action by unanimous consent at a later period.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman says that he withholds the demand for the present.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a question of privilege to be decided by the Chair.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 9724.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The conference report was read, as follows:

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "$4,000,000: Provided, That for purpose of concentration, upon the initiation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and under regulations prescribed by him, distilled spirits may be removed from any internal-revenue bonded warehouse to any other such warehouse, and may be bottled in bond in any such warehouse before or after payment of the tax, and the commissioner shall prescribe the form and penal sums of bond covering distilled spirits in internal-revenue bonded warehouses, and in transit between such warehouses"; and the Senate agree to the same.

MARTIN B. MADDEN,
WALTER W. MAGEE,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill as passed by the House——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a point of order against amendment No. 7.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will probably prefer to have it considered when it is reached. The gentleman will be recognized for it when we come to it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit the following statement:

Bill as passed by the House carried	$118,806,073.81
Bill as passed by the Senate carried	120,277,173.81
A net increase of	1,471,100.00

The Senate added 25 amendments to the bill, 16 of which affected the appropriations.

Fifteen of the amendments added to the bill	$1,759,100.00
One amendment reduces the bill by	288,000.00
A net increase as above of	1,471,100.00

The Senate receded on 5 amendments.

The House receded on 12 amendments, 8 affecting appropriations.

The House receded with an amendment on 1 amendment.

The conference committee have not agreed on 7 amendments, 4 of which affect the appropriations.

The 5 Senate recessions take off of the Senate increase $38,600.

Eight of the House recessions add to the bill as passed by the House $218,000.

The amendment agreed to with an amendment effects a reduction in the bill as passed by the House of $288,000.

Of the 7 amendments which have not been agreed to, 4 of them involve additional appropriations to the extent of $1,502,500.

So as it stands now the bill carries—

As passed by the House	$118,806,073.81
Less amendment agreed to with an amendment	288,000.00
	118,518,073.81
Plus amendments on which House recedes	218,000.00
	118,736,073.81

A net decrease over bill as passed by House of $70,000.

In connection with the question on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] reserved a point of order, I wish to say that the conferees believed that they had the right under the rules of the House, under the Holman rule particularly, to agree to the amendment submitted by the Senate as a limitation. In the first place, the amount of the appropriation as passed by the House was $4,288,000. In presenting the amendment the Senate reduced the amount of the House appropriation from $4,288,000 to $4,000,000, and then provided the limitation as indicated.

I do not believe the agreement entered into by the House conferees is subject to a point of order, because we have the right to do that same thing in the House. Having the right to do it in the House under the House rules, they would have the same right to do in conference what they have the right to do in the House itself. Then, following that, the adoption of this amendment not only saves $288,000 in this bill but it provides within the year, after concentration has been effected, for a further saving of about $700,000.

There are now 900 and more gaugers and watchmen employed by the Government in the various distilleries and other bonded warehouses of the country, and when concentration takes place this number can be reduced to 100, thus enabling the Government to dismiss from its service 800 people whose services are no longer to be needed. There are many other good reasons why this amendment agreed to by the conferees should be adopted. But aside from the financial reasons, we believe that we have complied literally with the rules of the House, and I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not insist upon the point of order which he has reserved.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa such time as he desires.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Iowa raised a point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but he reserved it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I reserved a point of order, and I wish to speak on it just a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that if the point of order were sustained it would invalidate the report, and therefore the Chair would prefer to hear the gentleman from Iowa before the report is submitted to a vote.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, while, to my mind, the point of order should be clearly sustained if made, for various reasons, particularly because this matter sought to be introduced is legislation upon an appropriation bill——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us what the point of order is?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The point of order that I reserved was that the matter is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What part of it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Amendment No. 7. But, Mr. Speaker, after reflection I have concluded to withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But I would like, if the gentleman will permit, to explain my reasons for so doing.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. LAZARO. Before the gentleman yields, will he answer a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; if I can.

Mr. LAZARO. What was done with the Senate amendment providing for the archives building?

Mr. MADDEN. We have it here and will reach it for consideration shortly.

Mr. LAZARO. How much was that—$500,000?

Mr. MADDEN. The item was for the purchase of a lot, not the construction of a building.

Mr. LAZARO. But with the idea of finally constructing a building?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. That will be taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I should feel that I should have to insist upon the point of order. But a very peculiar situation has arisen here. Notwithstanding the fact that the Committee on Ways and Means has reported out a bill carrying, among other things, this provision, somewhat extended, I realize perfectly well that that bill has quite a long road to travel before it can get through the body that sits at the other end of the Capitol. This is a very important matter. Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to say anything that should be considered a reflection on the Senate. I have never violated the rules of the House that prohibit criticism in that respect, but on the contrary, with a great deal of effort, I have always restrained my feelings on the subject.

Mr. Speaker, life is short and time is fleeting. Some time ago, when some gentlemen insinuated that certain proceedings might be slower than the Senate, I was quite ready to rise in defense of anybody against whom such a charge should be made. I feel at this time that if the bill that was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means should pass this House, as I have doubt it would if it were submitted, and go on over to the Senate, some time in the dim distant æons—if that is the proper term—of the future it might become a law, but the hope is somewhat faint, and I am not at all certain about it.

This is a very important provision, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has quite correctly said, that has been inserted in this bill in the interest of economy. It is highly important that the concentration should be effected, although I have some doubts that the provision contained in the bill will accomplish all that is desired. But the provision that has been inserted is one as to which a very unusual thing has happened, a phenomenon where we see both those who are for and those who are against the prohibition amendment uniting upon it. The vast majority of those who are interested in the distilled spirits which are now stored in Government warehouses are very much in favor of this provision and also those who are interested in the enforcement of the prohibitory law, because they believe it will be of assistance in the enforcement of that law. The parties on the other side are in favor of it because it will greatly reduce expenses, and a large number of persons who are holders of warehouse receipts, which are liens upon this liquor, see their securities slipping away in the exorbitant charges which are now being maintained.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the adoption of the conference report. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 1, page 2 of the bill: On line 2, after the figures "$12,000," insert: "Undersecretary of the Treasury, to be nominated by the President and appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $7,500 per annum and shall perform such duties in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury as may be prescribed by the Secretary or by law, and under the provisions of section 177, Revised Statutes, in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall perform the duties of the Secretary until a successor is appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease, $7,500."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a year ago the office of Undersecretary of the Treasury was created in an appropriation bill, to carry the salary of $10,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this proposition as I understand it marks a departure from the practice. I think the Members should be here to discuss it. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MADDEN. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 1.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say in this connection that this amendment of the Senate provides for the appointment of an Undersecretary of the Treasury at $7,500 a year. A year ago the House in an appropriation bill provided for an Undersecretary of the Treasury at $10,000 a year. When this bill was reported the Committee on Appropriations reported a continuation of the position at the salary provided in the appropriation act of last year. The Senate reduced the amount to be paid from $10,000 to $7,500 a year, and in the next amendment, No. 2, they struck out the appropriation for an assistant to the Secretary at $5,000 a year. So if this amendment should be concurred in it would provide for what the Secretary of the Treasury himself thinks is a very essential arm of the work in which he is engaged, and it will cost only $2,500 a year more than the expense would be if this item should be stricken out, because if the appropriation for the Undersecretary of the Treasury is stricken out it will be necessary to restore the assistant to the Secretary at $5,000, which, by the adoption of this amendment, will be eliminated.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the assistant to the Secretary is an office created by law.

Mr. MADDEN. It was created in 1918, during the war.

Mr. SNELL. I mean the one that was stricken out.

Mr. MADDEN. The office of assistant to the Secretary was created in an appropriation bill during the war, in 1918, to meet the war needs.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman refers to amendment No. 2, assistant to the Secretary, $5,000?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. That was not a statutory office?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. SNELL. Neither one of them was a statutory office?

Mr. MADDEN. No; but we must have one of these positions, and the Secretary of the Treasury is very anxious to continue the Undersecretary because he is able to do a great many things as Undersecretary that he would not be able to do as assistant to the Secretary. He relieves the Secretary of many burdens of which he ought to be relieved.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I yield to him five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement concerning the pending amendment. As the gentleman from Illinois stated, the deficiency bill which passed the House last May carried a provision for an Undersecretary of the Treasury at $10,000 a year.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Did the provision for the Undersecretary result in the displacement of one Assistant Secretary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It did not do so at that time, but it will under this amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. On the 1st of July last one Assistant Secretary at $5,000 was dropped and an Undersecretary appointed at $10,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I did not so understand, but I may be mistaken as to that. I opposed the provision last May for an Undersecretary at $10,000 a year. I opposed it on the floor of the House for two reasons. In the first place, those of us who opposed the amendment felt that it was not necessary to create an office of Undersecretary in the Department of the Treasury at a high salary. It is true that at that time and for a year or two there had been an Undersecretary of State, but, as we all know, there are different circumstances surrounding the duties of the State Department, having to confer with foreign officials and foreign Governments, and a majority of Congress felt that for that reason it was proper to provide for the position of Undersecretary of State. I felt then and I feel now that it was entirely unnecessary to provide for officials who should be called undersecretaries. If the Assistant Secretary was not getting sufficient salary the salary could have been increased. I felt then and I feel now that we will eventually have undersecretaries in all the departments of the Government. We created one in the State Department and now we have one in the Treasury Department. I take it that in a year or two other Cabinet members will come to Congress and say that they must have an Undersecretary in their respective departments.

This office was created with a salary of $10,000 and the present occupant is drawing that sum. The Senate put an amendment on this bill which, in effect, reduces his salary and provides for an Undersecretary at $7,500. At the same time, the Senate adopted an amendment which, if concurred in by the House, will do away with the assistant to the Secretary, who receives $5,000 a year, which means in effect that the salary roll of the Treasury Department by this amendment will be increased $2,500 during the fiscal year of 1923. I am looking forward with some interest, if this amendment is adopted, to see whether or not in the next appropriation bill this assistant to the Secretary at $5,000 will be restored.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The idea of an Undersecretary seems to be based on the principle that the Undersecretary will be recognized as the representative, particularly, of the head of the department, and that in that particular he will be expected to be specially qualified for a larger range of service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not understand why the Treasury Department—and I am not minimizing its important duties—needs an Undersecretary. I can not understand why the First Assistant Secretary can not represent the Secretary as efficiently as an Undersecretary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. When the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the committee last May in advocacy of this position, it was stated then to the committee that the position was desired because it was his intention to select some man from the outside of great financial repute, some man who would be entitled to a salary greater than $10,000, a man who had such repute and such financial standing that he would hesitate to offer him a salary of less than $10,000. But what was the result? As soon as the office was created we find that the First Assistant Secretary, who was drawing $5,000, was immediately promoted and is now Undersecretary at $10,000 a year. That gentleman had served as First Assistant under the previous administration for a few months and had accepted the same position under the present administration just two or three months before, and so far as I know would have been willing to continue his services at $5,000 a year.

Mr. SNELL. So the effect is that they are really increasing the salary of this man $2,500?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is what this will do, although he is now drawing $10,000, as I have explained.

Mr. SNELL. It takes a $5,000 man who is willing to work in that position and gives him $7,500?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that there is no statutory position for Undersecretary?

Mr. MADDEN. There is not.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The effect of this amendment will be to change the law and give an additional $2,500.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The effect of the amendment is to make permanent law.

Mr. MADDEN. No; it is not intended for that; it does not read that way. This is only for one year.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. However that may be, the effect will be to establish the office of Undersecretary and abolish this office of Assistant Secretary.

Mr. MADDEN. Assistant to the Secretary.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And this is a custom that was inherited from the State Department when it appointed an Undersecretary of State in order to be like Great Britain and France?

Mr. MADDEN. In the first place the abolishment of the Assistant to the Secretary was suggested because we believed only one of these places was necessary.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I understand the reason, of course, but it does change existing law.

Mr. MADDEN. It does.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It makes it permanent law.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe this becomes permanent law?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; I think it will be so construed.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And if it be permanent law, the gentleman from Illinois does not approve of changing existing law in appropriation bills as a general proposition, I am sure.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 1.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 63, noes 59.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 183, nays 125, answered "present" 1, not voting 121, as follows:

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 3: Page 2, line 21, after the word "all," strike out "$70,760" and insert "$73,260."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment. It just changes the total.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 4, after the word "Secretary," insert the word "Under-secretary."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

(6): Provided, That section 2 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, approved July 31, 1894, shall not be construed as having application to retired officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard who may be appointed to the offices created by section 207 of the Budget and accounting act, 1921, approved June 10, 1921, within the meaning of precluding payment to such officers of the difference in pay prescribed for such offices and their retired pay.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to explain this first.

Mr. Speaker, section 207 of the Budget act, approved June 10, 1921, provides in part as follows:

There is hereby created in the Treasury Department a bureau to be known as the Bureau of the Budget. There shall be in the bureau a director and an assistant director, who shall be appointed by the President and receive salaries of $10,000 and $7,500 a year, respectively * * *.

Section 2 of the act of July 31, 1894 (28 Stat., 205), provides:

No person who holds an office the salary or annual compensation attached to which amounts to the sum of $2,500 shall be appointed to or hold any other office to which compensation is attached unless specially heretofore or hereafter authorized thereto by law, but this shall not apply to retired officers of the Army or Navy whenever they may be elected to public office or whenever the President shall appoint them to office by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The Director of the Bureau of the Budget, appointed by the President, is not required to be confirmed by the Senate, and I understand it is the purpose of the President to appoint Gen. Lord, beginning about the 1st of July, to the position of Director of the Bureau of the Budget. Gen. Lord, as all Members of the House know, is the financial officer of the War Department. He has made a reputation for knowledge and experience of which those who have come in contact with him are proud. To accept the office of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget he will be required to resign from the Army, and thereby he would lose his right to retired pay. If the amendment proposed by the Senate should be adopted the President would be authorized to appoint him to this place, and his compensation would be the difference between what his retired pay amounts to and the $10,000 which is provided as compensation for the office. I do not believe that otherwise Gen. Lord would care to resign from the Army and thereby lose the opportunity of later coming under the provisions of the act which gives him the right to retired pay. If he accepted the place without this provision now under consideration, he would be required to resign, and he would resign to accept a place which might be permanent or might be temporary, as to which no one knows.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think, of course, no one who has come in contact with Gen. Lord fails to appreciate his efficiency, his splendid patriotism, and his great ability, but may I ask the gentleman if he thinks it wise that a retired Army officer should maintain his standing as an Army officer and at the same time render civil service?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, of course, many people have some doubt about the propriety of that. For myself I have always felt that Gen. Lord had such complete knowledge of the Government service that he would be a valuable acquisition to the position which the President has indicated he wishes to appoint him.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The difficulty about it is that by reason of our recognition of the very great ability of Gen. Lord we are liable to fall into a bad precedent.

Mr. MADDEN. I am submitting the case to the House. Does the gentleman wish some time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is no use in arguing about the ability and efficiency of Gen. Lord. Every one who has come in contact with him knows that; but the question is a precedent is being formed here which I think is dangerous.

Several Members rose.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand it is not exactly a precedent. I will yield to gentlemen in just a minute.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that in taking this action the House will not be establishing a precedent; that under the law an officer in the Army may be retired with the consent of the President after having 30 years of service; and that when Gen. Wood, a short time ago, was appointed governor of the Philippine Islands, if you will remember, the question was raised, and it was the desire of the administration to appoint him governor of the Philippine Islands while he was on the active list? That was met with very stubborn opposition in the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, myself among others feeling that we should be establishing a dangerous precedent to put men into civil positions while retaining their status as active officers in the Army. Consequently, Gen. Wood retired from the Army and accepted the position of governor of the Philippine Islands as a retired Army officer.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to know whether Gen. Wood retired, or did he resign?

Mr. McKENZIE. He retired. He had had over 30 years of service.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman said "resigned." So he is now a retired Army officer holding that position?

Mr. McKENZIE. He is, after having had over 30 years of service.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is not that in violation of the statute that is proposed to be affected by this legislation?

Mr. McKENZIE. Unless confirmed by the Senate——

Mr. MADDEN. Unless confirmed by the Senate he is entitled to do that. It is a case where the Senate is not required to confirm.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. He is eligible to appointment in an office where the confirmation is not required by the Senate?

Mr. MADDEN. Where the confirmation is required by the Senate, but, having resigned, he is not eligible.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If this legislation is not defeated, can the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] tell us whether it is the intention of Gen. Dawes to resign?

Mr. MADDEN. I think he would resign.

Mr. CHALMERS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it wise to make permanent laws so as to take care of an individual case?

Mr. MADDEN. There is a provision of law in connection with all cases concerning Army and Navy officers whose confirmation is required by the Senate, and this is only extending the existing law to cases where the confirmation is not necessary.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Is Gen. Lord a West Point graduate?

Mr. MADDEN. I think not.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. My understanding is that Gen. Lord was appointed by the War Department on the staff of the Army because of his qualifications in connection with the disbursement of the revenues of the Government, and that he is not a graduate of West Point. The Army recognized his ability; the Army took him because of that fact—as a business manager, so to speak. He occupies in that particular quite a different relationship to this whole proposition from what a regular man from West Point or a retired Army officer would have. Now, permit me to say that I have had occasion to review many accounts of revenues and disbursements of the Government, and I have failed to find in the range of my acquaintance a man who is so thoroughly equipped in the matter of the accounting of the revenues and disbursements of the Government as Gen. Lord, and I understand that is the qualification that caused him to be selected.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is not only providing that Gen. Lord may accept this position but he is passing a general statute that any employee of this Government whose salary does exceed $2,500 may do so.

Mr. MADDEN. This only applies to Army and Navy officers.

Mr. BLANTON. Any Army or Navy officer whose salary is more than $2,500 a year may hold a dual position?

Mr. MADDEN. No; only one. He would have the pay of an officer in the Army after he got the appointment.

Mr. BLANTON. Of the 17 officers we have provided for by law, there are a good many whose salaries are over $2,500, and any one of them could hold an appointive position under the President.

Mr. MADDEN. Not under this law.

Mr. BLANTON. Anyone whose salary is over $2,500.

Mr. MADDEN. Not anyone except Army and Navy officers.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Gen. Lord was made clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means when Mr. Dingley, of Maine, was chairman of that committee. He probably had more to do with the drawing of the Dingley bill, the most successful protective tariff bill ever drawn, than any other person, except Mr. Dingley himself. His knowledge is great. There is no quarrel about that. But there is involved in this amendment a proposition which it seems to me might lead to great trouble in the future.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not extend beyond two officers connected with the Bureau of the Budget, the director and the assistant director.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Does not my friend from Tennessee believe, and do not other Members of the House believe, that to the Bureau of the Budget, in a way an experimental proposition, we ought to give the opportunity to appoint the best man in America that the President can find?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; I agree with that. But if the gentleman will pardon me, I do not see why even the best man in America should draw a salary as a retired Army officer at the same time.

Mr. MANN. Well, here is Gen. Lord, who goes on the retired list. I do not know what his salary would be on that list. If you want to draft him into the position of Director of the Budget, is it fair to ask him to give up his retirement pay for the balance of his life in order to be Director of the Budget for no one knows how long, when the Government financially is the gainer by having him draw only $10,000 for both being Director of the Budget and including his retired pay? If he does not do that, then we will have to pay him his retired pay and pay the Director of the Budget $10,000 besides, and may not get as efficient a man. If we can save money and increase efficiency, is it not a wise thing to do?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I doubt it—not because of Gen. Lord, let me say, however.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from Tennessee and I believe the same way about making exceptions to general rules. We do not believe in it. But once in a while it is essential to make an exception to any rule. Is it not the wise thing to make an exception here when we gain in efficiency and economy both?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman tell us what his salary will be as a retired general of the Army?

Mr. MADDEN. My recollection is that the retired pay of a brigadier general would be $4,500; three-fourths of his present base pay, which is $6,000.

Mr. SNELL. Then there would be an actual saving of $5,500?

Mr. MADDEN. No; $4,500, because he would get $5,500 out of this $10,000.

Mr. SNELL. And you would get the most efficient man?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to make a short statement?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I fear that probably I made a statement which may have misled some Members when I said that Gen. Lord had had 30 years' service. He has not had 30 years' service, but he is eligible to retirement under that provision of law which provides that the President may retire an officer at the age of 62, and Gen. Lord will have reached the age of 62 and will be eligible for retirement under that provision of law, instead of after 30 years' service.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to discuss the qualifications of Gen. Lord, except to say, with all respect to the gentlemen who have advanced the idea, that it is utter nonsense to say that Gen. Lord is the only man in America who is qualified for the position of Commissioner of the Budget, or, indeed, that he has any qualifications which separate him from perhaps a thousand other good Americans.

If Gen. Lord has preeminent qualifications for this position, let me say that in my judgment he is the only man who has had his training in the Regular Army who has acquired such superior business qualifications by reason of it.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will ask the gentleman to excuse me for a moment.

Gen. Lord has had 20 years' service in the Regular Army, and has been separated that long from general business transactions. If I were making the appointment I would not select a man who had been that length of time away from dealing with general business affairs and mixed up with a system of reckless expenditure of the public funds, and extravagance and waste, such as has gone on in the Army during the last few years. [Applause.]

But as I said, I do not desire to discuss Gen. Lord's qualifications. I am willing, for the sake of the argument, to concede that he has preeminent qualifications. I would like to suggest, however, in my modest way that we have other men in the country, Gen. Lord's inferiors though they be, who can do this work, so that his appointment as commissioner is not essential to the safety of the Republic.

That we are establishing a precedent in this measure is obvious to those who have heard the colloquy in which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] took part. If the appointment of this officer were required to be confirmed by the Senate, a retired Army officer would be eligible under the law. But since such is not the case, a retired Army officer is not eligible. No law has ever been passed which made such officers eligible. So that we are now establishing this practice for the first time in our history.

There is a reason why retired officers should not be appointed except upon the advice and consent of the Senate, because that enables a body which directly represents the people to keep its hands on such appointments and prevent abuses. For myself, I want to say that I will never vote to make any retired Army officer eligible for any civil office whatsoever. [Applause.] I regard it as essentially bad policy.

From the very beginnings of our Government the danger that the military might control civil affairs has been considered; it has been feared. The best brains of the Republic and its highest patriotism have opposed such a possibility from the very beginning. You will establish this precedent here because you say he is a man of high qualifications. Gen. Wood has high qualifications for the position of Secretary of War. Other officers of the Army have high qualifications for that position. Many officers of the Navy have high qualifications to act as Secretary of the Navy. You may be called upon to waive your scruples and make void our traditions by making eligible for Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy some high officer of the Army or of the Navy. That prospect is what you are driving for, gentlemen, and that is what I am opposing. I think we, the Representatives of the great civilian body of the people of this country, ought to stand like iron against the militarization of our Government. As militarism enters the Government of a republic, democracy departs—to the extent that a republic is militarized it is undemocratized. As a consistent antimilitarist, I feel it my duty to express my unshakable conviction that the course proposed is dangerous to the welfare of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I favor the pending amendment, and I hope it will be adopted. Everyone who knows Gen. Lord and is familiar with his services with the Government recognizes his patriotism, his ability, and his integrity. As has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], he has served as financial officer in the War Department for a number of years. He effected great economies there and has rendered highly efficient and splendid service, as every one who is familiar with his record knows.

The gentleman from Illinois has stated that it is the purpose of the President, if permitted to do so, to appoint Gen. Lord to succeed Gen. Dawes as Director of the Budget. For my part, I want to say unhesitatingly that I do not believe that the President could possibly make a better selection for the head of the Budget as its director.

Gentlemen have referred to the fact that in passing the amendment we are establishing a bad precedent. There might be some force and logic in that sort of argument if this were a general exception; but this exception applies alone to the office of the Director of the Budget. As we all know, it was the intent and purpose of the Budget law to give to the President of the United States the right to select as the Director of the Budget his own personal and trusted adviser to assist him with reference to the estimates to be submitted to Congress. If the President believes that Gen. Lord is the very best man that he can select as Director of the Budget to succeed Gen. Dawes, then by all means I am in favor of giving him the opportunity to appoint Gen. Lord to that position, and I wish to repeat that I do not believe he could make a better selection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We agree upon that; but does the gentleman think it wise that Gen. Lord should remain as an officer of the Army, drawing pay as an officer of the Army, and at the same time drawing pay as Director of the Budget in civilian life?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, this provision is to permit the appointment of Gen. Lord after his retirement.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On retired pay?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. On retired pay; and as has been explained——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I should like two minutes more.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee two minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As has been explained, Gen. Lord will not draw two salaries. He will only draw the difference between his retired pay and the salary of the Director of the Budget. Therefore by adopting this amendment we are actually effecting an economy during his term of office of something like $5,500 per annum. Gentlemen, I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If I have the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I agree in the main with everything that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has said in reference to the appointment of Army officers to civil positions. But as has already been developed in this debate, Gen. Lord served this Government in a civil position quite as long as he has served in the Army. He came here as the clerk to one of the great committees. The late Mr. Dingley brought him here. He is a man of education, of refinement, and above all things he is one of the few men that you find left who believe fully and firmly in the right of Congress to determine the policies of the Army and Navy and to control appropriations, and I believe that Gen. Lord is as patriotic and sincere as any man in this House and that he is as much opposed to the domination of the civil government by the Military Establishment as any man in Congress. I have known him for a number of years, but I was not drawn closely to him until during the late war, when Gen. Lord was appointed to perform an enormous task. That was to prevent duplications in appropriations, to keep the accounts of the vast expenditures straight, and he did a magnificent service. I had the opportunity then during that war to find out the value of Gen. Lord's services. No mistake will be made in giving this important place to Gen. Lord. Then, as has been suggested by my friend and colleague from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], we shall be actually saving something over $5,500 a year by the adoption of this amendment, because his retired pay will be about $5,500 and this provision only pays the difference.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. UPSHAW. Does not the gentleman think it would be very unfortunate for the Government to be deprived of the services of men of conspicuous ability who are needed in civilian leadership?

Mr. SISSON. I do not know that I agree with my friend that that sort of a man ought to have this place simply because he is a military man. On the contrary, I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]; but knowing Gen. Lord as I do, I do not believe he is any more tainted with militarism than is my friend from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] or than the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. In fact, Gen. Lord has had no connection with the Army except in a financial department of the War Department.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Was not Gen. Lord taken into the Army because of his recognized business ability instead of because of any military qualifications that he had?

Mr. SISSON. I am sure that that was the reason, because he does possess most peculiar business ability, and I do not know of a man who is his equal in working out for Congress and for the various committees of Congress these details of appropriations; nor do I know a man who would give more absolute and unqualified fairness to the consideration of any question which might be submitted to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] three minutes.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has just stated about what I had in mind. I therefore have but little to say upon this subject, except that I am for this amendment and shall vote for it.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] stated that Gen. Lord received his training in the Army. Gen. Lord received his training before he entered the Army. In fact it was that training and his efficiency in his work that contributed largely to his appointment into the Army from civil life in 1901. So he has spent more years serving the Government, or more of his life outside of the Army than he has spent in the Army; and if there is one man in all the commissioned personnel of the Army of the United States who stands out above all the rest as not having become militarized because of his service in the Military Establishment, it is Gen. Lord. He is a most efficient man.

In fact, as has been said, he is one of the most efficient men I have ever met—in the Army or out of it. Now, he will be upon the pay roll of the Government whether appointed to this position or not. He is in the vigor of life. His usefulness remains; and why should not the Government have the benefit of his distinguished and valuable services? I would not establish the precedent of appointing to a civil position a man who is in the active military service; but when an officer retires from the Army his connection with the Army ceases, except that he receives his retired pay. And in view of the fact that this man has served the Government possibly more years in a civilian capacity than in a military capacity, and in view of the further fact that all who know him know that his service in the Army has not wedded him to the idea of militarism but has better fitted him, possibly—by giving him a view of both sides of the proposition—for the responsibility awaiting him if appointed to this high office, I feel that provision should be made for his appointment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the motion that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 6.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. CHALMERS), there were—ayes 70, noes 19.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. All those in favor of the motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment will answer yea and those opposed will answer nay, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 234, nays 74, answered "present" 2, not voting 120, as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate amendment No. 20: Washington, D. C., National Archives Building: For site of building, including $25,000 for technical services, $500,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to further insist on the disagreement of the House to the Senate amendment. I desire to say in this connection that there is no authority of law for the construction of an archives building. I believe there is authority to buy a lot, but the purchase of a lot does not bring you any nearer the erection of a building than you are to-day. Some years ago there was a good deal of agitation for the erection of an archives building, and the purchase of a lot was authorized, but it was not used for the purpose for which it was purchased. They erected another building on the lot that was bought to be used in connection with the construction of the archives building.

Now there is a new agitation for the erection of an archives building, and, of course, in this connection it is necessary to buy a new lot. It must be purchased within a given radius where somebody has a lot to sell. The Government within the last three months donated a very important lot situated down on the Mall to the Washington Memorial Association upon which to erect a memorial building. That lot would have been an ideal place upon which to erect an archives building. We have other property adjacent to the lot that we gave away upon which an archives building could be erected, but that will not satisfy those who have lots to sell [applause], and probably will not satisfy those who want to buy the lots.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman recently examined the statute under which it was intended to donate the lot for the memorial building?

Mr. MADDEN. I regret to say that I have not.

Mr. WALSH. I think if the gentleman will look at the law, he will find that it has expired and that this corner stone is located on land that does not belong to the society to which it was intended the lot should be given.

Mr. MADDEN. If that is the case, that is the place now to erect the archives building.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. We had a hearing on that very question, and the matter is now under consideration by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which I am chairman; and Col. Sherrill, in charge of public buildings and grounds, who represented the President at the corner-stone laying, admitted that the corner stone was laid without authority of law. The Judge Advocate General having rendered a ruling that in view of a law subsequently discovered his previous ruling that it was lawful was not correct. He said, however, as the hearings will show, that having practically completed the arrangements they thought they might as well go ahead with them.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it the intention of the gentleman's committee to report a bill to authorize the construction of an archives building?

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not know. I do not control the committee. I have only one vote in it.

Mr. MADDEN. If so, is it the intention to authorize that building to be erected on property owned by the Government?

Mr. LANGLEY. We certainly do not intend to authorize the beginning of a building that will take a decade to complete unless the Government of the United States expends seven or eight million dollars in order to do it, and that is the exact situation with regard to that structure. We have had some experience along that line already, as, for instance, the Washington Monument. I am inclined to favor the views of the Secretary of War and the Fine Arts Commission that the pending resolution should be amended so as to read that the Secretary of War shall have discretionary power to determine exactly how much money shall be subscribed and paid in before the project is started. I think that is the view of the committee of which I am chairman. I might add that representatives of the American Legion who have appeared before our committee are opposed to erecting any monument or memorial building for the World War veterans until the sick and disabled are properly provided for and a just compensation law has been enacted.

With regard to the other proposition, if the gentleman will yield further, we have that matter under consideration now. I concede that we need an archives building, but we also need other buildings in this country, hundreds of them. The Government business is being transacted in many places under conditions that are disgraceful to this Republic, and if we permit another body to stick in here and there a provision authorizing the construction of buildings that existing law does not permit and has not authorized, the first thing we know we country dirt-road farmer Congressmen will be knocked out of any public buildings at all, and I am opposed to any such procedure as this. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will concur in the motion that I have made. I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry. If I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], do I surrender the floor? He wants to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, the Chair assumes, desires to offer a preferential motion.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, this archives building is authorized by law. The amendment which I have offered was recommended by the Director of the Budget, and at the time I offered this amendment it was ruled out on a point of order upon the ground that there was no authority of law for the construction of this building or the acquisition of the land. As a matter of fact, this archives building was authorized almost eight years ago in the last omnibus public-building act passed by Congress, and if I can have the attention of the Members, I want to read to them a portion of this act and leave it to them whether or not there is authority of law for the acquisition of a site for the construction of this building. I read from section 21 of an act passed on March 3, 1913:

SEC. 21. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare designs and estimates for a fireproof national archives building of modern library-stack type of architecture, containing not less than 3,000,000 cubic feet of space, suitable for the orderly storage of records, documents, and other papers which have accumulated in the various departments, independent establishments, and executive offices and in the files of the Senate and House of Representatives and are not needed for current use.

That the said designs and estimates shall be prepared with a view to the erection of the said building in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, upon a lot of land large enough to contain ultimately a building embracing 8,900,000 cubic feet of space.

That the said designs and estimates shall make provision for a building capable of subsequent extension, without impairing its architectural appearance from a capacity of 3,000,000 cubic feet to a capacity of 8,900,000 cubic feet.

That before the said designs and estimates are completed inspection shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury of the best modern national archive buildings in Europe, and consultation shall be had with the best authorities in Europe on the construction and arrangement of archive buildings.

That the said designs and estimates shall provide for the construction of a building the total cost of which, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, shall not exceed the sum of $1,500,000.

That whenever the said designs and estimates have been approved by a commission consisting of the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Interior, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in his discretion, to purchase, or cause to be taken for public use, by condemnation or otherwise, as a site for said building, any piece of land of the size defined in this section the purchase of which shall be approved by the said commission.

That for the preparation of said designs and estimates the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be expended for employment of technical and engineering services in the office of the Supervising Architect.

Mr. MADDEN. That is an authorization only to prepare the plans for such a building.

Mr. DALLINGER. Not at all. It contemplates the construction of a fireproof archives building, the total cost of which shall not exceed the sum of $1,500,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. That act has never been repealed, except in so far as it has been modified by not requiring the traveling abroad by a commission to examine foreign archives buildings.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman be willing to appropriate $500,000 to-day to buy a lot, if we already have a lot where we can erect the building without any cost?

Mr. DALLINGER. In regard to that, under the plan of the Fine Arts Commission, which everyone who has seen it admires, other buildings are contemplated to be erected on the other lots that the Government owns.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Would the gentleman please read that first paragraph again? I took it to be an authorization to prepare plans for a building costing not to exceed $1,500,000. I do not see where the gentleman gets any authorization for the building.

Mr. LANGLEY. He can not cite it. There is no such law in existence.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman kindly read it again?
Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

SEC. 21. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to prepare designs and estimates for a fireproof national archives building of modern library-stack type of architecture, containing not less than 3,000,000 cubic feet of space, suitable for the orderly storage of records, documents, and other papers which have accumulated in the various departments, independent establishments, and executive offices and in the files of the Senate and House of Representatives and are not needed for current use. * * *
* * * That the said designs and estimates shall provide for the construction of a building the total cost of which, including heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, shall not exceed the sum of $1,500,000.
That whenever the said designs and estimates have been approved by a commission consisting of the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Interior, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in his discretion, to purchase, or cause to be taken for public use, by condemnation or otherwise, as a site for said building any piece of land of the size defined in this section the purchase of which shall be approved by said commission.

So there is no question about the authority. We not only authorized but we directed the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase the site when the plans were approved. As a matter of fact, the plans were approved by that commission, and one of the members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations has a photostatic copy of that approval by that commission; so that the Secretary of the Treasury is not only authorized but directed to purchase this site by existing law; and the only thing that is needed is the appropriation of money by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BEGG. The appropriation of what money—for the building or for the plans?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman contend that there is authority for the appropriation of money for the building or for the plans? I concede the plans.

Mr. DALLINGER. That act authorizes and directs the Secretary to purchase that site when the plans are approved.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman contend that he would have authority to erect a building thereon, or that we would have any authority to appropriate money as the legislation stands to-day?

Mr. DALLINGER. I think that, taking that act in its entirety, there is no question whatever that the intention of Congress was to authorize a maximum authorization of $1,500,000 for the building and the site, and the Secretary was directed to purchase the site whenever those plans were approved.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will my friend yield to me?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. LANGLEY. Regardless of whether the gentleman's last answer is correct or not, does the gentleman believe that Congress ought to go ahead and purchase property when the Government already owns enough property in the District of Columbia to build five times as many buildings as the Government needs?

Mr. DALLINGER. I certainly do; because upon every one of the sites now owned by the Government of the United States, in accordance with the general plan of building up and down the Mall, other buildings are intended to be erected.

Mr. LANGLEY. Whose plan is that, the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. All right. I have very little respect for its plans.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to enter into a technical discussion of whether under the law without further authority there could be erected the building. The question of the gentleman from Ohio does not go to the core of the issue. This has nothing to do with the construction of the building. This is for a site for a building, including a certain amount of money for technical services, and we will dismiss that particular item altogether. Certainly nobody would question whether we have authority under the law to get the site. That is what this is for. As to whether it is wise or not——

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. EVANS. Is it not a fact that this authority mentioned in the statute to which attention was called was used to purchase property, and the site purchased was used for another purpose?

Mr. FESS. If that is true, that does not nullify what we are attempting to do here. Let me call your attention to just one item. I sympathize with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I fully and deeply as well as sincerely sympathize with the efforts of the chairman of the committee and those interested in not allowing the Budget System to be broken down by additional amendments in another body, which if offered here would be subject to a point of order. All I ask is this: I would like to present just briefly the tremendous importance of this proposed building by citing the figures given to the House on June 3, 1916, by myself, on the occasion when we have under discussion this item and when I read to you the report from the fire marshal of the District of Columbia of the number of fires that they had had in Government buildings here in the Capital since 1873. The number is over 250, and of these fires 6 of them were total losses, and the amount of valuable records that was destroyed, especially by the fire of 1851, which destroyed one whole portion of the Congressional Library, simply is beyond estimate. I would like also to call your attention to this fact, that ours is the only great Government in the world that does not have an archives building. I leave that without further argument as a remarkable statement that nobody will question.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman kindly yield to me? Is it not also true that this is the only Government in the world that has not other public buildings in which to transact other Government activities that are decently constructed?

Mr. FESS. I think the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will agree with me that there are some buildings that we can easily get along without, and he will agree with me, I know, that we ought to gather these scattered archives that are some of them in cellars down here in the Patent Office where these records have been corroded and totally destroyed and we ought to put those records somewhere where a building can be erected to preserve them.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman's statement is correct, but why not put all in one building and take care of the whole country while we are about it?

Mr. FESS. I would not care that that would be done, but the movement for an archives building is more than 40 years old and every time the suggestion is made it meets with just such objections as we now hear.

Mr. LANGLEY. And if it go on this way it will soon be 40 years since we have had a public-building bill.

Mr. FESS. But you must build an archives building without any reference to some little post-office building down in Podunk or some other place.

Mr. LANGLEY. I will answer the gentleman on that point in my own time.

Mr. FESS. This building ought to be built in the Capital to preserve the valuable archives that are being lost, and I know that the gentleman agrees with me. I wish the Members of the House would examine the facts I presented on June 3, 1916, on the needs of this structure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the difficulty with any such proposition as this is that we are so frequently urged to the support of a particular real-estate deal through the need for a building for a special purpose. We recognize the need for an archives building, but that being granted does not mean we have to appropriate a large amount of money to buy some more real estate when the complaint now of the people of Washington is that the Government owns too much real estate here. Among the things we should know before we spend a half million dollars for real estate as a beginning of expenditure of many million dollars for an archives building would be the possibility of other buildings being available now for this purpose. If gentlemen will look at the hearings on the sundry civil bill, conducted by Mr. Good when chairman of the Committee on Appropriations last year, and note the discussion of the Patent Office Building, I think you will be convinced that the present Patent Office Building is not satisfactory for the work of that office, and good results can not be secured from that service until that organization is given a better building. The examiners who have the most important work to be done are all grouped together, a great many in one room together, subject to constant interruption. But that building would be an ideal building for the use of an archives building or for the storage of archives, because it has walls 4 feet thick of masonry and limestone which would support the necessary improvements to be made and is thoroughly fireproof. There is a large interior space which by being covered over would give an immense amount of room to store all necessary records.

It is centrally located on Seventh Street, accessible and available for all branches of the Government. That building would be ideal for an archives building, and the money that it will take to improve it and make it properly available for the work of the Patent Office would put up a new building for the Patent Office that would be much better than the present one. And I submit we ought to take into consideration such alternatives as that before we enter upon any such real-estate speculation as this amendment provides for.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is absolutely correct in what he says. We have had the same experience in connection with the discussion of other matters, including a botanic garden. We own here in Washington already five times as much land as is necessary upon which to construct the finest botanic garden in the world, and yet there is a propaganda on foot for the purpose of purchasing a lot of other land, owned by some real estate syndicate here in the District of Columbia, for a botanic garden. That is the point I am seeking to make. A lot of people are seeking to sell the Government more land when we have too much already. You gentlemen who have all the public buildings you need in the large populated centers do not care so much about it; but when you talk about erecting a public building, or something of that sort, here in the District of Columbia you call it patriotism. When we talk about some public building that we absolutely need in our own sections of the country, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] refers to it as a "Podunk," or something of that sort. And the people generally, and some of the elite press, call it graft and "pork barrel." I am tired and sick of it, and I think the entire country is. And we ought to go ahead and get all these necessary buildings together in one omnibus bill and take decent care of all sections of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman's committee reported out an omnibus public buildings bill since he has been chairman of it?

Mr. LANGLEY. No, sir; and if the gentleman from Alabama, my old schoolmate and friend, can devise some method of hastening the lethargic machinery of this House on that matter more than I can, I will, out of my personal fortune, small as it is, buy him a gold medal and pin it on his bosom myself as a tribute to his ingenuity and celerity. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it seems to me there are just two different propositions to be decided as to whether we shall make this appropriation. In the first place, I contend there is no authority in law to make this appropriation at this time for this purpose, and not being a lawyer I am not taking any chance of making the contention that it is not legal. The statute that was read by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] authorized this commission to buy a plat of ground for a particular purpose. They have exercised the right given them, namely, the buying of a plat of ground. That discharges their authority under the law. If it does not, we do not need any other authority of law to buy a piece of ground for any other purpose under the sun. Now, I am not a lawyer, as I said before, but that is simple reason and common sense. We authorize a few men to buy a piece of land under a particular statute; they buy that land; then the authority has been discharged and nullified. Now, the fact that we have used that land for something else does not warrant coming in under the same statute and saying that they have authority to buy again. The statute only further authorizes them to draw plans, in the first part of it, plus the buying of the property. Now, the other angle of the proposition, which, it seems to me, ought to warrant our consideration, is: Is it wise to buy this piece of property at this time? Every one of us knows that there are temporary buildings, set to-day on Government property, that will within a few years be torn down. Now, what are you going to do with that land in a year or two years? My distinguished colleague and friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] says that the archives building has been before the country for 40 years, and we are still functioning, and I think it shows no very great danger of national disaster if we do not build for a little time. It is a defect in his argument to say that we must have it this year else we perish.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman give me one minute more?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman tell us what became of the land that they bought for this purpose?

Mr. BEGG. The Treasury Annex is located upon it. Now, I do not believe that every foot of available space in our public buildings is now utilized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BEGG. I would like to finish this statement, and then if I have time I will yield.

I can take the whole body of Congress into some of the temporary buildings and show them that they are good enough, warm enough, and sanitary enough for a temporary office building for another year, if we must surrender some office building that is fireproof, for the purpose of filing records. We are trying and attempting to make a record of economy, and yet every day or two we are asked to vote $500,000 or $10,000,000 or $50,000,000 for this, that, and the other thing. And I am contending that the matter can wait without any damage.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that those who are deeply interested in the preservation of the records of the Government, as we all are, will not spend time in quarreling with one another as to the need of such a provision. I deeply sympathize with a proposition for an archives building, for a building for the General Accounting Office, and for other buildings where the Government needs are clearly defined, but there ought to be a very orderly course of procedure in this matter. We have had much discussion with respect to the usurpation of power by appropriation committees, thereby depriving legislative committees of the duties assigned to them under the rules of the House. This proposition, I think, makes a direct encroachment upon the prerogatives of legislative committees. I was very much gratified when the Appropriation Committee of this House in this session began to hold steadily to the regular methods of making appropriations, to comply with existing law, and thus abandoned the field of legislation which had been so fascinating for Appropriation Committees heretofore.

I believe that this House owes it to this Committee on Appropriations, because of the adoption of the plan before us, to insist upon the regular legislative course in making authorizations for this purpose.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. If the Senate committee is permitted to bring forward appropriations in this form, what becomes of the legislative authority of the committees of the House charged with legislation?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will my friend yield now?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope I do not interrupt the general course of the gentleman's remarks, but I want to call his attention to the fact that the only cases in which the committee of which he is a prominent member and of which I am the chairman has yielded on that question where when we wanted hospital legislation as quickly as possible, and therefore we yielded to the Committee on Appropriations to put it in a bill without any legislative authority.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I concur fully with the gentleman from Kentucky in the proposition that there has been a yielding of legislative authority to the exigencies for the disabled service men, but that question is not involved in this transaction.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is right.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The House committee has held steadily through the sessions of this Congress to the rule that it should deal fairly and squarely with every Member of this House with reference to this important question.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Suppose we opened the whole range on this subject. Where is the end? By amendments on an appropriation bill the power of legislative committees will be destroyed. The attitude of the House Committee on Appropriations, so commendably taken in this session of Congress, will be destroyed. I believe that we should stand firmly in support of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to this proposition.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. DALLINGER. I want to ask the gentleman from Nebraska if he will not tell the House frankly whether or not he does not think his committee, eight years ago, in the omnibus public building bill of 1913, intended to pass legislation contemplating an archives building costing $1,500,000 for the site?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that 113 of the buildings carried in that bill of 1913 are untouched. Why? Because they could not secure bids within the limit of the appropriation. The Treasury Department has declined to submit recommendations for appropriations thus far with reference to the enlargement of the limit of cost. Your committee has refrained from taking up that subject with the large burden that it would entail. The bills now on the calendar and those in the bill of 1913 would require at least $150,000,000 to square the record justly and equitably with the Members of this House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, throughout my entire service in this House I have advocated the erection of a public building for every governmental activity. I have always been in favor of having the Government transact its business in its own buildings instead of paying exorbitant rents.

I believe there should be an archives building, but I feel that I can say with absolute certainty that if this proposition were the individual proposition of any Member on the floor of this House having hundreds of acres in the District of Columbia upon which this building could be erected not a single one of them would propose to buy land from anybody else for the purpose of erecting it on purchased land. [Applause.]

Several years ago a lot was bought immediately across Pennsylvania Avenue from the Treasury Building for the erection of an archives building. As I said the other day, the instant that property was bought the clamor for an archives building ceased. It was not for an archives building that the clamor was instituted. It was for the sale of the property. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is not the only question before this House, so far as the amendment is concerned, simply whether we shall buy more property or not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is all.

Mr. SNELL. It has nothing to do with the question of whether or not we will build an archives building in the future?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No.

As I was saying, a few years ago Congress bought a lot just across from the Treasury Building on Pennsylvania Avenue. That was not used for an archives building, and it was used only a little while ago as the site for an annex to the Treasury Building.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Just to keep the record straight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It always was my understanding that the site of the Interior Department building was bought for an archives building, and that that section of the square that is now covered by the annex to the Treasury was purchased for a building for the Department of Justice, and the then Attorney General objected to the size of the lot, and subsequently the annex to the Treasury was put there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The information I have on the subject is not in accordance with that of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LANGLEY. I will show that fully.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Very recently the Treasury Department went across Pennsylvania Avenue and took the vacant lot which the Government had purchased when it already had plenty of vacant land and built on it an annex to the Treasury.

Now, in three or four lines after this proposition for the purchase of more property, at an expense of half a million, it is proposed to spend a million dollars in erecting an addition to the Treasury Building at the north end of that building. If the proposition had been made to erect an archives building on land owned by the United States Government at either end of the Treasury Building, it would not have received any support whatever in Washington. The question arises, why $500,000? Why not $400,000? Why not $600,000? Whose piece of property, proposed to be sold at exactly $500,000, is to be bought? Why the specific sum of $500,000 unless a particular piece of property is sought to be sold to the Government, when, as I have just said, the Government has acres and acres of its own upon which this building could be erected?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am ready for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] that the House recede and concur in the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DALLINGER) there were—ayes 10, noes 116.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that.

Mr. DALLINGER. I withdraw the point.

Accordingly the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. On that I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 131, noes 8.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 21: Page 47, line 21, insert: "Washington, D. C., Treasury Building vaults: For the construction of a three-story structure in the north court of the Treasury Building, consisting of a two-story vault with office space above, including all necessary mechanical and vault equipment for the same, and all incidental changes required to the Treasury Building in connection therewith, $1,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 21. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to make my position entirely clear upon this matter. When the question was first raised about giving the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction over all the appropriation bills I favored it, and resented the criticisms against that committee. If the question were presented to me again, with the knowledge that I now have of what has occurred since that time, I am not so sure that I would be on their side. At any rate, I want to say that the chairman of a committee in another body which has the same jurisdiction as that of the committee of which I am chairman in the House has told me that he was not even consulted at all about these items that the Senate committee has surreptitiously stuck into this bill. Our committee has favorably reported one of these items. Now, why not let us go ahead and consider it in a decent and orderly fashion? If any committee other than the Committee on Appropriations is to have anything to do with legislation, let us go ahead in a decent way, as has been suggested, and consider these matters and have hearings upon them, and report the bills to the House and pass them, and then let the Senate do the same thing, and then appropriate the money necessary for the purpose. That is the proper and dignified function of Congress. If we are not going to do it in that way, let us discharge all of the other committees and go home, except the few who think they are running everything, and who will if we do not stop them. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the House agree to the further conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. MADDEN, Mr. MAGEE, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have just been consulting with the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, in order to have this record straight. The site on which now stands the Department of the Interior Building, the architect told me, was purchased for the archives building, and the site on which now stands the Treasury Annex was purchased for the Department of Justice. So my recollection is correct, as shown by the official records.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish to inquire whether or not there was as little information given as to where the property to be purchased was located as there is in this particular instance?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not see the relevancy of the gentleman's inquiry. I stated what I knew to be the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was unable to make myself clear to the gentleman from Wisconsin, but what I meant to say was this, that in the proposition which we have just had before us we knew not where the piece of land proposed for purchase lay. When the purchase of each of the other pieces of property—those referred to by the gentleman—was authorized, Congress then did not know what particular piece was going to be bought, and did not know until after it was bought. That was my information. There were conflicting rumors as to the purpose for which each piece was bought.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Did not the commission that was authorized to select the site select a site just south of the Post Office Department, and is not that the site contemplated in this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This bill does not say so, and I have no information upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE FOREIGN SERVICE.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, at the instance of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], who is not here at this moment, I ask unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs be permitted to file the view of the minority on H. R. 10213 at any time within the next five days.

The SPEAKER. What is the subject of the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is H. R. 10213, for the improvement of the foreign service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we could not hear the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs have five days in which to file minority views on H. R. 10213, for the improvement of the foreign service. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 10101), with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Tuesday it had considered the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I understood there was a point of order reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no point of order reserved. The Clerk will continue reading the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, heretofore or hereafter made in other acts and chargeable in any proportion against the revenues of the District of Columbia, shall be paid in the proportions of 40 per cent from the Treasury of the United States and 60 per cent from the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. What is the situation with reference to the payment of the indebtedness of the District; does that come under the 60–40 provision?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We have a provision in the bill attempting to put it under the 60–40 provision. The interest and sinking fund on the 3.65 bonds. We have a proviso that they shall be paid under the 60–40 limitation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the language just read by the Clerk imply that all the appropriations for the next fiscal year are to be payable at the rate of 60–40, and would not that include interest and payments on the principal of the bonds?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am mistaken in what I said. We have let that alone entirely; under the first clause that money would be distributed at the rate of 60–40. We have taken off the provision that was in the bill for a good many years that it was payable under the 50–50 proportion.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman permit me another question? Is this the situation, that bonds which heretofore have been issued and sold under the arrangement of 50–50 between the Government and the District of Columbia are now to be paid at the rate of 60–40?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. There is no such arrangement in the law, that they shall be paid under the 50–50 arrangement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The bonds were authorized by the act of June 11, 1874, and the act which authorizes the issue of the bonds provided that they should be paid upon a proper proportional basis.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What was the proportion then in existence?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The 50–50 plan was adopted four years after that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Were the bonds sold prior to 1878?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Shortly after they were authorized, and they sold as low as 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. On page 65 of the bill, under the item of "Interest and sinking fund," it reads as follows:

For interest and sinking fund on the funded debt, $400,000.

The committee have added this proviso:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the redemption of any bonds above their par value plus accrued interest.

My opinion is that for many years past these bonds have been redeemed by the Treasury at considerably above their par value. The committee thought that when bonds were issued—for instance, Government bonds—that we should not be compelled to pay one-sixth or one-tenth plus the interest when the bonds were redeemed. We have been redeeming them heretofore in that way.

Mr. MANN. You can not redeem them in any other way. You can not buy bonds unless at the market value.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. When the bonds become due and they go to the Treasury for the money they can be redeemed at their par value. Nearly all the bonds were purchased for 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. MANN. That makes no difference.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. What is the interest on the bonds?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Three sixty-five.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That will not sell bonds at par.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They are selling above par, and they are coming to the Treasury and they are redeeming them above par and the accrued interest.

Mr. SNELL. How can they ask for more if they go there on their own initiative?

Mr. MANN. They can not; that is not the way it is done. The only way they can get them is to buy them.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think the Treasurer is violating the law.

Mr. SNELL. There is a difference between buying bonds in open market and redeeming them.

Mr. MANN. The reason why Government bonds to-day are less than par is because the market is less than par. You might as well say that the Government could not buy a bond at more than 90 when the market value was 100.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield? I do not know that I quite understood the gentleman. Why is the Government redeeming the bonds at a premium?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I can not tell, except I believe the Secretary of the Treasury for several years past has been violating the law. In other words, he has been redeeming them when they came there, and instead of giving par he has been giving 105 and 106 with the accrued interest. There will come a time in 1924 when the limitation of time will expire.

Mr. BRIGGS. Did the subcommittee interrogate the Secretary of the Treasury as to the reasons why they were seeking to redeem the bonds above par and were redeeming them above par?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It did not.

Mr. MANN. They are not redeeming them—they are buying them.

Mr. BRIGGS. Why has this practice continued?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We do not know, but we try in this bill to head it off.

Mr. BRIGGS. And the gentleman thinks the provision in the bill does that?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We think it does.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As I understand it, we are proceeding with the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I desire to read at this time the following from the Statutes at Large, volume 20, page 410:

And there is hereby appropriated, out of the proportional sum which the United States may contribute toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 11, 1878, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and annually thereafter, such sums as will, with the interest thereon at the rate of 3.65 per cent per annum, be sufficient to pay the principal of the 3.65 bonds of the District of Columbia, issued under the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, at maturity; which said sums the Secretary of the Treasury shall annually invest in said bonds at not exceeding the par value thereof; and all bonds so redeemed shall cease to bear interest and shall be canceled and destroyed in the same manner that United States bonds are canceled and destroyed.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Now, as to the point of order on the proposition, if the gentleman from Illinois will read this, I think he will see that it does not apply especially to this matter.

Mr. MANN. I did not have particular reference to that.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This paragraph provides:

Appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, heretofore or hereafter made in other acts—

And so forth.

The "other acts" is the matter that we have reference to particularly. These matters have been carried heretofore in the sundry civil appropriation bill, in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and so forth, and the language which we are now discussing and to which the point of order is made applies to these other acts.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but I do not know whether there will be any other appropriation acts to carry appropriations or not. Does the Chair desire to hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. This is legislation, pure and simple. It is not an appropriation at all.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is a limitation.

Mr. MANN. It is not a limitation at all. It is legislation with reference to other appropriation bills. It is quite clear that while the paragraph itself relates only to appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, that it could just as well have provided that hereafter all appropriations shall be on the 60–40 basis. It is not an appropriation; it is legislation.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, to my mind, as far as the passage of this bill is concerned at this time, it is immaterial whether this provision is in the bill or not. While I am not willing to concede that it is subject to the point of order, it is immaterial to me, so far as the passage of the bill is concerned, whether it is left in or not. If the gentleman desires to have it stricken out, well and good.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say that this same matter was under consideration by the Chair a year ago, when the present occupant of the chair was in the chair. At that time the Chair looked up certain precedents, and the Chair at that time found the following precedent from volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents:

A paragraph in an appropriation bill reenacting verbatim the existing law is not subject to a point of order.

While that might seem to govern, the Chair does not think so, for existing law has not been repeated verbatim in this particular bill. The bill changes the date as given in the previous act from 1922 to 1923. Therefore the Chair would feel that the citation is not binding in this particular case, and makes the section subject to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair will pardon me, that citation relates to inserting in a bill matter which is already law. There is no law on this subject except for the fiscal year 1922.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair realizes that.

Mr. MANN. That is not law for the next year.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The law is that the appropriations shall be made upon the 50–50 basis.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is a matter of dispute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that this is not a repetition of the law verbatim.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the question may be raised there under the Holman rule, that this is a reduction of expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. Would the gentleman from Kentucky like to be heard upon that ground?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I merely submit the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels constrained to rule in this regard, after an examination of the precedent, having looked into the matter a year ago, that this is subject to the point of order, and so holds. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

If the estimated net revenues of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, are not sufficient to meet the proportion of the appropriations for that fiscal year charged against such revenues by this and all other acts, or which may be estimated to be charged against such revenues by acts that may be approved during such fiscal year, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall increase the rates of taxation on real estate and tangible personal property sufficiently to make up the difference: Provided, however, That such rates of taxation shall in no event be less than 1¾ per cent nor more than 2 per cent.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question with respect to this paragraph. I note in the report that the committee states that the Federal Government's proportion of the appropriations carried in this bill will be seven and a half million dollars in round figures. I am authentically advised that the revenues of the District for the fiscal year 1923 will be about $14,000,000. If the appropriation carried in this bill, amounting to $20,000,000, becomes a law, what will become of the additional amount raised by the District revenues of a million and a half dollars?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I reply to that question by stating that the $14,000,000 has not yet been raised. They are only anticipating that if we come up to their estimates they will raise that amount. However, if there is any so-called surplus it will go back into the Treasury under miscellaneous receipts. The $14,000,000 has not yet been raised. This bill has not yet been passed. I do not know what the Senate is going to ask; I do not know what increases the gentleman is going to ask. I understand he is going to ask a great many—among others, in the first place, for $3,000,000 for an aqueduct and for money for improving all of the roads leading into Maryland. However, the $14,000,000 has not yet been raised, and they are not obliged to raise it. I hope they will not have to raise $14,000,000 by taxation in the District.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for one question?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. Why is the limit on District property here ever to be but 2 per cent?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The statute law is 1½ per cent. That statute law we placed in here last year as a minimum and 2 per cent as a maximum, but they have never reached the 2 per cent yet, although they came very near doing it last year, but the statute law is 1½ per cent and last year we made it 2 per cent as the maximum.

Mr. SNELL. That is the reason it was put in?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. That makes property owners in the District pay much less taxes than any city of its size in this part of the country?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman wants me to say so, I will say very much.

Mr. SNELL. There is no question but that the average town of which I know anything about pays at least 3 per cent on a very much higher assessed valuation.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I want to ask, further, if the present tax rate of 1¾ is maintained the revenues of the District will be approximately $14,000,000?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think they figure $14,000,000 on the 2 per cent; that is, on the 20 mills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if I am right in understanding that the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia this year was 1¾ per cent?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think that is what they started out to raise and probably did raise, but bear in mind that is not on the full value of the property, but it is only on the assessment of two-thirds; but in many instances, to my personal knowledge, I will say instead of making it two-thirds the assessed value they made it about one-fourth the assessed value.

Mr. DUNBAR. So the purpose is to assess on two-thirds of the market value?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is the purpose.

Mr. DUNBAR. But the gentleman's observation leads him to believe that it has only been assessed at about one-fourth of its value.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Some property I know of has been assessed at one-fourth.

Mr. DUNBAR. What does the gentleman mean by rate of taxation on tangible personal property? What is tangible personal property?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is any kind of personal property—your automobile, your household furniture, your horses, dogs, and things of that kind. Any personal property that is not real estate is tangible personal property. Of course the gentleman understands what intangible personal property is. It means bonds, mortgages, money, credits, and so forth.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then, I am to understand that a party living in the District of Columbia who owned $1,000,000 worth of United States Steel Corporation bonds would not pay any taxes on those bonds?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the assessor could get a return that he had them, he would tax him three-tenths of 1 per cent.

Mr. DUNBAR. Well, it is the duty of the assessor to get the returns, is it not?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is his duty, but I am inclined to believe it has been impossible for him to get returns.

Mr. MANN. He sends blanks to all the Members of the House here; how many make those returns? Has the gentleman from Minnesota made his return on personal property? Have other gentlemen made returns on personal property?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir; but I have not any intangible personal property, because I happen to be short of that kind of property.

Mr. MANN. Every man here has intangible personal property.

Mr. DUNBAR. I want to inform the gentleman from Illinois I have never received any of those blanks, and so, perhaps, that is indicative of the careless manner in which the property in the District of Columbia is assessed.

Mr. MANN. I do not know where the gentleman lives, but it is indicative of the careless turning over of the blanks to the gentleman.

Mr. DUNBAR. I want to answer briefly. I will say I have my affairs so managed that if any blanks were left at my office I would receive them, and I believe it indicative of the careless manner in which property is assessed. Now, in the event of the million dollars' worth of Steel Corporation bonds being returned, the amount that he could be assessed for taxation would be three-tenths of 1 per cent?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is all.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then it is possible for all plutocrats who wish to escape the payment of taxation to come to Washington City and live here, and by living here, taking up their residence here, do so?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have heard rumors that that had been done.

Mr. DUNBAR. May I ask another question? Why are they not paying more than three-tenths?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Because the law fixes it at three-tenths of 1 per cent.

Mr. DUNBAR. What law?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The statute law of the District of Columbia just a few years ago. Until the last three or four years they did not pay anything, but finally we passed a law, not an appropriation bill—but we passed a regular law—making it three-tenths of 1 per cent.

Mr. DUNBAR. Can the gentleman indicate what he thinks was the reason for such a law?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I should hate to express my full opinion along that line for the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Mr. Chairman, on January 30, when the appropriation for the Shipping Board was under consideration, I made some remarks relative to the employment of attorneys by the board, criticizing some of the high salaries being paid to attorneys and stating that many of them could not earn anything like the salaries being paid in private practice and that the salaries of many of them had been increased within the last two or three years as much as 200 and 300 per cent in some cases.

In the course of my remarks I referred to Hon. Caleb Powers, who formerly represented the eleventh district of the State of Kentucky, and made the statement that during his services here we all knew he had studied law in one of the law universities of this city. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] also on the day previous had made reference to the employment of Mr. Powers as an attorney at $5,000 a year. I have received a letter from Mr. Powers stating that he thinks that Mr. JONES and I have done him an injustice. He sent a copy of this letter to Mr. JONES. Neither of us, of course, desire to do Mr. Powers an injustice, and we wish to ask the privilege of having this letter printed in the RECORD.

Mr. Powers quotes from my remarks and also from the remarks made by Mr. JONES. It will be seen that his statement by no means contradicts what was said by either one of us, except that Mr. JONES stated that he was one of the field attorneys. Mr. Powers states that he is not a field attorney, but is employed here in the city of Washington. This, of course, was a mistake that could not possibly do Mr. Powers an injustice. The point we were trying to make was that attorneys have been employed at high salaries, without particular reference to past experience or special qualifications. Mr. Powers is only one of a great number who has been employed at a liberal salary. Without referring to Mr. Powers any more than a very great number of other attorneys employed, I think our contention has been abundantly sustained by the record. I did not say that Mr. Powers had not practiced law prior to his coming to Washington. Frankly, however, I had been under that impression, and perhaps such an inference might be drawn from my remarks. Mr. Powers states that he had practiced law for several years in a small town in Kentucky before coming to Washington, and by inference states he enjoyed a lucrative practice, though he does not say to what extent. I do wish to say, however, that after he left Congress, instead of returning to Kentucky and taking up his former practice, he remained here and was engaged in other business, not pertaining to the law, at the time he was given this very lucrative salary of $5,000 as a lawyer for the Shipping Board.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have printed the letter to which I have referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks to have printed in the RECORD the letter referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1922.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date January 30, 1922, pages 1918 and 1920, there appear the following statements in a speech delivered by you on the affairs of the United States Shipping Board:

"It was said the other day that a former Member of this House from the State of Kentucky, Mr. Caleb Powers, whom we all know studied law only two or three years ago while serving as a Member of this House, has been put on the salary roll at $5,000 a year. * * *

"They state that they need admiralty lawyers. Everybody knows that when they employed Mr. Massey, an admiralty lawyer from Oklahoma, and Mr. Caleb Powers, of Kentucky, they are as well equipped to try admiralty cases as a New York lawyer would be to try a replevin case about a mule."

It is true that I know but little about admiralty law. It is further true that I have nothing to do with either admiralty law or admiralty practice in the Shipping Board. I am in the contracts and opinions section.

In our conversation over the telephone you stated that you had relied for your information upon the statement of some Member made in debate upon the floor of the House a day or so ago, but could not recall who it was. It was possibly Mr. JONES of Texas.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 27, page 1824, Mr. JONES is reported to have made the following statement:

"Mr. Chairman, if I am in error, somebody will correct me, but I am informed that Caleb Powers first studied law while he was in Congress. He is being paid $5,000 per year, and I do not suppose he is devoting all his time to the Shipping Board. He is one of those field attorneys."

I am not a field attorney. My work is in the office, and my hours are from 9 a. m. to 5 p. m.

Mr. JONES is mistaken, too, about the time I began to study law. Before coming to Congress I had graduated in law from the Valparaiso (Ind.) University, Valparaiso, Ind., and also from Center College, Danville, Ky., where I was under the tutelage of the late ex-Gov. J. Proctor Knott, of Duluth fame, who was one of the greatest lawyers in his day.

In the former school, my class standing was about second in a class of 44; in the latter I stood first in a class of 20. Gov. Knott was partial enough to me to say that I was the best student he ever taught.

I was admitted to the bar in Barbourville, Ky., in the year 1894, and was actively engaged in the general practice there for several years, taking part in many of the leading cases in that section of the State. One of my law partners, Judge Flem. D. Tompson, is now a judge of the Court of Appeals of the State of Kentucky; and my other law partner, Mr. Sawyer A. Smith, is now United States attorney for the eastern district of Kentucky.

During the eight unfortunate years of my life I studied law most of the time. I have also taken law lectures at night during my stay in this city in two of its great universities, to wit, the George Washington University and the Georgetown University.

I feel that I am amply prepared to do the character of work in which I am engaged in the Shipping Board, and I think it is proving to be satisfactory. I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. JONES.

I hold no brief to speak for the Shipping Board; but I must say that I feel that the present administration of its affairs has been unjustly criticized. At any rate, in so far as my connection with it is concerned, I hope you will set me right before Congress and the country. I am,

Yours, very respectfully,

CALEB POWERS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Building inspection division: Inspector of buildings, $3,000; assistant inspectors of buildings—principal $2,000, 1 $1,500, 1 $1,400, 9 at $1,360 each; fire-escape inspector, $1,400; civil engineers or computers—1 $2,000, 1 $1,800, 1 $1,500; clerks—chief $1,800, 1 $1,050, 1 $1,000, 1 (who shall be a stenographer and typewriter) $1,000, 1 $900; messenger, $600; assistant inspector, $1,500.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I saw a report in the papers the other night to the effect that there were not sufficient inspectors for the purpose of inspecting buildings and elevators in the District. Was there any evidence brought before the committee at the time this appropriation bill was made up to that effect?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. There was not.

Mr. SNELL. What is the gentleman's idea in regard to that, as to whether we have sufficient employees to make proper inspection or not?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. My opinion is that we have.

Mr. SNELL. There is no question about it?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. There is no question about it.

Mr. SNELL. And you think there are competent men employed at the present time to do the work?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, as I understand—I do not know whether I am correctly informed or not—there is less appropriated for the purpose indicated in this particular paragraph than was recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. Certainly there is less appropriated than was asked for by the District Commissioners.

Now, replying a little bit further to the question put by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], I have read what Col. Keller, the engineer commissioner, said at the hearings. I quote from Col. Keller, under the heading of "Building inspection division," at page 5 of the hearings:

> In view of what you said I will not discuss the recommendation of the commissioners in reference to increase in salaries, but I wish to call your attention to the fact that the office of building inspector is a very important one in view of the activities now. It is on a very active scale, and we ought to have an increase in salary commensurate with the amount of the work involved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know who is correct, whether the officials of the Bureau of the Budget who made up the estimates that were submitted to the committee or whether back of them the commissioners themselves or whether Col. Keller in his expression of opinion at the hearings. But, of course, our knowledge that the service rendered by building inspectors is very important has been emphasized by the recent tragedy, and I think we ought to have some pretty full and definite and convincing information on this point and on a great many other points contained in this bill before we can feel confident that we are legislating in a wise and dependable manner. Now, I await the explanation which I suppose we may expect from my friend, the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not know any explanation I can make except that the committee after all the hearings obtainable decided that we would give them current law as to number and payment, and that we did, after a long and full hearing. There is one item, however, that I wish to state frankly to the gentleman from Virginia—we cut out an item of $1,000 that was in the budget, called "temporary employment of additional assistant inspector, $1,000." Other than that we left the matter just as it was, and, as I say, after a full hearing, the committee was very unanimous upon the subject.

Now, I will say this, and I merely say it now for the benefit of all present, that in every instance, from the beginning to the end of this bill, the increased appropriations were asked for for salaries, and I think that is probably the case in all the appropriation bills that have come before the House. In this particular bill the increases were never, I think, less than the $240 bonus, which was an emergency proposition. In some instances it was more than double what that was. We left out, as was the program of the full committee of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is chairman, all increases of salaries, because of this supposed $240 bonus, which we wanted to hereafter consider for all employees, and also the reclassification.

And I wish to say this, that there has been a good deal said about the law of 1878, the organic law, and so forth, and I am going to tell the House now something that I do not think even my friend from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] knows.

Even if we had stuck to the 50-50 plan, who has been paying this $240 bonus to the employees of the District of Columbia? Has the District of Columbia paid any part of it? No, sir; that has all come out of the Federal Treasury of the United States, the $240 bonus; not on the 60-40 basis, or the 50-50, but it has all come out of the Federal Treasury. Those are matters we thought of, and that is one of the reasons why we did not increase any salaries.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman says all the bonus came out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Why did not the Committee on Appropriations provide for that?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Because the matter was not called to our attention. We never thought of it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is the best reason—that you never thought of it.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, may I answer the gentleman?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. The bonus was never included in the District of Columbia bill.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No.

Mr. MADDEN. It was not included.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the reason why the District did not pay any part of it on account of the District employees.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Who had to do with it? Will the gentleman tell us about that?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think the committee on the legislative bill had something to do with it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Did not the Committee on Appropriations that handled the appropriation bill provide for it?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. We simply left it out. That is all we could do.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, that was an item inserted in the Senate on one of the appropriation bills, and, like all hasty legislation, when it went to conference that point was never thought of.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The reason why I asked about it was that I thought it had probably been going on two or three years.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It was an emergency matter. It passed under a general act, and included the District of Columbia, and so we let it go.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended five minutes. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was objection.

Mr. SNELL. I saw in the newspapers a statement that no one was available for the inspection of the elevator service except inspectors who worked nights. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. There is nothing in the hearings on that.

Mr. SNELL. Do you have elevator inspectors for the District?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly; we certainly have; and we have enough of them.

Mr. SNELL. Then that statement was absolutely untrue?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That statement was absolutely untrue.

Mr. SNELL. I think that statement should not be carried in the papers, or at least it ought to be refuted here, so that people may know that we are doing what is right and reasonable in the premises.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They have an adequate number of competent elevator inspectors in this city, and they are getting a good, fair salary. They are not getting that bonus, and will not until we remodel the salary list. They are not getting that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I may add to that the statement that the elevator inspectors are furnished with motor cycles in order the better to get about.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not wish to enter upon the question of motor cycles at present. That question will come up later and probably be the subject of considerable discussion.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would like to ask the gentleman what the duties are of these inspectors? I notice the papers the other day stated—or at least that is the impression I gained—that these inspectors never inspected buildings after they were built, to find out whether they complied with the prescribed standards of structural strength or not, and so on. I would like to know what duties they do perform, if they do not do something of that kind.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that I hold in my hand a copy of the building regulations, a small volume, and if he wants to know what their duties are he will find them in this volume, which I will hand over to him.

Mr. BRIGGS. I thought perhaps the gentleman from Minnesota had some information on that.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman is not going to get me mixed up in a discussion of the cause of the Knickerbocker Theater disaster. Somebody has neglected his duties about the inspection and the construction of buildings in the city of Washington, but I do not know who it is.

Mr. BRIGGS. Of course I did not mean to involve the gentleman in that controversy, but I may frankly state that the occurrence of that sad disaster was the thing that prompted me to ask what the duties of inspectors are, not particularly with reference to the Knickerbocker Theater building, but all buildings.

I understand that one of the commissioners of the District had been interviewed and that he said in that interview that it was to be supposed that buildings should be constructed in accordance with the specifications. If that is the case, what use is there in inspecting a building? If that is not one of the duties of a building inspector to see that the specifications are complied with, it ought to be made a part of his duties.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think it ought to be their duty. Whether they do it or not, I do not know.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Am I to understand that the section that provides for the 60–40 proposition has gone out of this bill on a point of order?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No, sir; it has not. That only refers to another matter of legislation. I think the 60–40 feature will remain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, of course the gentleman from Minnesota knows the regard in which I hold him. I would be the last man to try to involve him in an embarrassing discussion of what recently occurred in this city, but inasmuch as our attention has been directed to building-inspection matters by that occurrence I thought it was proper for me to refer to the building-inspection item in the bill as illustrative of the way in which the bill is made up. But when I mentioned that item the gentleman began to talk about irrelevant matters, or matters that struck me as irrelevant, as to the way in which expenditures are apportioned between the District and the United States, and the matter of the salary bonus. Those things I put aside as not pertinent, but I do wish for a moment to dwell upon the building-inspection item which I took the liberty of bringing up. It can not be controverted by anybody who is familiar with the facts that the Subcommittee on Appropriations in appropriating for this particular service and many other services very heavily reduced the estimates made by both the commissioners and the Budget Bureau, and I can not find upon what evidence it acted. On the building-inspection item there was no evidence whatever before the subcommittee except the statement of Col. Keller, which I have quoted, that more money was necessary on account of the importance of the service.

With the exception of two gentlemen who made statements about matters not really within the jurisdiction of the subcommittee, the only witnesses who appeared before it were Col. Keller and other District officials, and their evidence seems to have had little weight. So as to many important matters we are very much in a fog as to what we should do in passing upon this bill. Later on I shall endeavor to show again, as I tried to show day before yesterday, not only the extent to which the Committee on Appropriations have cut the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget but the very severe extent to which the Bureau of the Budget cut the estimates that were sent in by the Commissioners of the District, who know best about the needs and the necessities of the District. Two of the commissioners, all of whom were appointed by President Harding, are among the strongest and most experienced business men in the District, and the third is an able Army engineer, taking the place of Col. Kutz, his predecessor, who was a man of equal ability. Viewed in the light of the record, the bill is unsatisfactory. And such as it is, the bill gets very limited consideration. The other day five hours were assigned for general debate and a comparatively small percentage of that time was given to the discussion of the bill. Almost everything on the face of the earth and above the earth was discussed—because there was an elaborate speech on a proposed air service—to the exclusion of much real discussion of the bill except by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. And now, with the bill being considered under the five-minute rule, I do not think we have had as many as 40 Members of the House present at any time.

All of this inclines me to the conviction that we must try to discover some better method of procedure in governing, as we are charged by the Constitution with the exclusive duty of governing, the District of Columbia. I doubt extremely whether the budget system should have been applied to the District. I doubt extremely whether the location of all appropriation jurisdiction in a single committee is properly applicable to the District of Columbia, and at some time I shall do what I have ever hoped other men will do, try to suggest methods of procedure in substitution for those now in existence that are far from producing satisfactory results.

Mr. Chairman, I have no special interest in the affairs of the city of Washington and the outlying areas of the District. I am not a property owner here to any extent whatever. I have no business connections here of any character. I have only the same interest in the situation here that other gentlemen have, unless there is some stress to be placed on the fact that I happen to represent a constituency a part of which is closely related to Washington and concerned about its prosperity and general welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the committee in just a word or two of reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman rises in opposition to the pro forma motion made by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not care to say that I take the floor in opposition, but I want to say just a word in reply.

The chief argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] is that the commissioners made an estimate of their needs for the coming year, that the Bureau of the Budget cut those estimates, and that the Committee on Appropriations cut the Budget estimates. That is true. The gentleman also said in substance that about the only people who knew anything about the needs of the District of Columbia and how much money was required to run it, and so forth, were the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and he praised them up very much. Now, I want to ask the gentleman one pertinent question as an illustration. I could ask many others, but I will simply ask him one question. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia know what is needed; know their financial needs. All right. In this bill are two eight-room school buildings which the commissioners demand $140,000 each for building. In the gentleman's own city of Alexandria is a 12-room school building now just completed for which the price is only $70,000, and a new contract is about to be let for a 16-room school building in Alexandria for $80,000. Now, if we are going to take the estimates of men who will double and more the cost of school buildings, I say these gentlemen have not investigated very thoroughly. That is all I care to say. I will ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman put a question to me.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman admits what I say is true, does he not?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am willing to admit that things are done better in Virginia than anywhere else.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Is the gentleman willing to admit that school buildings in this city ought not to cost double what they do in Alexandria?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not know how the buildings compare with one another.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is what they do cost.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not know what the wages of labor is here. The gentlemen, however, must not think that I have ever assumed that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia know it all.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. But the gentleman has eulogized these commissioners——

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. As knowing more than anybody who is connected with this Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have little personal acquaintance with Mr. Rudolph, but from what I know of him I think he is a most admirable man.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. So do I.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And I have the same opinion of Mr. Oyster, with whom I am better acquainted.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. So have I.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And I include Col. Keller. I believe these officials know more in a day about the real needs of the District of Columbia than either my friend or I or the Budget officials would know in a week or a year.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I grant you that, but they apparently permit estimates to come to Congress for double the cost of buildings elsewhere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Plumbing inspection division: Inspector of plumbing, $2,000; assistant inspectors of plumbing—principal, $1,550, six at $1,360 each; clerks—two at $1,200 each, one, $900; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors of plumbing and laborers for such time as their services may be necessary, $2,000; draftsman, $1,350; sewer tapper, $1,000; three members of plumbing board, at $150 each;

In all, executive office, $126,520.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the economic condition of the country, as the whole world finds itself, involves a very serious consideration by the people and by the Governments, and involves the wisest and best constructive legislation. I have in my hand a circular or report from the American Exchange National Bank of New York, of the date of February 1, 1922, and it so clearly and forcefully, and I think accurately, comments upon the situation that I desire, and think it would be of benefit to the country, to have it incorporated in the RECORD. I will read it:

This is a strange world. Nothing is more apparent than the need of economic coordination, yet half of the nations of the earth are breaking their necks in ineffectual efforts to establish themselves in positions of independence from which they hope to win trade advantages. All the world aspires to produce goods and sell them to all the rest of the world, while buying nothing. The struggle for gold, the symbol of frugality and thrift, is on with a vengeance. The fight is being waged from the fancied security of tariff walls, or over the treacherously smooth roads of subsidies. The campaign is being conducted on artificial economic foods which can not sustain it through to the end. Imperial preferences, national protective tariffs and subsidies, in fact all of the machinery of economic fakerism and mock wizardry, are being employed by the nations which are ready for the struggle, while others labor under divided counsel to entrench themselves behind similar protected positions. The world perhaps does not realize the petrifying effects of all these protective measures. It would be hard to imagine anything more detrimental to the interests of coordination, the goal which our civilization must attain if it is to live, than a reversion to more intense economic nationalism. The difficulties in the way of the immediate realization of coordination mainly arise out of the fact that the industrial world is overdeveloped in some fields and underdeveloped in others. Protective tariffs mean that this obstruction to coordination will be enlarged and that when the world finally comes to consider coordination, if it ever does, it will find its difficulties even greater than they are now.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, there is profit in selling and there is profit in buying, but a nation no more than an individual can hope to sell exclusively and not buy, and I think that this comment of this bank so clearly and so forcefully, so intelligently analyzes the situation that I thought it ought to be preserved in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that the people may get the benefit of it. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries: Assessor, $3,500; assistant assessors—three at $3,000 each, one $2,000; five field men at $2,000 each; record clerks—one $1,800, two at $1,500 each, two (who shall also be typists) at $1,400 each, one $1,200; clerks—three at $1,400 each, two at $1,200 each, four at $1,000 each, one $900, one $720; draftsmen—one $1,600, two at $1,200 each; two stenographers and typewriters at $1,200 each; assistant or clerk, $900; messenger, $600; board of assistant assessors—clerk, $1,500; vault clerk, $900; messenger and driver, $600; temporary clerk hire, $500; in all, $56,920.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so to make a correction in a statement by the gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the committee, and to substantiate a statement made by me. The chairman stated that the existing tax rate was 1¾ cents.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman is mistaken; I said the existing tax law was the same as carried in this bill, but I understood that last year they attempted to levy a 1¾ rate.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The tax rate for this year is 1.82 in the District of Columbia, and last year was 1.95.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know of a city having as many improvements as they have in the District of Columbia where the tax rate is as low as 1.82?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I am not familiar with the tax rates in all of the cities. I am simply trying to show that the tax rate in the District in existence is 1.82, and last year it was 1.95, and attempting to show that the revenues of the District will this year reach a total of at least $14,000,000, and if this bill is passed there will be a surplus, if the Government contributes the proportion which it is stated it will contribute, and there will go to surplus the sum of one and three-quarters million dollars.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that the District is to pay its share of the bonus in case the bonus is allowed?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have not.

Mr. EVANS. And that the levy is on a two-thirds valuation?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I am taking into consideration that at a 2-cent rate fifteen millions will be raised from real estate, tangible, personal, and intangible property; there will be raised from taxation on real estate alone more than $12,000,000, and the miscellaneous receipts will swell it to more than $15,000,000, so that the Federal Government, if this bill is passed, instead of paying 50 per cent, as they have for the past 50 years, will be paying less than 30 per cent of the expenses of conducting the District of Columbia.

Mr. EVANS. Does not the gentleman know that the amount of $14,000,000 does not include the bonus, which in all probability will be passed, increasing the expenses of the District so that it will perhaps take up all of the surplus?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I never heard about the bonus until a few moments ago, and I would like to know if it is excluded in the estimates?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The committee has included a good many things liable to happen in the future. There is the reclassification bill, the $240 bonus bill, and everything of that kind. Now, I wish to correct the gentleman's statement. He says that the tax is so and so and names the amount. The law is just the same in this bill as it was last year—1½ cents minimum and 2 cents maximum. We do not fix what you shall levy; you can put it down to 1½ cents or they can make it one and three-quarters. The gentleman says that the tax was so and so last year and so much this year. They fix that themselves between these two propositions. The law is just the same this year as it was last year.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I recognize that.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. As to what they will levy this year, I do not know. If they levy 20 mills it will be greater than $15,000,000; it will depend on the appropriations we make. We do not want to rob Washington; we want it cut down to 15 mills if they can.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state that these commissioners fix the rate, and they endeavored to show that by a 2 per cent rate——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Have they fixed it yet?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They have fixed it for the present year.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They have made their estimates on what they are going to fix it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. There was submitted to the District Commissioners a report made up in the office of the auditor which showed that they could raise $15,000,000, and this bill carries only $20,000,000. My contention is that the needed improvements in the District, both those cut out by the Director of the Budget and some of those that have been cut out by the subcommittee, should be put in, because people of the District have the property and they are able to pay taxes to pay for those improvements.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Does the gentleman not think that one of the most short-sighted policies is the failure in this bill to provide for the extra water supply of the city of Washington?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I think so.

Mr. CROWTHER. It is almost criminal in its negligence.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I think when the President of the United States is appealing to the heads of the departments to go ahead with needed improvements in an attempt to solve in some degree this question of unemployment and actual distress in the Nation it is a very short-sighted policy to strike from this bill many important needed improvements, and one of the improvements that has been dropped was an estimate for the rebuilding of the Calvert Street Bridge, one of the most dangerous structures in the city. That bridge shakes every time an automobile goes over it. An estimate of $180,000 was struck from this bill.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have an extension of one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS. Referring to the water proposition, and likewise the Calvert Street Bridge proposition, the gentleman is a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and will he please tell us what action his committee has taken to authorize either the construction of a water plant or the rebuilding of the Calvert Street Bridge?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The Senate and the House of Representatives have on several occasions passed upon the project of the building of an additional conduit and the providing of additional water supply by roll call and by record vote, and they have indicated that they want this continued. They appropriated, first, $25,000 in the bill providing for the appointment of the Water Power Commission, for the survey, for the making of preliminary plans, and then Congress by a record vote in both bodies appropriated an additional sum of $200,000 to continue the preliminary work and initiate the actual construction.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman answer the question, What has the District Committee done to authorize either of these improvements?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The District Committee passed a resolution, which was adopted by the House, providing for the appointment of a commission to study this very critical situation and to report to Congress as to the actual need for an increased water supply.

Mr. EVANS. But it has absolutely failed to authorize the construction.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I stated that Congress, by a record vote, has put the stamp of approval on the project which was outlined by the Army engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I suggest that the situation indicated in the colloquy between the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. EVANS] shows how undesirable it is to apply our present methods of dealing with departmental work and the ordinary activities of the Government to the government of the District. But, beyond that, the proposition for the construction of a masonry bridge in place of the wooden Calvert Street Bridge was considered by the Bureau of the Budget and was eliminated from the estimates of the commissioners. The subcommittee refused to approve any of the estimates that were discarded by the Bureau of the Budget—not simply legislative matters, but street and sewer estimates that are within the province of the Committee on Appropriations. The rule applied by the Committee on Appropriations was to take at face value the action of the Bureau of the Budget and decline to correct or modify it.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If I have the power, I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. EVANS. I would just ask the gentleman from Virginia—and I have a very high opinion of his judgment—whether or not our committee would have been authorized to put in an appropriation for the construction of the Calvert Street Bridge when there is no legislation providing for it?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Of course, I answer that the committee could have put it in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask for an additional five minutes for the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The committee could have reported the water supply and Calvert Street items. They would have been subject to points of order, but the points of order might not have been made. What I am saying to my friend from Nebraska is that I think the committee made a great mistake in assuming that all of the estimates that were presented to the Bureau of the Budget by the commissioners and rejected by the bureau should have been rejected as a matter of course by the committee.

I want to say further that I can not deny the statement made by the gentleman from Nebraska that there may have been neglect of the affairs of the District by the District of Columbia Committee. That is something as to which I can not speak. The system under which one committee proposes legislation and another appropriations is not conducive to the best results, and if the District Committee has been derelict in failing to authorize appropriations, that is certainly no reason why the Committee on Appropriations should fail to report appropriations for needed, important improvements, though some of the items would have to risk points of order being made against them.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. When I asked the chairman of the subcommittee why this had been stricken from the bill he stated this improvement was not so essential and should give way to other needed improvements. If that is true, what becomes of the other needed improvements? They certainly are not carried in this bill. For street improvements there was asked for by the commissioners a sum total of more than $800,000, and when finally this bill reaches the floor of the House we find a paltry $133,000 to carry on new street improvements in the District of Columbia for the period of 12 months. The contention I make is that under this low tax rate that has been referred to by the gentleman from New York, that under the low tax rate on intangible property referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNBAR] here a while ago, the District of Columbia is still able to raise $15,000,000, or three-fourths of the amount carried by this bill, and these needed improvements could be carried on during this fiscal year without any great hardship being placed upon the people of the District and the Federal Government not bearing a proportion of the expense greater than that carried for more than 50 years, or not as much.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I should like to ask a question or two of the chairman of the committee. Under the item of assessors, on what basis do they levy taxes in this District?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The law says about two-thirds, but what they act upon I do not know.

Mr. BEGG. Two-thirds of what?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The value.

Mr. BEGG. Of what value?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Two-thirds of the real value.

Mr. BEGG. I suspected that was it, and I want to call the attention of the committee and of the assessors to the fact that they can derive a greater amount of added revenue if they will actually levy on two-thirds of the value of which the realtors are trying to make an income on rental property. Now, the apartment house I live in is not worth a nickle over $300,000, and yet it was sold the other day for $500,000. It has been sold to my knowledge in three years four times, and there has not been $50,000 changed hands, I suspect, in all four sales. One of the items given the other day in the last sale, according to the newspapers, as one of the many things of value received for the apartment house were 100 pounds of bacon. It was sold on the basis of $500,000. Now, I know that it is not on the tax duplicate for over $200,000. Yet the man who claims to be the owner, whether he is or not I do not know and nobody else knows, but the man who purports to be the owner says he must get 6 or 8 per cent net income on his investment. Now, the best way to get at the rent gougers of this city is to make them pay taxes on their investment income, and if the assessors are not under the thumb of the realtors and they will go and put this property on the tax duplicate at $500,000, they will get results, but you will hear the most terrible wail you ever heard in your life.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman from Ohio will just consult the hearings of the subcommittee on the District bill a year ago he will find a discussion of that very proposition. The assessor was before the subcommittee to ascertain the system of making assessments, and the point of view was urged upon him of making an assessment that should take into consideration the rental being charged for various portions of a building; that is, the value of the building had something to do in some part of the basis of the rental value, and the assessor insisted in making his finding and paid no attention whatever to rentals.

Mr. BEGG. I think that is true.

Now, there is another class of people that are nominally controllers of property, if they are not owners. They are represented by the man or woman in this city who goes out and rents 10 or a dozen apartments in a big apartment house for $50 or $60 a month and puts a little bit of furniture in them, which furniture I can duplicate for about $500, brand new. And while they pay $50 to $65 a month rent for these apartments they rent them and they are listed in to-night's paper for $200 a month.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman go into the business?

Mr. BEGG. Why do I not go into the business? In the first place, I would have too much conscience to do a thing like that. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not think anybody here will believe that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BEGG. That may be true. The gentleman is so hardened by long association here that he does not believe there is a man living with a little bit of conscience left in him. [Laughter.] But I say to you, when they can corral all the available rental property in a city of this kind and put an artificial value on it of $100 or $150 a month as income into their pockets on an investment, say, of $1,000 they ought to be made to pay taxes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. How are you going to do it?

Mr. BEGG. I would put them on the taxable list. One of the property owners, Mr. Howe Totten, a realtor in this District, wrote me a letter, in which he bemoaned the fact and bewailed the awful laws that we were passing, and here is the summary of his letters to me: He says that he is a breeder of fine dogs, and that the more he sees of Congressmen the better he likes dogs. That is the kind of men we are dealing with in some instances. I want to say, however, that not all property owners in this city are of that stripe, but enough of them are to control the commercial commodity, the apartment houses, that were built to take care of the transient public, just like a public utility.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEGG. I maintain that the apartment house is built for the purpose of taking care of the transient public, of Government employees, just as much as the railroad down Pennsylvania Avenue was builded for the purpose of transporting the public. And if you will put that interpretation on the housing question, that it is a public utility, and being a public utility, there is just as much reason in regulating and controlling the greed of the individual that corrals that public commodity as there is in regulating the light rates and water rates and street car fares on the cars that haul us between our places of business and our homes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PERSONAL TAX BOARD.

Salaries: Three assistant assessors of personal taxes, at $3,000 each; chief inspector of personal property, $1,800; appraiser of personal property, $1,800; clerk, $1,400; assistant clerk, $1,000; two inspectors, at $1,200 each; extra clerk hire, $2,000; intangible personal property—two clerks at $1,500 each, five inspectors at $1,200 each, clerk to board of personal tax assessors, $1,800, clerk, $1,200; in all, $31,400.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking just a question. I want to ask the chairman if the assessor of personal property is required to assess household goods, and, if so, how much, if any, is exempt from taxation?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think he is directed under the law to assess household property, but I think there is a $500 exemption.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is he supposed to assess it on a 100 per cent valuation or less?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. On a three-quarters valuation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is all I care to ask. I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LICENSE BUREAU.

Salaries: Superintendent of licenses, $2,000; clerks—1 $1,400, 2 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000, 1 $900; inspector, $1,200; inspector of licenses, $1,200; assistant inspector of licenses, $1,000; messenger, $600; in all, $11,700.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman withhold it for a minute?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I wish the gentleman would wait about 10 or 15 minutes. I intended to rise at about 5 o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I withhold it for a time.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] to this: Reference was made a while ago by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] to one of the subjects that we all regard as important, while there is a diversity of opinion as to how it should be dealt with, namely, the proposed increase of the District water supply. Since the committee reached its conclusion and made its report, in view of the doubt expressed in the report as to whether an appropriation should be made, and of the fact that the bill carries no appropriation in respect to the water supply matter, I addressed a letter to Maj. Tyler, who outlined in his report, submitted to Congress some time ago, a project that had the approval of the Water Power Commission, and had a reply from his superior, Gen. Beach, the Chief of Engineers, and I ask permission to have this correspondence printed in the RECORD, for the information of anybody who is studying the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to place in the RECORD certain matter as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, will those letters appear in the RECORD at this point, or will they be in an extension?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think it would be best to have them in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. WALSH. Then will the gentleman ask that they be printed in 8-point type, so that we can read them?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the letters be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters referred to:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1922.

Maj. M. C. TYLER,
Corps of Engineers,
Old Land Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MAJ. TYLER: This has reference to my conversation with you relative to the District water-supply matter.

The statement in the report of the House Appropriations Committee, explaining why the appropriation recommended by the Budget Bureau of $3,000,000 for the fiscal year 1923 was omitted, is as follows:

"The estimates included a proposal to appropriate $3,000,000 for extending work on the project for an increased water supply for the District of Columbia, for which the Army appropriation act approved June 30, 1921, carried an appropriation of $200,000 'for the preparation of plans' and 'the initiation of the work.' This bill contains no appropriation on account of that project. The committee developed the information that, in the event of any serious break in the tunnel conveying water across Rock Creek to the present and only filtration plant or between the District line and said filtration plant, the plan for this project—specifically designated in the Army appropriation act cited, and the work under which is estimated to cost $9,523,000—has not been so prepared as to afford relief to that section of the city receiving water by gravity from the reservoir adjoining the existing filtration plant, and such section consumes about 50 per cent of all the water used. In other words, the proposed project will be an auxiliary to the present system to the District line, at which point the water flowing down the proposed new conduit will be filtered and pumped to the higher levels of the northwest section of the District, and, without modification of the project and an appropriation in excess of the present estimated total cost thereof, would not be of assistance, should any serious difficulty arise between the District line and the present filtration plant, to the gravity-supplied area referred to."

As you are aware, I have introduced a bill authorizing an appropriation of $9,523,000, less the sum of $200,000 heretofore appropriated, which has been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

It is obviously desirable to carry the project forward as rapidly as possible, and I understand even under the most favorable circumstances it can not be completed in less than from two to three years. I would like to have your opinion as to the expediency, in order to avoid delay, of trying to secure an immediate appropriation of $3,000,000, with its expenditure limited to the construction of the new conduit between the Great Falls and the proposed new filtration plant and the construction of that plant, leaving the details as to what shall be done east of the filtration plant to be considered when the bill now in the hands of the District Committee is taken up. It is estimated that the entire project as set forth in your report will call for an outlay of over $9,000,000, of which approximately $5,000,000 will be expended in constructing the conduit and filtration plant, as above indicated. It is, of course, clear that whatever may be the final decision as to the work east of the filtration plant, the work from the Great Falls, up to and including the filtration plant, will have to be done and will call for an expenditure of more than $3,000,000.

Should you be of opinion that the expenditure of an immediate appropriation of $3,000,000 can, without any disadvantage to the public interests, be limited in the manner proposed, I will thank you to suggest how the provision should be worded in order to guard against any uncertainty.

My personal view is, from such knowledge as I have of the matter, that no more advantageous or inexpensive plan can be devised than the one outlined in your report relative to the work eastward, as well as that westward of the new filtration plant, but a different view is expressed in the report of the Committee on Appropriations.

Yours, very truly,

R. WALTON MOORE.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, January 31, 1922.

HON. R. WALTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: In reply to your inquiry of January 30, I beg to furnish the following information:

1. The House Committee on Appropriations raises the point that the project for increasing the water supply of the District of Columbia, forwarded with my indorsement January 31, 1921, and published in Senate Document No. 403, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, does not, in the opinion of the committee, provide adequate insurance against breakdown of service to the gravity area of the city, which, after the completion of the new works, is still to be supplied through the tunnel running under the city from the Georgetown Reservoir to the McMillan Park Reservoir and the filtration plant near the Soldiers' Home.

2. The purpose of the project is to provide a safe and adequate water supply for the District of Columbia. Before it was recommended, all possible sources of supply and methods of bringing water to the city were very carefully studied. The investigation showed conclusively that a new conduit from Great Falls to the Dalecarlia Reservoir at the District line, a new filtration plant, and suitable pumping equipment at that point, which, through new force mains and distribution reservoirs, will supply water to the high services now served by pumping through longer pipe lines from the existing filtration plant near the Soldiers' Home, would prove by far the cheapest both in first cost and operating cost. It was further found that the construction of the new works proposed would reduce the amount of water to be supplied through the existing tunnel and filtration plant to about 47 per cent of the amount now supplied through them, since 47 per cent of the total is used in the gravity area. This reduction of demand to be supplied through the tunnel and existing filtration plant will make it entirely feasible to completely repair the tunnel. The two filtration plants will be adequate to supply a population of 800,000. The new plant will supply, through relatively short pipe lines, the high-service areas, viz, those to which water is now pumped through relatively long pipe lines. The old filtration plant will supply the gravity area. Thus a maximum use is made of everything that has been built ifi the past and nothing is scrapped. It is estimated that the new plant will be adequate to supply the high services for 50 to 60 years, while the excellent old plant will be adequate to supply the gravity area for a like period. As the plan will permit complete repairs in the tunnel, and as no trouble is anticipated after such repairs are made, the extra expense of connecting the new filtration plant with the gravity area and of making that plant large enough to furnish water both to the high services and to the gravity area, viz, to the entire District of Columbia, was not considered justifiable for the sole purpose of permitting the tunnel to be put out of service at any time. Such enlargements are, however, entirely feasible and can be made now or at any date in the future if funds are provided therefor. They would consist—

First. Of an additional pipe line laid along the Conduit Road from the new filtration plant to the mains of the gravity area in Georgetown; and Second. Of additional coagulating basins and filter beds at the new filtration plant.

If the first item, the additional pipe line, is provided now, the new plant could supply the gravity area, with the tunnel and existing filtration plant out of commission, and also supply the high services. However, as the new plant is intended to supply only the high services and meet the growth of those services, it will soon be too small to supply the whole District of Columbia. Additions would, therefore, soon be necessary, and if it is to be able to supply the whole District 50 or 60 years from now it would have to be twice its size, as now designed, which is estimated as ample to take care of the high services for that period of time.

3. The new work, contemplated by the project as submitted, is estimated to cost $9,523,000. An additional pipe line from the new plant to the gravity area, with the increase in pumping equipment made necessary thereby, it is estimated will cost $467,000. If this addition to the project is made now, the total cost will be $10,000,000, or an increase of 4.9 per cent of the estimated cost of the work recommended. If the new filtration plant is ultimately to be enlarged so as to be able at all times in the future to supply the entire District of Columbia, an added expenditure of approximately $2,675,000 will be necessary for that purpose, and it will also be necessary to provide additional large mains in the gravity area to feed it from the Georgetown instead of the McMillan Park end. This item will probably cost $500,000. All these additions, which would be for the sole purpose of permitting the tunnel and the existing filtration plant to be shut down any day in the year for a period of some 50 years into the future, total $3,642,000, or about 38 per cent of the cost of the works recommended, and give a filtration plant capacity 50 per cent greater than is actually needed.

4. The construction of the works recommended in the report as submitted will double the capacity of the water supply of the District of Columbia. It may be of interest to note that the new facilities, even with the additional connection between the new filtration plant and the gravity area, will be furnished at a cost of $151,515 per million gallons per day average capacity, while the existing supply system cost $174,954 per million gallons per day average capacity. The project as submitted, plus the extra connection to the gravity area heretofore mentioned, at a cost of $10,000,000 is $2,688,000 cheaper in first cost than any other feasible project. With the ultimate enlargement of the new filtration plant to double the size recommended the project would still be cheaper than any other project giving equal capacity.

5. It is, of course, absolutely essential that Congress feel satisfied that the project is entirely safe and adequate. Therefore, if Congress in its wisdom believes the additional insurance necessary of a connection between the new filtration plant and the gravity area and enlargement of that plant so as always to be able to supply the entire District of Columbia with the tunnel and existing filtration plant out of commission, such additions may be made to the project. It seems to me that these additions can be provided for easily by inserting in any legislation after the words—

* * * increased water supply for the District of Columbia, in accordance with Potomac Project "E," described in the report of Maj. M. C. Tyler, Corps of Engineers, published in Senate document No. 403, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session * * *.

The words—and also including proper and adequate connection between the gravity distribution area and the new filtration plant described therein, which plant is to be of such capacity and capable of such enlargement as to be able at all times to furnish an adequate supply of water to the gravity as well as to the high-level distribution areas.

Such action should, of course, be accompanied by an immediate increase in the authorized cost from $9,523,000 to $10,000,000, and it should be understood that ultimately a total investment of about $13,000,000 will be required.

6. It should be understood that all the works cityward of the new filtration plant at the District line are for the purpose of distributing filtered water. As previously stated, the plans are believed safe and adequate, and they have had the approval of both the former and present engineer commissioners of the District of Columbia. An addition to the plans to connect the new filtration plant with the gravity area in no way affects the plans for the new conduit or the new filtration plant. The ultimate enlargement of the new filtration plant can be planned for at the present time, but such additions need not be made immediately.

The estimated costs of those works, as recommended, are:

New conduit	$3,497,000
New filtration plant and accessories	2,675,000
Total	6,172,000

It is estimated that about two and one-half years will be required for the completion of these works, consisting largely of concrete masonry. On the other hand, the work cityward of the new filtration plant consists largely of pipe lines for the construction of which two years should suffice. The urgency of the situation is such that the construction of the new conduit and new filtration plant should not wait on a decision as to whether the connection to the gravity area should be made and whether the new filtration plant is to be enlarged. The detailed plans are in such a state of advancement that contracts can be entered into by July 1, 1922.

If, therefore, Congress should not see fit to provide at this time for the connection between the new filtration plant and the gravity area and for the enlargement of the new filtration plant, but prefers that the distribution problem receive further study, it would seem that some such provision of law as the following would fully meet all requirements:

Provided, That the funds so appropriated shall be used only in the construction of the conduit from Great Falls to the District line and in the construction of the new filtration plant and its accessories: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, on or before January 1, 1923, submit to Congress a supplemental report on the distribution of water from said plant.

LANSING H. BEACH,
Major General, Chief of Engineers.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 10101) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

THE TYRANNY OF THE PREVIOUS QUESTION.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, in reading the history of Georgetown University, founded here in 1781 by the Rev. John Carrol, I find that the first pupil to enter the university was William Gaston, of North Carolina—conceded to be first not only in time but in talents and distinction in the whole history of Georgetown—a profound scholar and an orator of the first rank.

Gaston entered the House of Representatives in 1813 and delivered here one of the few really great speeches which have been heard in Congress, upon "The Tyranny of the Previous Question." I have found and read this speech, and it is one of the most interesting speeches I ever read, and it is always interesting to members of a representative body.

I ask unanimous consent to have this speech reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. About how long is it?

Mr. LAZARO. It is short.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the address referred to:

Mr. Gaston rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the proposition which has been made by my worthy friend and colleague [Mr. Stanford] to expunge from the rules of this House what is there called "the previous question," brings distinctly forward for consideration a subject which has the most imperious claims on the attention of every individual of this honorable body. It vitally concerns the rights of the Members of this House, and the essential interests of the people whom they represent. From the moment, sir, I have been able to comprehend what from that chair and on this floor has been expounded to be "the previous question," I have believed it hostile to every principle of our Government, inconsistent with all notions of correct legislation, and without a precedent in the annals of any free deliberative assembly. At different periods of the last Congress I had thought of attempting to procure some amendment of this arbitrary rule, but I was prevented from prosecuting my purpose by a conviction that the party feelings which had grown out of the war and which had then reached their highest state of excitement, forbade all hope of that deliberate consideration which was indispensable to a correct decision. The present Congress, I have flattered myself, afforded a fit opportunity for a revision of this rule. With the return of peace to our land had returned also a spirit of mutual forbearance between the political parties of the House. Now it might be practicable to discuss and decide a great question upon its intrinsic merits, and not simply with a view to its influence on the interests or purposes of faction. Indulging this hope, it was my fixed determination not to permit the present sessions to pass away without an effort to rescue my own rights and the rights of those whom I represent from the further oppression of this instrument of tyranny. I have been anticipated by my colleague, and I rejoice that I have been thus anticipated. From none could the call upon this honorable House to emancipate itself from the thraldom of "the previous question" proceed with more authority and propriety than from its oldest surviving son; from him who has witnessed the growth of this rule from its first intrusion here to its present all-controlling domination. And, sir, I rejoice equally at the opposition which the motion of my colleague has encountered. If this hideous rule could have been vindicated, we should have received that vindication from the gentleman who has just resumed his seat [Mr. Clay]. If his ingenuity and zeal combined could form for the previous question no other defense than that which we have heard, the previous question can not be defended. If beneath his shield it finds so slight a shelter, it must fall a victim to the just though long-delayed vengeance of awakened and indignant freedom. If Hector can not protect his Troy, the doom of Troy is fixed by fate.

It is indispensable, before we proceed further in the consideration of this subject, that we should perfectly understand what is our previous question. Gentlemen may incautiously suppose that it is the same with what has been called the previous question elsewhere. This would be a most fatal mistake. Our previous question is altogether "sui generis," the only one of its kind; and to know it we must consider not merely what is written of it in our code, but what it has been rendered by exposition and construction.

Our previous question "can only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the Members present." It is a question "whether the question under debate shall now be put"—on the previous question "there shall be no debate." "Until it is decided, it shall preclude all amendment and debate of the main question." If it be decided negatively, viz, that the main question shall not now be put, the main question is of course superseded; but if it be decided affirmatively that the main question shall now be put, the main question is to be put instantaneously, and no Member can be allowed to amend or discuss it. The previous question is entitled to precedence over motions to amend, commit, or postpone the main question, and therefore when admitted puts these entirely aside. This, according to the latest improvement, is now our rule of the previous question, and certainly in your Patent Office there is no model of a machine better fitted for its purposes than this instrument for the ends of tyranny. It is a power vested in the majority to forbid, at their sovereign will and pleasure, every Member not of that majority from making known either his own sentiments or the wishes or complaints of his constituents in relation to any subject under consideration or from attempting to amend what is proposed as a law for the government of the whole Nation.

It is a fundamental principle of civil liberty that no citizen shall be affected in his rights without an opportunity of being heard in support of them. Our Constitution provides "that no citizen shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Every freeman is recognized by our Constitution as possessing also the right, either by himself or peaceably assembled with others, to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. The peculiar duties of the Representatives of freemen delegated with authority to bind their constituents by law constitute these Representatives the agents of the people, to make known their grievances, their wants, and their wishes, that thus by mutual and free intercommunication rules of action may be framed fitted "to promote the general welfare." To refuse to receive the petition of the poorest and meanest member of society, alleging a grievance and applying to the competent authority for redress, is an act of tyranny prohibited by the Constitution. To impair by a judicial sentence any one of his rights, or restrain him in the exercise of his freedom, to touch either his purse or his person, until after regular process to apprise him of the charge brought against him and a full hearing of any defense he may urge by himself or his counsel, is confessedly iniquitous and unconstitutional. Yet by this detested rule he, his neighbors, the whole community, may be mulcted with taxes to an indefinite amount and subjected to obligatory rules of action, involving consequences fatal to liberty, property, and life, and their recognized agents, their constitutional counsel, their Representatives, not suffered to allege a grievance or offer a defense. No individual can be condemned unheard, no individual can be refused a hearing of his petition. But thousands petitioning through their Representatives may be commanded into silence and a whole country sentenced without a trial. The people are to be allowed Representatives in the great national council, who are forbidden to make known their wants; they are indulged with agents who are refused a hearing.

Sir, such absurdities will not bear examination. They can not be tolerated by thinking and dispassionate men. It is vain to allege, in the language of the Speaker, that as the House is permitted by the Constitution "to determine the rules of its proceeding" it has a perfect right to forbid discussion when and as it pleases. It can not (rightfully can not) so regulate its proceedings as to annihilate the constitutional franchise either of a Member or his constituents. They have a right to be heard before their money is voted or their liberty restrained, and he is their delegated agent. The whole Congress can not by law deprive them of their constitutional franchise to petition for redress of grievances, and this House is not competent to close the mouth through which the petitioners speak. Under the pretense of determining the rules of its proceedings the House has no more authority to deny to any portion of the people the fair agency of their Representatives than a court of justice under a plea of preserving decorum to forbid a criminal the assistance of counsel. The power in either case is given for the preservation and more effectual enjoyment of the rights of which it is the guardian. It may regulate, but it can not destroy them. It may prevent their abuse, but it can not forbid their exercise. The court is not obliged to hear counsel as often as they may wish to speak, nor to tolerate impertinence or contempt. The House may not allow debate on a motion for adjournment or a question whether language be indecorous, but if either forbid the duly constituted agent from performing his regular and proper functions it is then usurpation, not right; it is abuse of power, not regulation. The privilege of the Representative to declare the will, to explain the views, to make known the grievances, and to advance the interests of his constituents was so precious, in the estimation of the authors of our Constitution, that they have secured to him an irresponsibility elsewhere for whatever may be uttered by him in this House; "for any speech or debate in either House they (the Senators and Representatives) shall not be questioned in any other place." The liberty of speech is fenced round with a bulwark, which renders it secure from external injury—here is its citadel, its impregnable fortress. Yet here, even here, it is to be strangled by the bowstring of the previous question. In vain may its enemies assail it from without, but within the mutes of despotism can murder it with impunity.

The existence of this arbitrary rule is incompatible with the independence which belongs to the character of a Representative. Called by the voice of a great and free people to the high (and I had almost said sacred) office of making laws for their Government, we should all of us feel that our functions and the privileges essential to their discharge are delegations of sovereignty, not the revocable, precarious grants of a courteous majority of our own body; legislating for freemen we should ourselves be free. But what pretensions can he advance to freedom who is indebted for the exercise of his supposed rights to the grace and favor of his associates? Our English ancestors considered those tenures free which were independent of another's will. To hold by the will of another was the tenure of a "villain"—a slave. And has the constitutional right of a Representative of the people in the freest of all free countries become nothing more than a species of privileged villanage—of splendid servitude? Instead of the legislator being independent of all but God and his country in the exercise of his functions, is he to receive as a favor the permission of his fellows to take a part in legislation? The degradation is not the less, because those on whom he depends are equally degraded with himself. Each may be regarded as a slave in an association of slaves of which the majority are tyrants. Can it be that to such a body, and so composed, the people of the United States designed by their great constitutional charter to confide the mighty trust "of securing the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity"? Can it be that they should select as guardians of their rights those who should have no right to assert them? That never can be called a right which owes its existence to favor.

This rule of the previous question, instead of being sanctioned by the constitutional authority which the House possesses of making rules to govern its proceedings is at variance with the very object for the attainment of which this power was delegated. The great purpose of rules in every community is to protect the weak against the tyranny of the strong. The end of regulations in a society where a majority governs is to limit the power of the majority and to secure the few from the oppressions of the many. The celebrated Arthur Onslow, who held the office of speaker of the English House of Commons for more than three and thirty years, and discharged its duties with an ability and impartiality which have never been surpassed, used to remark that "nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of administration and of a majority of the House of Commons than a neglect of or departure from its rules; that the forms of proceeding as instituted by their ancestors operated as a check and control on the actions of ministers and were a shelter and protection to a minority against the attempts of those in power." And the accurate and judicious Hatsell, who has recorded this memorable observation, very properly remarks that it is founded in good sense, for that "it is always in the power of the majority, by their numbers, to stop any improper measures proposed on the part of their opponents"; but "the only weapons by which the minority can defend themselves against similar attempts from those in power are the rules of proceeding, by a strict adherence to which the weaker party can only be protected from those irregularities and abuses which these forms were intended to check and which the wantonness of power is but too often apt to suggest to large and successful majorities."

Now, sir, it must be admitted that the ordinary and correct course of legislation is to afford a fair opportunity for a free interchange of opinions. "Dieu deliberandum quod semel est statuendum" is the old maxim, which in Hakewell's quaint but expressive language is thus paraphrased: "That which is to bear the stamp of a law must be a long time molding; there must be previous debates, bandings of arguments, and clashings of opinions, pro and con, go before; for as we find that fire issueth forth from the concussion of flint and iron, so truth comes forth out of the eventillations and clashings of several opinions." It can not be denied, too, that it is in the regular order of all deliberations to weigh and dispose of amendments before a final decision on the main subject. Yet the express end and aim of our previous-question rule is to prevent an interchange of opinions and to forbid amendments. Its purpose is to reverse everything like correct legislation and to enable a "successful majority" in the "wantonness of power," unchecked "by forms of proceeding," unopposed by "the legitimate weapons of defense," to deprive the minority of every right, and to make its capricious will stand for reason, its passion for law. Surely strange notions have been broached at this inventive spot. It is right to subject the majority to the restraint of parliamentary rules, except when it chooses to be free from them. The majority shall not be permitted to oppress the minority, unless it have the inclination. Thus, also, a national bank is unconstitutional in good times and oaths are registered in heaven, but if the Government needs a bank and the times prompt to a usurpation of power, then the Constitution accommodates itself to the exigency and oaths are no longer troublesome. Constitutions and rules of proceeding are binding so long as there is no temptation to transgress them.

I have said, sir, that there is no precedent to be found in the annals of any free deliberative body for such a rule as our "previous question," and although I feel almost as great a repugnance to pledges as has been expressed by my eloquent friend from Virginia [Mr. Randolph], yet I pledge myself to maintain this position. In the English House of Commons the previous question has been known as a form of proceeding for more than two centuries, but it differs radically and essentially from our detested rule, which bears the same name. In England it can never be used so as to deprive any member of his right to discuss or to amend the question under debate. Ours is used avowedly for these purposes.

The origin of the previous question in the English House of Commons is hidden in obscurity. In Grey's Parliamentary Debates it is remarked by Sir Thomas Littleton that Sir Henry Vane was the first that ever proposed putting a question "whether the question should be now put"; in consequence of which the speaker, Mr. Seymour (afterwards Sir Edward Seymour), observes: "No man can find any precedent of Sir Henry Vane's question. By that question we can never come to an end in any business. The question in being may be the next day put, and so you usher in an impossibility of bringing things to a period"; and Sir Robert Howard adds, in the spirit of prophecy, "This question is like the image of the inventor, a perpetual disturbance." The debate which gave rise to these remarks (March, 1672) turned upon the question whether a bill of supply should be engrossed before certain grievances were redressed.

There is a debate—January, 1674—recorded in the same volume wherein the previous question was used and which respected the inquiry whether the House should proceed to the consideration of the King's speech before it should ascertain by an address to the Crown whether, by the peace mentioned in the speech, is intended a separate or a joint peace. From these it would seem that an early, perhaps the first, use of the previous question was to postpone one subject in order to take up another. But whatever might have been its original use, it was early discovered to be susceptible of a service very convenient to ministers and their adherents, and to which they have since frequently applied it—that of getting rid of an unpleasant motion which it was not convenient to reject. The first instance I have seen of this application of the previous question was in the case of this very Mr. Speaker Seymour, in October, 1673, who probably afterwards entertained a more favorable opinion of the previous question than what he had expressed about 18 months before. Sir Thomas Littleton submits a motion to remove the Speaker and appoint a Speaker pro tempore, on the ground that the Speaker holds an office incompatible with the faithful discharge of his duties to the House—the office of privy counsellor to the King. This motion is supported by others on a different, and, what was then perhaps deemed a delicate, ground, that the Speaker "exposed the honor of the House in resorting to gaming houses with foreigners, as well as Englishmen, and to ill places." The last is treated by the Speaker's friends—fashionable men and courtiers—as a trivial objection and the first is resisted by precedents. Upon the whole, however, it is found expedient to get rid of the motion by the previous question, and therefore "on the question being propounded that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair, a Speaker pro tempore be appointed, the question being put 'that the question be now put,' it passed in the negative." It will be observed that in the instances cited of the use of the previous question, and in all others which may be resorted to, it never prevented full debate of the main question. The ancient practice was, as we learn from Hakewell, "if the matter moved to receive a debate, pro and contra in that debate none may speak more than once to the matter. And after some time spent in the debate the Speaker, collecting the sense of the House upon the debate, is to reduce the same into a question, which he is to propound, to the end that the House in the debate afterwards may be kept up to the matter of that question, if the same be approved by the House to contain the substance of the former debate." It was the right of every member to speak once, if he wished it, to the matter moved, and of this right he could not be deprived by any use of the previous question. Hakewell proceeds to state, "If upon a debate it be much controverted and much be said against the question, any member may move that the question may be first made whether that question shall be put or shall be now put, which usually is admitted at the instance of any Member, especially if it be seconded and insisted on; and if that question being put pass in the affirmative, then the main question is to be put immediately, and no man may speak any further to it, either to add or alter. But before the question whether the question shall be put any person who hath not formerly spoken to the main question hath liberty to speak for it or against it, because else he shall be precluded from speaking at all to it." The previous question was simply a demand that when the main question should be ripe for decision the House should first pronounce whether it was then expedient to decide it. It was no matter at what period of the debate on the main question this demand was made, the previous question could only be put when the main question was about to be put, and the main question could not be demanded while any person who had not spoken wished to speak upon it. "It is a great mistake," says Sir Thomas Lee, "that the previous question, if asked, must necessarily be put, for you may do it all at one time and not at another." In fact, when the previous question was demanded there were two questions before the House—the one whether the main question should be decided, the other what should be the decision on it. If the first were determined negatively it, of course, precluded the necessity of determining the other; but if the first were answered affirmatively the other was to follow immediately. Before, however, either branch of this double question was put, every Member had a perfect right to be heard. In later times the previous question has been frequently resorted to, but never to destroy this right of speaking to the main question. For instance, let us take the debate on the motion of Sir James Lowther—November 3, 1775—"that the introducing of Hanoverian troops into any part of the dominions belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, without the consent of the Parliament first had and obtained, is contrary to law." The affirmative of this proposition was maintained by Gov. Johnson, Mr. Sergeant Adair, and others, and the negative by Lord Barrington and Mr. Stanly; when Mr. Gordon declared his opinion to be that the measure was illegal, but well meant and highly expedient, moved the previous question. Then it was that the solicitor general, Mr. Wedderburne, entered fully upon the subject. In opposition to the main question he contended for the legality of the practice and stated numerous precedents by which it was sanctioned; and in support of the previous question he entered into a variety of circumstances and arguments to show the propriety of the measure. He was followed by Mr. Burke, Lord North, and others, expressing their sentiments fully, as well in relation to the original motion as to the previous question demanded on it. The advantage which the ministry gained in this instance by the previous question was not to silence the minority and prevent a discussion of the main question, but to rally round their standard those who would desert them if compelled to vote directly on the main question. They sought by this measure to strengthen their main body of well-trained troops by the accession of the irregular militia, who could not be relied on in a desperate charge. Take, for another instance, Mr. Burke's motion for leave to bring in his famous bill "for composing the present troubles and for quieting the minds of His Majesty's subjects in America." After the previous question is moved the whole subject opened by the motion is debated by the great champions on either side who entered on the controversy.

I believe, sir, that some confusion has been thrown on the subject of the previous question—a confusion from which even the luminous mind of the compiler of our Manual, Mr. Jefferson, was not thoroughly free—by supposing it designed to suppress unpleasant discussions instead of unpleasant decisions. The fact is that formerly the discussions in the English House of Commons were not designed at all for the public ear, but solely for the members of the House. There are various orders, collected by Hatsell, forbidding the clerk and his assistants from taking notes or permitting copies to go forth of any arguments or speeches made in the House. And we know that when Dr. Johnson first published those specimens of British parliamentary eloquence, which spread its fame through the world, he was compelled to throw over his design the veil of fiction. They were announced as the debates of "the Senate of Lilliput," and the speakers were designated by the most barbarous appellations. To this day a publication of speeches made in either House of Parliament is, in strictness, regarded as a contempt, and may be punished as such. In a body whose discussions were not designed for the public and whose proceedings were known only by their final votes and orders, composed of men who had ever some grievances to allege, who claimed the privilege of free speaking, so essential for the exercise of that right, and whose plain habits of discourse were free from the fastidious delicacy of latter days: all subjects from which the fear of royal indignation did not restrain them were freely bandied to and fro until the House was ready to act or to declare its determination not to act upon them. The previous question could not be used to prevent the discussion of an unpleasant subject. For, whether the previous question was called or not, every Member had a right to be heard once on the main question.

The previous question in the English House of Commons deprived no member of the right to amend the main question. It has, indeed, been made a doubt whether an amendment could be received if offered after the previous question had been moved and seconded and proposed from the chair. Among the arguments by which this doubt was repelled it has been observed that to refuse the amendment because not before offered would be to put it "in the power of any two members by moving and seconding the previous question, immediately after the main question is proposed, to deprive the House of that power which they ought to have in all instances of amending and altering any question proposed to them." On the other hand, those who entertained this doubt answered, "No inconvenience can arise from the doctrine, for, if before the previous question is proposed from the chair, though it should have been moved and seconded, any member should inform the House that he wished to make amendments to the main question, he will then certainly be at liberty to do it, and the Speaker, supported by the House, will give that priority to the motion for amending to the motion for the previous question, which common sense requires." However this doubt may be decided, all concur in declaring that in the English House of Commons the previous question can not preclude the exercise of the undoubted right "in all instances of amending and altering any question proposed to them," nor can it supersede that "priority for amendments" which "common sense requires." No, sir; it was reserved for us in this age of illumination and in this freest of all free Governments, to adopt a rule which sets common sense at defiance and prohibits the exercise of undoubted parliamentary right. It was reserved for us to declare that the previous question shall have priority of a motion to amend.

If we can find no sanction for our rule in the previous question of the British Parliament, let us examine how far it is founded on American precedents. Here we shall discover an early departure from the European management of the previous question; but a departure strictly consistent with the legitimate purpose of such a question, and which far from shackling legislative freedom simplified the rule, while it afforded full latitude for discussion and amendment. If we will examine the journals of the Continental Congress we shall perceive their practice to have been to regard the previous question as a motion to set aside the main question, which was, of course, a distinct proposition and open, like all others, for free debate. To this proposition the debate was confined. If the main question was set aside the debate proceeded no further. If the motion to set aside the main question did not prevail, it was then before the House unaffected by this motion, and necessarily in a situation to receive such a disposition as the House thought proper to give it. Postponement, amendment, debate were then as completely in order as before the unsuccessful motion had been made. This was truly an improvement of the old rule, an American graft upon the English stock. Simplicity of debate was promoted by confining the controversy, in the first instance, to the propriety of taking the main question—not only unpleasant decisions, but unpleasant and unnecessary discussions might be thus prevented. If on the preliminary inquiry the subject was pronounced a proper one for the decision of Congress, there was then scope for the exercise of their unshackled wisdom in regard to it. Two instances will be sufficient to show this American usage of the previous question in the Continental Congress. "A motion was made to resolve that the Members of this House keep secret from all but the Members of this House, under like obligations of secrecy, such information as may be derived from an inspection of the papers of the committee of secret correspondence or from hearing the same read."

After debate, the previous question was moved by Mr. Duer—10 States voted in the affirmative, "and so it was resolved in the affirmative, and the main question was set aside." Again, on Friday, July 25, 1788, "the following proposition being under debate, viz, that the Secretary at War direct the detachment of troops marching to the westward to rendezvous at Easton in Pennsylvania, and from thence into the county of Luzerne, for quelling the disturbances in that county, provided the executive council of Pennsylvania shall find the assistance of those troops necessary, and provided that the said troops shall not be delayed in their march to the Ohio more than two weeks; the previous question was moved by the State of Virginia, and seconded by the State of Massachusetts, viz, 'that the main question be not now put,' and on the question to agree to the previous question, the question was lost—on the question to agree to the main question, it was resolved in the affirmative."

In the year following Congress convened under the present Constitution. In the House of Representatives one of the first acts was to establish rules of proceeding; and the committee on whom this duty was imposed consisted of gentlemen, many of whom had served their country in the Continental Congress, and among whom, with high claims to distinction, was the present Chief Magistrate of the United States. It is manifest that this committee and the House regarded the previous question precisely as it had been viewed in the old Congress, as a preliminary inquiry into the propriety of the main question, which, if decided favorably to a hearing of that main question, left it perfectly free to the sound discretion of the House. They, indeed, altered the form of putting the previous question from the negative to the affirmative style of interrogation. "The previous question shall be in this form, Shall the main question be now put?" They also required that five Members should concur in asking for it. "It shall only be admitted when demanded by five Members." They limited the debate on this preliminary inquiry: "On a previous question, no Member shall speak more than once without leave," whereas on other questions he had a right to speak twice; but, in the full spirit of the established American practice, they confined the debate to the previous question until that was declared, and only until then. "Until the previous question is decided, it shall preclude all amendment and further debate of the main question," unequivocally evincing that "amendment and further debate of the main question" might take place after decision of the previous question. And this, sir, was the clear, settled, undeviating exposition of this rule, for upward of 20 years after its adoption by this House. I will prove this position by irrefragable testimony. In the second session of the Third Congress a resolution was moved, "That the President of the United States be requested to cause an ascertainment to be made of the losses sustained by the officers of Government, and other citizens, on their property (in consequence of their exertions in support of the laws), by the insurgents in the western counties of Pennsylvania." Upon this resolution "the previous question was called for by five Members, to wit, Shall the main question to agree to the said resolution be now put? It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 52, nays 31. The said resolution was then amended at the Clerk's table; and the main question being put that the House do agree to the said resolution, amended to read as follows: 'Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause an ascertainment to be made of the losses sustained by the officers of Government, and other citizens, by the actual destruction of their property (in consequence of their exertions in support of the laws) by the insurgents in the western counties of Pennsylvania, together with a representation of the particular condition of the respective sufferers in relation to their ability to prosecute their several claims, and recover at law satisfaction from the insurgent aggressors.' It was resolved in the affirmative." Here was amendment after a decision that the main question should now be put. We had no Sir Henry Vane then to explain to us this emphatic "now." In the second session of the Fifth Congress (Thursday, April 5, 1798), a motion was made "That the instructions and dispatches from the envoys extraordinary to the French Republic, communicated on the 3d instant by the President of the United States, be published." The motion was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, who reported a disagreement to the proposition. The report being under consideration, a motion was made and seconded, that the House concur with a Committee of the Whole. Whereupon the previous question was called for by five Members, to wit: "Shall the main question, to agree to the said motion, be now put? It was decided in the affirmative. And then, debate arising on the said main question, an adjournment was called for; whereupon the several orders of the day were postponed, and the House adjourned." On the succeeding day "the House resumed the consideration of the said main question; whereupon ordered that the further consideration be postponed until this day week." Here the main question was not only debated but postponed, after a decision that it should now be put. This, sir, was in 1798, in the days which have been falsely called "the days of terror"; but which I feel a pride in showing were the days of correct principles. We had not then discovered how to construe away the rights of the people or their representatives by a verbal criticism on the adverb "now." This illustrious discovery was reserved for the genius of modern republicanism.

The first attempt that was ever made to destroy the freedom of debate by a perversion of the previous question was resisted as it should be—I speak it to the honor of this House—was resisted by a solemn and almost unanimous protest. It was on the 15th of December, 1807, when the Speaker's chair was occupied by a gentleman from Massachusetts, who, perhaps on that account, claimed to be regarded as the lineal successor of Sir Henry Vane, and therefore the best expositor of his invention. On a motion for referring the memorial of sundry merchants of Philadelphia to a Committee of the Whole House, the previous question was called for, and on being taken in the form prescribed, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was resolved in the affirmative. The main question on the reference of the memorial then occurring, "Mr. Ely, one of the Members from Massachusetts, addressed the Chair, and was proceeding in some remarks touching the merits of the said main question, when Mr. Speaker called the Member from Massachusetts to order and decided, as the opinion of the Chair, that after the previous question is called for and answered in the affirmative, it precludes all debate on the main question; whereupon an appeal to the House, from the decision of the Chair, was made by Mr. Randolph, seconded by Mr. Bibb"; and the said decision being again stated, "that after the previous question is called for, and determined in the affirmative, it precludes all debate on the main question," the question was taken thereon to wit, "Is the said decision of the Chair correct?" and passed in the negative by yeas and nays—yeas 14, nays 103. The principle of freedom asserted in this decision was reasserted with equal solemnity and union of opinion in the next session of Congress. On the 1st of December, 1808, a resolution was pending in the following words: "Resolved, That the United States can not, without a sacrifice of their rights, honor, and independence, submit to the late edicts of Great Britain."

"On motion of Mr. Gardenier the previous question thereon was demanded by five Members, to wit: 'Shall the main question be now put?' and the said previous question being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative. A question of order being then called for, to wit, Is the main question open to further debate? Mr. Speaker declared that, conformably to the determination of the House on the 15th of December last, it did not preclude debate on the main question. From which decision of the Chair an appeal was made to the House by Mr. David R. Williams, and the same being seconded, the question was stated by Mr. Speaker, to wit, 'Is the decision of the Chair correct?' and, debate arising thereon, the House adjourned." On the next day the House resumed the consideration of the question of appeal, and the decision of the Chair being again read, the question was put, "Is the said decision of the Chair correct?" It was resolved in the affirmative by yeas and nays—yeas 101, nays 18." It was impossible that any rule should be more completely settled, both by uninterrupted usage and solemn deliberate adjudications, than was the rule of the previous question in this House. It was a rule perfectly consistent with good sense, with the requisite independence of the Members of the House, and with the right of the free people whom they represented. It preserved decorum; it had a tendency to prevent unnecessary discussions; it superseded improper questions, while it left perfectly untouched the fundamental principles of parliamentary and political freedom. Thus, sir, it continued the more firm, for the impotent attempts which had been made to pervert it—and the better understood, from the blunders which its examination had exposed. Such was the state of things when, on the memorable night of the 27th of February, 1811, the monster, which we now call the previous question, was ushered into existence and utterly supplanted the harmless, useful being, whose name it usurped.

Sir, of the proceedings of that night I have no personal knowledge. The Journals, however, record them with a fidelity which, however to be lamented on other accounts, is essential to the interests of truth. The House, after a busy day, and a short recess for dinner, met at 6 o'clock in the evening; they then resumed the consideration of certain amendments, reported by a Committee of the Whole to a supplemental bill prohibiting commercial intercourse with Great Britain, and the question recurred to concur with the last amendments reported by the committee. "Debate arising, the previous question was called for by Mr. Gholson, and being demanded by five Members, was taken in the form prescribed by the rules and orders of the House, to wit, 'Shall the main question be now put?' and resolved in the affirmative. After which Mr. Gardenier, one of the Members from the State of New York, was proceeding to state the main question, when a Member from Virginia [Mr. Gholson] objected to the right of the Member from New York to debate the main question, after the previous question had been demanded by five Members, taken and decided in the affirmative; on which Mr. Speaker decided that, according to the practice of the House, it was in order to debate the main question after the previous question had been taken. From which decision of the Chair an appeal was made to the House by Mr. Gholson, seconded by two Members; and debate arising on the appeal, a question of order was moved by Mr. P. B. Porter, whether the said appeal could be debated? On which Mr. Speaker decided that, conformable to the practice of the House, it was in order to debate the said appeal. From which decision of the Chair an appeal was made to the House by Mr. P. B. Porter and seconded by two Members. And on the question, 'Is the said decision of the Chair correct?' it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 66. The question recurred on the appeal first stated; and on the question, 'Is the said decision of the Chair correct?' it was determined in the negative. The main question was then taken, to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their last amendment, and resolved in the affirmative."

The Journal then proceeds to state that two successive amendments were moved by Mr. Gardenier, on which, on motion by Mr. Ringgold, the previous question was immediately called, debate prohibited, and the amendments rejected. A motion was then made by Mr. Ringgold that the bill be engrossed and read a third time; on which motion the previous question was called by Mr. P. B. Porter, and resolved in the affirmative, and the bill forced to a third reading instantly. On the third reading, on motion of Mr. Ringgold, the previous question was again demanded, and, being decided in the affirmative, the bill was passed. Here we have the great precedent which has furnished the rule for the subsequent use of the previous question; a precedent which nothing could induce me to examine and lay bare to the public inspection short of an overruling sense of duty; a precedent stamped with every mark of error, oppression, and abuse of power. It is perfectly apparent that this night session was holden for the purpose of carrying this supplemental nonintercourse bill through all its stages. This was the holy end that was to sanctify the requisite means. "Debate arising," on agreeing to an amendment reported by the committee, "the previous question was called for by Mr. Gholson." Now, sir, it is a settled principle in parliamentary practice that the previous question can not be put on an amendment. The very question on an amendment is, Whether "certain words shall be inserted into or remain part of a question"? The decision of the amendment "determines that they shall or shall not stand in a particular place, and has, therefore, all the effect of a previous question." So says Mr. Jefferson in his manual: "Suppose a motion to postpone, commit, or amend the main question, and that it be moved to suppress that motion by putting the previous question on it. This is not allowed, because it would embarrass questions too much to allow them to be piled on one another several stories high, and because the same result may be had in a more simple way, by deciding against the postponement, commitment, or amendment." A previous question on an amendment is an absurdity. It is a previous question mounted on a previous question. But parliamentary usage was of no consequence. "Debate" had arisen on the amendment, and this debate was to be put down, or the bill might not be passed that night. The previous question was therefore called. It being decided that the question on the amendment was to be put as the main question, debate was proceeding on this main question; but this did not consist with the will of the majority, and debate was objected to as out of order. The Speaker declared it in order, for he had received too impressive a lesson on this point to commit again the error which had been so solemnly corrected. It was expedient, however, to overrule this decision. An appeal was therefore taken. On this appeal a debate arose, and the Speaker was called on to pronounce whether debate on an appeal was in order. To such a question he could return but one answer; he knew, every man in the House knew, debate was in order. The rule is unequivocal and express, "on an appeal no Member shall speak more than once without leave of the House." But debate was inconvenient, and, rule or no rule, debate should not be tolerated. A second appeal was then taken. Without a reason urged it was decided, in the face of a known and positive rule, there could be no debate on an appeal. It was next decided, without argument, in opposition to 22 years of uninterrupted usage, confirmed by the most solemn decisions made after a full hearing and on deliberation, that there could be no debate on the main question. Thus liberated from every restraint, and armed with the newly forged weapon of the previous question, a mad majority, in the wantonness of power, at midnight, when all that was not passion was stupor, proceeded in their career of legislation. The call of "previous question" negatived amendment; a second cry of "previous question" engrossed the bill; a third shout made it a law. Yet this is the precedent on which our present exposition of the previous question rests for its basis! True, we reject every part of it, but that which the majority now finds an interest in retaining. We deny its propriety in forbidding debate on an appeal, for three days have not passed since we solemnly debated an appeal from the Speaker's decision. We hold it erroneous in applying the previous question to an amendment, and cause it to take effect on the bill or resolution itself, stepping over the amendment. But we follow it as a guide for prohibiting discussion on the main question. It is, sir, a well-known rule of evidence founded on common sense, that if a witness manifest a disregard for truth in any part of his testimony the whole of what he says is discredited. You can in such a case have no security that he relates the truth at all. And by the same reason, when a precedent is cited for the exposition of a rule of action, which bears on its face a violation of rule, it should be thrown aside altogether.

Full well do I remember the first instance in which I witnessed the use of this newly expounded previous question, and never shall I forget the feelings which it then excited in my bosom. It was at the first session of last Congress, and on a bill to impose a direct tax of $3,000,000 on the people of the United States. In that bill we had undertaken to assess, without any valuation, the precise sums which were to be paid by the several counties in each State. To remedy the injustice which this haphazard assessment must necessarily produce, a gentleman from Tennessee, of great influence in the House [Mr. Grundy], moved an amendment, restricted in its terms to the State of Tennessee, authorizing a correction of such injustice by the board of assessors after a valuation. The amendment was about to be adopted by an almost unanimous vote, when some gentleman moved to amend it, so as to extend its application to another State. This was agreed to by the House. It was then moved to amend it further by extending its provisions to the parent State of Tennessee, to North Carolina. Sir, the previous question was called and carried. The main question was ordered to be put; the amendment first proposed—the amendment to it, which was accepted, and the further amendment to it, when the previous question was called, were declared to be swept away by this besom of destruction; and without debate, without an opportunity of amendment, the bill was engrossed. Such a mode of laying taxes was so abhorrent from all my notions of freedom, that new as I was here—an unfledged Member—I dared to join in an appeal to the House from the decision of the Chair, and vainly, yet zealously, exerted all my powers to reverse it. Use, sir, has rendered the previous question more familiar to me, but it has not diminished my abhorrence of it. On the contrary, use has but the more fully explained the detested ends which it can be made to answer. Six times at least was the previous question used in the last session to put down discussion and the exercise of representative freedom. Once on a bill giving arbitrary powers to the deputies of collectors; twice in relation to the conscription project; three times upon the mammoth bank bill. Thank God, it once recoiled with salutary violence on those who used it. The last stupendous scheme of political folly and wickedness (such I deemed it), owed its failure to the use of the previous question. Many gentlemen on both sides of the House know this to be the fact.

By what argument is this innovation—this outrage on parliamentary law—thus hostile to the spirit, if not the letter of the Constitution, to the rights of the people, to the independence of their Representatives, to the very purpose for which law is needed—by what argument is its justification attempted? They may be all comprised in one word—"necessity." Necessity! The excuse for every folly, the pretext for every crime. Necessity! Which the miserable culprit, who steals a loaf to feed a starving family, pleads in vain at the bar of your criminal courts, but which successful tyrants in every age have made the apology of their usurpations on freedom—necessity requires this previous question. I deny it, sir! Centuries have rolled away in England since the forms of free debate belonged to their Parliament, yet the necessity of a resort to this instrument of coercion never has been there discovered. Our Continental Congress managed the momentous affairs of this Nation during many years of war and revolution, and they found not this necessity. Twenty-two years had passed under our present form of government before the necessity was pretended. No instance can be shown of a fair exercise of legislative power being prevented by the want of an unlimited authority to silence discussion. And unquestionably before a forfeiture is decreed, of the fairest and best privilege belonging to the people and their Representatives, one offense, at least, ought to be clearly proven. "But a case may be imagined in which it might be necessary to have this supreme control over the right of speech. Suppose the last day of the session and a law highly salutary about to be enacted, which a few obstinate Members are resolved to defeat by protracted debate, it would be necessary in this case to silence them." Sir, there is no species of political empiricism more dangerous than to make rules of ordinary application with a view to extreme and barely possible cases. It is, in the language of the immortal Burke, "to make the medicine of the Constitution its daily bread." Extreme cases carry their remedies with them. But I see no such necessity in the case supposed. If the law be essential, the next Congress may pass it, and if the ordinary delay be injurious it may be immediately convened. But, then, "laws can not be enacted with convenient dispatch." Let us not indulge the chimerical hope of a government exempt from every political inconvenience, more than of an animal existence free from the infirmities of nature. The ponderous strength of the elephant and the swiftness of the greyhound are not found united. The vigor and promptitude of despotism accord not with the freedom and public virtue of republican governments. While we enjoy the invaluable blessing of liberty, let us not murmur at the trivial price we pay. Dispatch in lawmaking is inconsistent with deliberative freedom. Fortunately, it is not in itself a quality of great value. Dispatch is essential in the execution of laws, but salutary caution should preside in the making of them. Five times in the course of the last session this "necessity" for speedy legislation forced the previous question on the bank and conscription bills, yet so purely imaginary was this "necessity" that no legislation took place upon them—none were enacted into laws. An intelligent individual is now scarcely to be found in the United States who will not admit that the nonintercourse project, to establish which, with convenient expedition, was the justifying end of the first outrage on free debate, was beyond measure silly and mischievous. Legislate in haste and you are sure to repent at leisure. But it is "necessary there should be a power to correct abuses of the right of speech." I admit you have the legitimate power to correct abuses, but you have none to abolish the right. You may correct them, if it is found expedient, by restricting still more the frequency of speeches; by permitting wide and general discussions only on subjects which fitly bring into view the state of the Nation; by admonition from the Chair against casual wanderings; by the censure of the House for obstinate and contemptuous abuses of its patience; by assigning specific days for specific business, and continuing the session until the business be done; and, above all, by the most powerful of all correctives—by marked inattention to the effusions of vanity and folly. The two last remedies which I have mentioned have been found all sufficient in the British House of Commons. A debate there on an interesting subject takes place at the appointed day, and is scarcely ever adjourned over. If the prolongation of debate here from day to day be injurious to the public business, why do we adjourn it from day to day? Say not that you put down freedom of speech from "necessity," when you are governed merely by the fear of a cold dinner. Inattention to vanity and folly I hold also to be a justifiable and an effectual remedy. Not that I would consent to put down a speaker by conversation, rude noises, or any such indecent expressions of dissatisfaction, but when the love of talking evidently got the better of modesty and good sense, and this superiority was often manifested, the orator should declaim to empty benches.

Every man has a right to speak, but every man has also an imprescriptible right to rescue his ears and his brain from the invasion of nonsense. This remedy might not produce an instantaneous cure, but it would prove efficacious in the end; at least as efficacious as most remedies for the disorders which infest a political community. It is not more essential to the well-being of this body to prevent abuses of the freedom of speech than to the well-being of the State to prevent abuses of the freedom of action. Because crimes occasionally escape unpunished from defects, either "in the evidence in the law, or the application of the law," does it therefore become "necessary" to abolish civil liberty through the land? So with all your correctives there will be occasional trespasses on decorum by unnecessary and tedious harangues. But is it on that account necessary to put the House under martial tyranny? Will you cure a wen by cutting off the head? Redress abuse by annihilating right?

"But the majority have a right to govern. It is for them to say when discussion shall end and action begin." If by right, sir, he meant power, the assertion is correct. Or if by government he meant only regulation within the compact of association, it is equally correct. But that a numerical majority of any society has a perfect right to do as it pleases is the most impious of political heresies; and a majority, acting on such an assumption, is the most dreadful of all despotisms. The primary object of law is an association of equals; the fundamental principle of the compact is to restrict the physical sovereignty within moral limits. In a republican government this is done by constitutional charters, by specific delegations of power to distinct and accountable agents, by oaths, by the influence of patriotism, and love of fame. In governments not republican it is effected by creating a political distinct from the physical sovereignty by vesting the power of the government in a king or an aristocracy. Sir, a majority uncontrolled by rule—unlimited in power, unembarrassed by impediments to action, find it where you may, in a nation, in a village, in a deliberative body—is misrule, tyranny, oppression, caprice, cruelty, and confusion; anything but free government. The majority here, like majorities elsewhere, where civil and political liberty prevails, have a right to govern according to the prescribed rule; and when a rule is about to be formed for limiting their action, it should be a rule which may indeed protect the rights of which it affects to have a care. Not a nominal rule, which imposes no restraint. Not a rule which leaves every right to the mercy of unlimited sway. "Strike," said the illustrious Athenian to his commander, "but hear me." The first may be your right, the second is mine. Such is the language to the majority. It is your privilege to decide, but the minority have a right to be heard.

Mr. Chairman, it is a maxim in the bill of rights of the constitution of that State, to which you, Mr. Yancey, and myself have the honor to belong, that "a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is necessary to the preservation of political liberty." In the bustle of incessant action, in the animated contests of parties, goading and goaded by each other, in the paroxysms of political fever, these principles will be forgotten. It is prudence, it is duty, to avail ourselves of a season when passion is lulled and reason is free to act, when the preternatural excitement has abated to review past errors and guard against their recurrence. The rule in question ought not to exist. No majority should be trusted with it. A majority never can be found who will use it discreetly. The day you make a man a slave, it has been said, you deprive him of half his virtue. The day you make him a despot you rob him of all. Human nature can not endure unlimited power, and bodies of men are not more discreet in their tyranny than individual tyrants. This rule is not needed for any legitimate purpose. Every one of its fair objects may be answered either by a motion to postpone to a day certain, or by the motion for indefinite postponement. I speak in this respect from experience. Ten years since, on a revisal of the rules of order in the most numerous branch of the Legislature of North Carolina, the previous question was expunged. It has never since been known there, nor has any subsequent legislature experienced inconvenience from the want of it.

This moment is peculiarly favorable for an impartial decision on the proposition before us. The return of peace has brought about a new order of things, which must be followed by modifications of parties impossible to be distinctly foreseen. Interests which have been heretofore opposed will be found acting in concert; and jealousies and enmities, which a common feeling has suppressed, will be roused into activity. There are few, perhaps there is no intelligent member of this body, in whose theories and maxims of political philosophy the changes and trials through which we have passed have not produced some alteration. Besides, an event approaches which in every free country is necessarily accompanied by party mutations; the Executive power is about to change hands. At this moment no one can confidently pronounce whether before this Congress closes he will be found among the majority or minority of the House. This then is the auspicious moment for putting down, with one consent, this odious tyranny. The victims of oppression should disdain to become its instruments; the possessors of arbitrary power know not how soon they may be compelled to feel its injustice.

The committee rose, without coming to any decision on the question; and the House adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1922.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, breathing that endearing name we would recognize relationship to Thee and realize that our first service should be rendered to Thee, to our fellow men, to the great interests of the country in which we live. We pray to-day for heavenly guidance in all matters of duty, to the glory of Thy name. Through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PROSECUTIONS UNDER ESPIONAGE AND OTHER WAR ACTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney General in response to Senate resolution 226, directing the Attorney General to inform the Senate relative to prosecutions under the espionage law or for conspiracy to violate war laws, agreed to January 25, 1922, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BORAH subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for but a moment with reference to a letter which has just come to the Senate from the Attorney General. A few days ago I submitted a resolution asking for certain information with reference to the conviction of persons under the espionage act, with reference to those who are charged with crime and not yet tried, and so forth. The Attorney General in his letter says:

> In reply I beg to advise you that the department is not in possession of all of the information requested, nor is it readily obtainable. In fact, it is doubtful whether in some respects the information can be obtained at all. Certainly it will be necessary to circularize the United States attorneys throughout the country, and even that, in all probability, will be insufficient.

The Attorney General closes by saying:

> The department will further consider these questions and an effort will be made to comply with the request of the Senate as fully as practicable and consistent with the public interest, but a considerable delay is inevitable, and I may say its cost at this time to the department will be a substantial item.

I had understood, Mr. President, when I introduced the resolution that this information was now in the hands of the Attorney General. I had that information from such a source that I thought it was reliable. I only wish to say that I have no desire to impose upon the Attorney General work which will lead to the expenditure of a large amount of money. I do not see how obtaining the information asked for in the resolution would lead to such an expenditure, and I do not desire that, but I should like to have such information as the Attorney General now has in his possession, which can be sent to the Senate, I am sure, without any considerable cost, or, indeed, at practically none at all. I feel that if all of the information which is now in the possession of the Attorney General or the Department of Justice is sent to the Senate it will be a practical compliance with this resolution.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce transmitting a list of documents and files of papers which are not needed in the transaction of the business of the department and asking for action looking to their disposition, which was referred to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The President pro tempore appointed Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. FLETCHER members of the committee on the part of the Senate and ordered that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes; also that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6 to the said bill; that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 20 and 21, agreed to the further conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. MADDEN, Mr. MAGEE, and Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4) granting relief to soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign; to widows, former widows, and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors; and to certain Army nurses, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS IN THE NORTHWEST.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not very often ask for the printing of letters in the RECORD, but I have had a special request to ask for the printing in the RECORD of copies of two letters which I hold in my hand, dealing very largely with the industrial conditions and the unemployment situation in the Northwest. I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

There being no objection, the letters were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[J. L. Freeman, State manager; State headquarters, 603–604 Rookery Building; box 132. State committee: August C. Jansen, Lind; Frank Robinson, Lilliwaup; William Bouck, Sedro Woolley; C. E. Flint, Blaine; J. P. Bush, Vancouver.]

Hon. BENJ. C. MARSH,
Care of Farmers' Council, Washington, D. C.

FRIEND MARSH: I am writing you this letter so that you may know the actual situation in the West.

There are thousands of farmers in Montana, Washington, and southern Idaho who are unable to send their children to school on account of not having books; a great many of them are living mostly on bread and milk; a good many of them have to go to their banker and beg for money enough to buy a sack of flour. Their crops were all mortgaged and all taken from them. There are a great many who have not been able to seed their summer-fallowed ground this fall, and there is not any hope of their being able to in the spring.

There are great, big, stout men walking the streets of our cities begging for sufficient money to buy a bowl of soup; they are also begging farmers to take them to the farm, where they are willing to work during the winter for their board. A great many of the farmers, even in our best districts, have not been able to pay their last summer's store bill; therefore they can not take these people who are hungry and out of work.

Farmers will be able to hire but very few men in the spring; in consequence poor farming will be done and acreage will be cut. This is a most serious condition and must be relieved. Money is not to be had by those who have the security. I have been for three months trying to borrow money, anywhere from $20,000 down, and have been able as yet to get none, although I have securities that are good, comprising wheat, live stock, city income property free of mortgage, land equities, and choice dry-farming land and irrigated land, up to $90,000. I have tried from Couer d'Alene, Idaho, to Portland, Oreg., and have failed entirely to get any money.

My sons have produced this year 35,000 bushels of wheat, which is sufficient to keep 7,000 people in bread. They have also produced forage enough, if fed to good milch cows, to furnish 3,000 babies with a quart of milk each day during the year.

We have got to have relief in the way of money or we can not carry on our farming operations this coming year. One of my neighbors who farms more extensively than we do is unable to borrow money, although he has any amount of security; the banker he is banking with loaned him $4,000 worth of time-deposit slips due in one year. He got my cousin, another large farmer, who is worth about $150,000, to accept these checks as payment in place of money, he thinking that he could borrow money on his note by putting these checks up as collateral. He tried all over the country, but found it impossible to do so.

There lies in the United States Treasury, or should be there, $55,000,000 that was taken from the wheat growers as a profit during the war. This money should be taken from the Treasury and divided equally among the wheat farmers as a present, so they may have food to eat, sufficient clothing so they can send their children to school, and funds sufficient to enable them to put in another crop.

I wish you would take this letter to Charles Barrett, president of the farmers' union, who I am sure will vouch for the truthfulness of anything I say or write, for I have known Mr. Barrett for many years. I also ask you to get this letter read before the Senate and House.

Hoping you will get quick action, I remain,
Yours, fraternally,

Y. C. MANSFIELD.

NATIONAL NONPARTISAN LEAGUE OF WASHINGTON,
Spokane, December 14, 1921.

Hon. LOUIS J. HART,
Governor of Washington, Olympia, Wash.

DEAR SIR: We write this letter to thank you for calling a meeting to discuss the unemployment situation. This we consider a very wise movement on your part, and it shows that it is your wish that best plans possible should be made to alleviate the present suffering, and we are thankful that we have a governor who is willing to listen to the people of the State in such a crisis.

There is at present a great lack of houses in our cities and smaller towns. The cities own a great many vacant lots that have reverted to them through taxation. Therefore we ask that these lots be turned over by the different municipalities to the State, the State to build houses on same. As the farmers have been feeding the people far below cost for several years, and are now facing bankruptcy in consequence, we think it no more than just that the dealers in building material be asked to furnish the material at cost, and we believe they would gladly do so. This would solve the building of homes and would give employment to a great many now idle.

There are a great many idle men walking our streets and begging for enough money to buy a bowl of soup. They are also asking farmers for the privilege of coming to their farms and working all winter for their board. The farmers are unable to take these men on, as they have not yet paid their store bills. Thousands of farmers have not been able to put in a full crop this fall on account of inability to get money, and will be unable to carry on their usual farming operations in the spring. So there is no hope for the unemployed to get work on the farms in the spring.

The War Finance Board opened an office in Spokane October 10. Up to the present date they have made but one loan, because the banks refused to cooperate with them; thousands of our farmers who have good security can not get money to carry on their farming operations, and a great many farms will be foreclosed. One of our largest and best wheat and stock farms in the State was foreclosed last week; as there were no buyers it was bid in by the mortgage company at $7 per acre. Live stock and machinery would practically bring nothing if put up at foreclosure sale at the present time.

Thousands of people in the cities who have been paying for homes on the installment plan are bound to lose the same; this is also true of many poor people who have mortgaged their household goods unless something is done to protect them.

We, therefore, beg that you ask the National Government to loan this War Finance money through our county treasurers under the supervision of our county commissioners.

We further ask that you proclaim a moratorium for at least one year.

Millions of people in Russia are starving on account of drought. Millions of people in the United States are suffering for want of food, and food products far below the cost of production. Farmers say if money can be deflated to make interest rates high, farm crops can also be deflated to make higher prices. This is the only hope they see. This will cause a great deal more unemployment and a great deal more misery and suffering.

Respectfully, yours,

A. D. ZANDER,
Chairman Executive Committee National Nonpartisan League of Washington.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NORRIS. I present a communication embracing a resolution passed by the Nebraska Senate now in special session, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and be printed in the RECORD.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE SENATE,
Lincoln, Nebr., January 28, 1922.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was adopted by the senate:

Whereas the Federal Government has, from time to time, enacted laws making sundry appropriations of moneys to the several States for various purposes upon condition of like appropriations by the States in aid of such purpose; and

Whereas the burden of taxation resulting from meeting such Federal appropriations has become grievously heavy, and an increasing number of Nebraska citizens have indicated their unwillingness to be so taxed as well as their disapproval of Federal control of State expenditures consequent upon the acceptance of Federal appropriations: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Nebraska State Senate in special session assembled, That we condemn this form of Federal appropriations and request the Senators and Representatives of Nebraska in Congress to use their influence to prevent further Federal legislation of this kind and instruct the secretary of the senate to forward copies of this resolution to the Nebraska delegation in Congress.

Yours, very truly,

CLYDE H. BARNARD,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a memorial of members of the science teaching staff of the University of Texas, of Austin, Tex., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation imposing a tariff duty on reference and text books, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LADD presented 65 petitions and communications in the nature of petitions of sundry citizens of the State of North Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation, so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Cannon Ball Community Club, of Hettinger County, N. Dak., favoring the enactment of legislation appropriating $5,000,000 for relief of farmers in drought-stricken regions, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the North Dakota Women's Christian Temperance Union of Fargo, S. Dak., favoring the extension of payment for 20 years of Austria's debt to the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Blaisdell and Tagus, N. Dak., remonstrating against a revision of the tariff laws, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committtee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1784) for the relief of John B. Elliott, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 479) thereon.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 3098) authorizing the extension of the park system in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 480) thereon.

REPORT ON ST. LAWRENCE RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. MOSES. From the Committee on Printing I report a concurrent resolution and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 18) was read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed 16,800 additional copies of Senate Document No. 114, Sixty-seventh Congress, entitled "Message of the President of the United States transmitting the Report of the International Joint Commission Concerning the Improvement of the St. Lawrence River," of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room, 500 copies for the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 100 copies for the Senate Committee on Commerce, 10,000 copies for the House document room, 1,000 copies for the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and 200 copies for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question for information, I assume the concurrent resolution simply provides for the printing of the formal report, not including the testimony which was taken before the commission.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no; there is no testimony included. It is to print extra copies of the report, for which there is a very pressing demand.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no doubt of that; but it occurred to me that if all the testimony was to be printed, while it might be of some value for reference, I think we are more interested in the conclusions and findings of the report. I am in favor of the resolution.

Mr. MOSES. It does not include the printing of any testimony.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I notice that the resolution provides for supplying extra copies to certain committees of the Senate, the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Commerce. I certainly have no objection to any committee or any class of Senators getting all the copies of the document they may need, but I have wondered why it was that these two committees were especially selected.

Mr. MOSES. I can tell the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. MOSES. In the first instance the proposed legislation covering this matter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which has already been inundated with requests from various parts of the country for copies of the report. The subject matter of the legislation was also considered by the Committee on Commerce, and that committee desires certain copies for the use of its members particularly. This allocation of copies of the report, as made through the document room and to the two committees, as stated in the resolution, has been reached upon full consultation with the committees and with the people who are most interested in the legislation.

Mr. NORRIS. Why is it that the Committee on Commerce and another committee have to be specially provided for?

Mr. MOSES. Because the Committee on Commerce is one of the committees which has had a great many requests for copies of the report.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to answer?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me get through first, and then I will yield the floor.

My own idea is that the class of people more interested in this proposition than any other one class are the farmers, the agriculturists of the West and Middle West. The proposed legislation was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am not complaining about that, but at least a great many members of the Committee on Commerce, for instance, are from sections of the country that will have no particular interest, and some of whom are even opposed to this waterway. In my judgment, there will not be one-third of the requests come to that class of Senators that will come to those who are on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MOSES. May I interrupt the Senator long enough to state that the 5,000 copies allotted to the document room of the Senate will take care of requests which may come to other committees?

Mr. NORRIS. That may be; I have no objection to the allotment of copies to the document room, but it does not seem to me to be right that two committees should be selected so that the members of those two particular committees will be provided for and everybody else will have to take potluck on the number of copies allotted to the document room. In my judgment, they ought all to go to the document room.

Mr. MOSES. If I may interrupt the Senator again, although I think I had the floor——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I concede the Senator has the floor. I am interrupting him with his consent, I hope.

Mr. MOSES. Absolutely. I should like to say to the Senator that the copies which are going to the committees are not for the use of members of the committees; they are for distribution by the clerks of the committees who are receiving these requests. It is well known that there will be hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations with reference to this legislation, and already the clerk of that committee is receiving requests literally by the hundreds for copies of this document. The copies which are allocated to the committees are not for the use of individual members of the committee, but to take care of the distribution of copies among those persons who, I suppose, will want to be heard by the Committee on Foreign Relations when the matter is heard.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be an explanation probably satisfactory as far as designating the Committee on Foreign Relations is concerned and giving that committee a special allotment. It does not apply, however, to the Committee on Commerce. In my judgment, it does not apply to the Committee on Foreign Relations any more than in any other case where an investigation takes place by a committee, and I do not believe there should be allocated to that particular committee copies set apart from the allotment made to the Senate generally.

Mr. MOSES. That is constantly being done.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand it so. There are a certain number set aside to the Committee on Commerce and a certain number to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Senator has said that, so far as the Committee on Foreign Relations is concerned, they ought to have more or perhaps ought to have a special allotment, because requests are coming there, and because that committee will have hearings. That is true. I presume when it is known that hearings are to take place before that committee a great many requests for copies will go to that committee.

The Senator who now presides over the Senate as President pro tempore [Mr. CUMMINS] is chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. That committee have had hearings in regard to various railroad propositions. Have we ever had a resolution brought in authorizing the printing of the hearings before that committee or of a document coming from that committee designating that that committee in particular shall have a certain number that will not be accessible to the Members of the Senate generally?

If we are going to do that with the Committee on Foreign Relations, then why not with every other committee? Heretofore I understand that such documents have been turned over to the document room and every Senator has been on an equal footing as far as getting a supply is concerned.

Mr. MOSES. That has already been done with one very large edition of the report.

Mr. NORRIS. And the edition has been exhausted.

Mr. MOSES. It has been exhausted, and these requests have come to the Committee on Printing in such a form as to warrant the Committee on Printing in formulating the resolution in the manner in which it has been presented this morning. Personally, as chairman of the Committee on Printing, I have no interest in any one of these copies. I am simply trying to make an allocation which will meet the demand which has already been tabulated and sent to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not by any means accusing the Senator of having any interest in the matter that is not proper or fair, but I am calling attention to what seems to me to be apparent. In the first place, as far even as the Committee on Foreign Relations is concerned, this is not following the usual practice. As far as the Committee on Commerce is concerned my own private opinion is that there will be twice as many requests come to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for this document as will come to the Committee on Commerce. I am not asking that anything be set aside for that committee, but it does seem to me that other committees ought not to have special allotments made for their benefit.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator refer to the Committee on Commerce or to the Committee on Interstate Commerce? The Committee on Commerce so far has had practically no requests for this report.

Mr. MOSES. These figures were sent, as I understand, by the clerk of the Committee on Commerce to the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing, who drew this resolution in order to meet the demand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am satisfied that the clerk of my committee has not sent any such statement, for I am sure he would not have done so without conferring with me, and he has not said a word to me about it. I am not absolutely sure, but I desire to make that statement with reference to the Commitee on Commerce.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, in reference to this report being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to say that I consulted with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is the chairman of that committee, and I believe the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce as to where the report should go. The report was laid on the table for a while until the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who was in the chair at the time, should determine the matter. He finally determined that, on account of the fact that the first recommendation was as to the negotiation of a treaty or an agreement with Canada the report ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that any subsequent legislation for carrying it out should go to the Committee on Commerce; at least that was my information.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The only decision which I came to at that time was that, under the circumstances, the report should go to the Foreign Relations Committee. My personal judgment is, without having made any investigation especially, that subsequent legislation should be referred to the Committee on Commerce; but that is a matter which will, of course, be determined later and probably will be determined largely by the character of the proposed legislation.

Mr. MOSES. That is exactly what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has just stated.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not know where the report should go, but I was informed that the Committee on Commerce took jurisdiction of matters relating to the construction of canals, waterways, and so forth.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And of water powers.

Mr. KELLOGG. And of water powers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no choice at all as to where it should go.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not contesting the fact that the report should go to the Committee on Commerce. When the bill is introduced it may be that some Senator will have a different idea and that I also may change my mind; I do not know anything about that; but I am rather inclined to agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that any bill on the subject ought to be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

That, however, is not my point; I am not asking that a bill when it may be introduced shall be referred to any particular committee; but here is a public document which is to be printed at public expense, and the resolution which provides for its printing allocates a certain number of copies to the Committee on Commerce. There is no reason on earth, in my judgment, why there should be a single copy allotted to that committee any more than there should be to any other committee of the Senate. A certain number of copies also is proposed to be allotted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which is to hold hearings.

Mr. MOSES. The chairmen of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House have submitted written requests for the number allotted to them in the resolution, and the two committees of the Senate which appear to be particularly concerned in this matter will receive many special requests for copies of the report.

Mr. NORRIS. But that is not the way we have been doing in the past.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, so far as the Committee on Commerce is concerned, it may be that the committee has not yet been called upon for these documents, but I am inclined to think that the legislation involved will eventually be handled by that committee, and then the committee will undoubtedly have calls for this document.

Mr. MOSES. By that time, also, may I say to the Senator, Mr. President, there will be additional matter which undoubtedly will have to be put into printed form. This is merely a preliminary report with the letter of transmittal from the President.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Committee on Commerce will undoubtedly need copies of the document. At present the report has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and perhaps they will be called on for copies of the report, but I think eventually the Committee on Commerce will also have need for copies of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If Senators will suspend for one moment, the Chair desires to observe—not with the expectation that the observation will be respected—that the request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution is not debatable. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. As the resolution has been debated, I suppose no Senator will object to a decision of the question.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

GOOD ROADS ASSOCIATION CONVENTION CANCELLATION STAMP.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3074) providing for a Good Roads Association convention cancellation stamp to be used by the Phoenix, Ariz., post office. I call the attention of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan for calling my attention to the bill reported by him. It simply provides that the postmaster at Phoenix may, for a period of four or five days, during the Good Roads Convention use a cancellation stamp with the appropriate 10 words which the rule permits to be used in such cases. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the use in the Phoenix, Ariz., post office of special canceling stamps bearing the following words and figures: "Visit Phoenix, Ariz., April 24–29, United States Good Roads Week."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL OF THE ARMY.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3113) to reduce the number of officers of the Regular Army, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the bill may be printed in the RECORD, and in connection with the introduction of the bill I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short letter from the General of the Armies, Gen. Pershing.

There being no objection, the bill and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

A bill (S. 3113) to reduce the number of officers of the Regular Army, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there shall be officers of the Regular Army as now authorized by law, except that, until it shall be determined by Congress that conditions justify maintenance of the numbers now provided by the act of June 4, 1920, there shall be 494 colonels, 555 lieutenant colonels, 1,850 majors, 3,700 captains, 5,735 lieutenants, including first and second lieutenants, and of whom not to exceed 3,515 may be first lieutenants, 1,053 officers of the Medical Corps, 1,077 officers of the Dental Corps, 144 officers of the Veterinary Corps, 81 officers of the Medical Administrative Corps, and 136 chaplains: Provided, That, until July 1, 1923, the total number of officers shall not exceed 13,000. Hereafter no officer, whose name is carried on the promotion list, shall be promoted to the grade of first lieutenant until he shall have served at least three years in the grade of second lieutenant. The number of officers herein prescribed for any grade or branch shall not be exceeded except as authorized by this act. Hereafter the number of officers of the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Medical Administrative Corps, and chaplains shall be as prescribed herein, notwithstanding any changes that may be made in the authorized enlisted or commissioned strength of the Regular Army.

SEC. 2. That, for five months after the date of approval of this act, there shall be no promotions of officers of the Regular Army to any grade below that of brigadier general, and thereafter there shall be no promotions to any grade that would cause the number of officers authorized for such grade by section 1 of this act to be exceeded. Vacancies existing in any grade below brigadier general on the date of approval of this act, and not actually filled by the acceptance of a tendered appointment, shall not be filled: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent promotions in the Medical Department and of chaplains as now provided by law.

SEC. 3. That within five months of the date of approval of this act the number of officers shall be reduced to not to exceed the numbers prescribed in section 1 of this act and 194 additional majors, 395 additional captains, 32 additional officers of the Dental Corps, 40 additional officers of the Medical Administrative Corps, and 22 additional chaplains: Provided, That the number of first lieutenants may be reduced to such number as the President may deem advisable: Provided further, That additional officers within the numbers herein prescribed are authorized only during such time as may be necessary by retirement, discharge, and other means to absorb such additional officers and to reduce said grades and branches to the numbers prescribed in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of War shall convene a board of five general officers, who, under regulations prescribed by him, shall select such number of officers, hereinafter designated as supernumerary officers, as may be necessary, in addition to officers removed from the active list by other means, to reduce to not to exceed the numbers to which reduction is to be made within five months of the date of the approval of this act as prescribed in the preceding section: Provided, That for the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, the Veterinary Corps, and the chaplains the number in each branch in each grade above captain shall be reduced not less than the same per cent that the whole number of officers of such branch is required to be reduced within five months of the date of approval of this act.

SEC. 5. That within five months of the date of approval of this act the President may, in his discretion, and upon application from the officer concerned, place officers upon the unlimited retired list or discharge officers under the same conditions as to length of service and pay as prescribed in the following section of this act for supernumerary officers: Provided, That no officer may be so retired or discharged whose retirement or discharge would reduce the number in any grade or branch below the number to which reduction is to be made within five months as prescribed in section 3 of this act: Provided further, That hereafter the President may, in his discretion, place upon the retired list any officer who, under existing law, may be retired on his own application.

SEC. 6. That supernumerary officers of more than 10 years' commissioned service shall, within five months of the date of approval of this act or as soon thereafter as practicable, be placed upon the unlimited retired list with pay at the rate of 3 per cent of their active pay multiplied by the number of complete years of commissioned service, not exceeding 75 per cent. Supernumerary officers of not more than 10 years' commissioned service shall, within 5 months of the date of approval of this act or as soon thereafter as practicable, be honorably discharged with one year's pay, unless they shall have more than seven and one-half years' commissioned service, in which case they shall be discharged with two years' pay: Provided, That supernumerary officers of more than 10 years' commissioned service, who so elect, may be discharged with 2 years' pay in lieu of retirement and retired pay as herein provided.

In computing service under this section, only service as a commissioned officer in the active service of the United States shall be counted: Provided, That any officer whose name is carried on the promotion list, who was originally appointed in a grade above second lieutenant, shall be credited with a length of service that shall be the same as that of the officer next above him on the promotion list who was originally appointed in the grade of second lieutenant prior to July 1, 1920; and any officer of the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Veterinary Corps, or any chaplain originally appointed in a grade above the lowest authorized for the branch in which commissioned, shall be credited with a length of service that shall be the same as that of the officer of said branch next senior in rank who was originally appointed in such authorized lowest grade; and captains and first lieutenants of the Medical Administrative Corps shall be credited with 10 and 5 years' commissioned service, respectively, to which shall be added their actual service as commissioned officers since July 1, 1920; and any colonel, except of the Medical Department, whose name is not borne on the promotion list and who was originally appointed in a grade above second lieutenant, shall be credited with the same service as the colonel, exclusive of colonels of the Medical Department, next senior in rank who was originally appointed in the grade of second lieutenant: Provided further, That any officer whose length of commissioned service is actually greater than that with which he would be credited under the foregoing proviso shall be credited with such actual length of commissioned service. Service shall be credited as prescribed in this section for the purpose of this act only.

SEC. 7. That hereafter there shall be no appointments in the Medical Department that will cause the number of officers of any branch thereof to exceed the number prescribed for such branch in section 1 of this act or that will cause the total number of officers of the Medical Department to exceed 1,455, exclusive of general officers now commissioned therein, and there shall be no appointments of chaplains that will cause the number of chaplains prescribed in section 1 of this act to be exceeded.

SEC. 8. That whenever the total number of officers of the Regular Army shall be less than the maximum number authorized by this act, the President may, in his discretion, order reserve officers to active duty with their consent within the limits of funds available appropriated for pay of officers of the Army, and within the vacancies existing in the Regular Army in the numbers authorized by section 1 of this act.

SEC. 9. That the officers provided by section 1 of this act shall be assigned to the several branches of the Army so that the number assigned to each branch, exclusive of the Medical Department and chaplains, shall be 82.4 per cent of the number prescribed for such branch by the act of June 4, 1920, but the President may increase or diminish the number of officers assigned to any branch by not more than a total of 35 per cent.

SEC. 10. That all laws and parts of laws, in so far as they are inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed.

FEBRUARY 3, 1922.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: The national defense act contains provisions for about 17,000 officers for the Military Establishment. Practically the full number could be suitably employed in the complete development of the national defense project contemplated by that act. The War Department appreciates fully the need for the utmost economy in proposing a reduction below that number. In fact, in the interests of economy the Secretary of War has refrained from making even sufficient appointments to offset losses, and has thereby saved many millions to the Government.

While it was possible to suspend appointments it has not been practicable to stop the promotions due under the law. As a consequence a commissioned personnel now exists that is not well balanced in the various grades. With a view to correcting this condition and to maintaining during these times of stringent economy a smaller and better officer body a bill to readjust the commissioned personnel of the Army is submitted for your consideration.

Briefly the bill will result in a reduction to about 12,000 officers on the active list. The reduction will be made in the various grades in such manner as to produce a suitable distribution throughout. The method proposed contemplates retirement and discharge of officers, some of whom will be those least effective, who can well be spared, and others who apply for retirement or discharge. The bill provides a compensation to the officers who go out that is believed to be equitable.

The reduction is so distributed in point of time that further unduly rapid promotion will not take place, because of the suggested absorption of a number of majors and captains. This method has an added advantage of making available the services of a number of additional majors and captains during the period of acute shortage in the lower grades before the contemplated procurement of new lieutenants can become effective.

Immediately following the elimination of about 1,000 officers appointments in the lower grades will be undertaken. To avoid too rapid procurement and to assure your committee of the department's sincere desire to effect economies the proposed bill fixes a limit of 13,000 officers for the fiscal year 1923. Before expiration of that year appropriations will have been made establishing a guide for future action.

In preparing the bill herewith it has been the constant aim to effect an immediate economy and at the same time maintain the morale of the Army. In its general provisions the bill has the approval of the Secretary of War, in whose absence it is submitted. I trust that the plan will meet with the approval of your committee.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN J. PERSHING,
General of the Armies,
Chief of Staff.

AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. CAPPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF CIVILIAN RECLASSIFICATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8928) to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service, ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 27, line 19, after the word "locomotives," insert the words "and steamboats," and in line 20, after the word "locomotive," insert the words "and steamboat."

On page 28, line 13, after the word "locomotives," insert the words "and steamboats," and in line 14, page 28, after the word "locomotive," insert the words "and steamboat."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4) granting relief to soldiers and sailors of the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, and Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign; to widows, former widows, and dependent parents of such soldiers and sailors; and to certain Army nurses, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR STANLEY.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, recently the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] delivered a very able address before a business organization in the city of Chicago. I have in my hand a copy of that address, which deals with the fundamental principles underlying our form of government which present conditions in this country are now challenging. It is very pertinent to the conditions which now exist and to much of the legislation that is being proposed. I think it ought to be generally read, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type and that the introduction be printed along with the speech in the same type.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

PERSONAL LIBERTY IS FREEDOM'S DISEMBODIED SOUL!

(Introductory remarks by Cincinnati Enquirer, Jan. 22, 1922.)

Aroused into action by the vivid consciousness of the fact that the tendency toward centralization of government is threatening the abolition of the autonomy of the State, which can only mean the destruction of the liberty of the citizen and the ending of the life of the Republic, United States Senator A. OWSLEY STANLEY, of Kentucky, recently before a gathering of 500 members of the business community of Chicago delivered what well may be described as one of the master arguments in support of the Federal Constitution.

As an historical and legal analysis of American government it ranks as a classic, and as a review of the origin and growth of Anglo-Saxon law in concise and succinct terms it easily deserves the title of a final authority. Viewed as a prophecy of conditions to come unless the old charted course of the fathers is steered, it is alarming because of the conviction it carries.

In the main it is a philippic against the invasion of personal rights, the home dwelling, and the affairs of business in general by clouds of spies, armed officials, and prying inspectors, and the taking upon itself by the Federal Government of the regulation, restriction, and supervision of almost every walk of life. With Edmund Burke, the Kentucky statesman believes that "all innovation is not progress," and he hurls his matchless mind and eloquent voice against the despots of to-day who, ghoul-like, seek to exhume the "dead and buried despotisms of the past."

Startling in his clarity and strength is his declaration that in order to make away with the splendid structure reared by Thomas Jefferson, with the individual citizen as the base, the bigots and crass reformers of to-day are inverting the Anglo-Saxon form of government which has stood for a thousand years and are assaulting the doctrine of inalienable human rights, which is the fundamental principle of the Declaration of Independence. They are seeking to substitute the monstrous theory that in a republic the citizen has no inherent personal liberty and enjoys only such rights as are conferred upon him by the majority—a harking back to autocracy when the subject lived upon the terms of the king or emperor.

In his address upon the theme "The Constitution—Is It Amended or Abolished, Which?" Senator STANLEY said:

PERILS OF PATERNALISM.

[Address by Senator A. O. STANLEY, delivered at the Blackstone Hotel in Chicago, Thursday evening, Jan. 12, 1922.]

The mastery of the world passed with the fall of the Roman Empire from the shores of the Mediterranean to the Baltic, and for a thousand years and more the arbiters of human destiny have sprung all from the loins of a Scandinavian warrior.

Whether as Franks or freemen upon the banks of the Seine, as Saxons and Angles amidst the green hills and dales of old England, or marauding pirates from the wilds of Schleswig and Friesland, their activities in peace and their valor in war have been dominated and inspired by one master passion, the maintenance inviolate of their personal independence, a jealous and eternal love of liberty.

In savagery or civilization he has little known nor long endured the sway of a tyrant or the presence of a master. For centuries he had little to fear from feudal chieftains whom he served in peace and defended in war. These haughty barons surrounded the throne, rivaling its magnificence and dividing its power, presented a barrier between the ambition of the medieval monarch and the threatened liberties of his subjects.

AND FEUDAL SYSTEM FELL.

By and by the improvement of firearms having rendered worthless all defensive armor, the feudal system fell, with its panoplied horse and rider. Alert and cunning courtiers, filching the power from the palsied hand of knighthood, erected upon the decaying ruins of feudalism the haughty houses of Bourbon and Tudor, of Hapsburg and Hohenzollern.

Strange to say, these stupid tyrants attributed this unholy increment of power not to gunpowder but to God. English Tories made the monarch "the delegate of heaven." "Kings," according to that ecclesiastical pander, Bossuet, "are gods, and share in a manner the divine independence." "I am the State," said the Grand Monarch, and the blustering German talks about "Me und Gott." I only am master, "suprema lex regis voluntas," shouts the Prussian Mad Mullah, before setting the world on fire.

With this blasphemous assumption of omnipotence, these odious despots attempted to hold their subjects amenable to them for acts for which freemen are answerable to God alone. A sceptered and illiterate medieval marauder assumed direction of every detail of the moral, spiritual, and industrial life of an abject and helpless people.

SCARCELY ANY BOUNDS.

There were—

Says Herbert Spencer—

scarcely any bounds to governmental interference; agriculture, manufactures, trades were regulated in detail; religious beliefs and observances were imposed; and rulers said by whom alone furs might be sold, silver used, books issued, pigeons kept, etc.

The shadow of the despotisms of Tudor and Bourbon, of Hapsburg and Hohenzollern, fell like a pall upon the civilized world, hope was blighted, industry paralyzed, sacred temples transformed into chambers of horrors, and "sweet religion made a rhapsody of words."

Men fled from an intolerable oppression they were unable either to endure or to resist and the eastern shores of the new continent were dotted by colonies of exiles scattered from the Florida keys to the mouth of the St. Lawrence.

There is a vital and generic difference between the English and the continental conception of the source and character of constitutional government. One places limits upon centralized power, the other will not tolerate its existence. Those free institutions once common to all Teutonic people, while obliterated by Bourbon despotism on the continent, were only obscured by the tyranny of English Kings. The Saxon churl, having lost his liberties, did not forget them. Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights, the Bill of Rights, the Constitution of the United States are the essential instruments for the establishment and maintenance of inherent and inalienable rights which God confers and governments invade.

These great charters confer no privileges; they prevent abuses. Says Buckle:

For 500 years all advance in legislation has been made by repealing laws.

HAMMERED OUT LIBERTY.

Our Anglo-Saxon ancestors—

Says Chief Justice Taft—

hammered out their civil liberty by securing from their would-be royal oppressors not general declaration of principles * * * but distinct and definite promises.

English jurisprudence has not created, it has preserved and restored local self-government and personal independence, and for 10 centuries it has jealously guarded them against the insidious invasion of power in every shape and form.

As barbarians "the basis of their society," says Green, "was the freeman," and after fifteen hundred years they make the sovereignty of the citizen the cardinal principle of all government. To this principle is due that high sense of personal honor, that deep sense of personal obligation, that superb resourcefulness, and that marked and unique individuality hitherto unknown among the children of men.

It was to preserve this birthright that the colonists welcomed persecution and exile, the solitude and the perils of the wilderness, famine and pestilence, penury and death.

APOSTLES OF FREEDOM.

At last, wearied by a century of struggle against purblind British despotism, they proclaimed and established their absolute and eternal independence.

An age of poetry produced Homer; of art, a Raphael and an Angelo; of discovery and adventure, Columbus and Magellan; of eloquence, a Webster and a Clay. So were Washington, Jefferson, and Hamilton, Madison and Monroe and their immortal confrères the evolution and the epitome of the ardent aspirations of a century of untold sacrifice and endless endeavor to gain and to hold the priceless boon of liberty. They stand preeminent in all the tides of time as the very apostles of freedom. They erected in the Western World and for a newborn Nation the most faultless and, I hope, enduring temple ever dedicated to the liberties of mankind. Without parallel in the institutions of the past, it is the incomparable model for the emulation of the free peoples of the future.

Towering, even among his immortal confrères, like some lone mountain peak above its foothills stood the political seer of the ages. The Sage of Monticello, with the audacity of genius, took a mere man, a simple citizen endowed with inherent and inalienable rights, clothed him with all power and authority, crowned him with the ballot, and organized society was formed by having this citizen confer certain authority upon officers of the law, his servants not his masters, commissioned for a fixed time to discharge specific duties necessary to protect and secure him in the possession of property and the enjoyment of life and liberty. These Commonwealths, for the sake of mutual protection, "formed a more perfect union," and the aggregate of the powers expressly delegated by the States formed the Federal Government.

FOUNTAIN WAS CITIZEN.

But the fountain, the source, of all authority was the citizen. This was the cardinal principle of Jefferson's philosophy; the sovereignty of the States was but a corollary; the largest measure of individual liberty, not State rights, was the "summum bonum" of his whole theory of government. The individual was surrounded by the precinct or township, the county, the State, the Nation, like so many concentric circles, and each in proportion of its nearness to the citizen was invested with the greatest possible jurisdiction. Each served a double purpose. It prevented the encroachment of one citizen upon the rights of another and presented between all and the ambition of a tyrant a series of stubborn barriers, each of which must be demolished before the liberties of a people could be engulfed in a Federal despotism.

Precincts, counties, States were all established for the eternal immunity of the property and personal rights of the citizen from the despotic, sumptuary sway of a centralized government. Then and now between the tyranny of centralization and the freedom of the citizen stands the integrity of the State.

I am not concerned with the mooted political question of State sovereignty. I am contending not for the right of the State to secede, but the right of the State to exist, for the maintenance of "an indissoluble union of indestructible States."

Wise and patriotic men of all political parties are to-day vividly conscious of the fact that we stand at this hour upon the edge of the abyss, that the abolition of the autonomy of the State means the destruction of the liberty of the citizen and of the life of the Republic.

For a century after the adoption of the Constitution sages and patriots stood watch and guard against the imminent and admitted peril of Federal aggression.

Let there be no changes by usurpation—

Said Washington—

for this, though it may in one instance be the instrument of good, is the ordinary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

It is my duty and my oath—

Said Lincoln—

to maintain inviolate the right of the States to order and control under the Constitution their own affairs by their own judgment exclusively. Such maintenance is essential for the preservation of that balance of power on which our institutions rest.

Our forefathers—

Says Senator LODGE—

founded a limited Government. The movement of to-day and the various measures of a socialistic kind extending governmental activities are breaking down those constitutional limitations and are intended to do so. It is well for us to stop and consider whether it is wise to destroy the Government which Washington founded and which Lincoln saved.

The national Republican platform of 1860 declared—

The maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic constitution according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend.

Every Democratic convention from the nomination of Jefferson to the nomination of Parker, for over 100 years, inserted a plank in its platform condemning Federal aggressions.

No political dreamer—

Said John Marshall—

would ever be wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States and of compounding the American people into one common mass.

There will always be dangers—

Says Elihu Root—

of developing our laws along the lines which will break down the carefully adjusted distribution of powers between the National and the State Governments, and, if this process goes on, our local governments will grow weaker and the Central Government stronger in the control of local affairs, until the local government is dominated from Washington by the votes of distant majorities, indifferent to local customs and needs. When that time comes the freedom of adjustment which preserves both national and local liberty in our system will be destroyed and the breaking up of the Union will inevitably follow.

THE PROPAGANDA AND ITS PURPOSE.

For what purpose are State lines to be obliterated and State rights ignored? To do the very things that State governments and county governments were originally ordained to prevent; to enable a Federal and centralized authority to invade the privacy of the home and the personal liberties of the citizen.

Whenever, by amendment or otherwise, you make a centralized government and not the citizen the source and repository of all power, you will not have amended, you will have abolished the Constitution of the United States. You will have inverted the whole system upon which for a thousand years the structure of Anglo-Saxon liberty has rested.

Three-quarters of a century ago the youthful Gladstone defended the union of church and state. Macaulay excoriated this abominable doctrine:

Mr. Gladstone conceives that the duties of government are paternal; a doctrine which we shall not believe till he can show us some government which loves its subjects as a father loves his child and which is as superior in intelligence to its subjects as a father is to a child. * * *

DRAWS ON FANCY.

In a withering "reductio ad absurdum" the great historian draws upon his exuberant fancy for grotesque and impossible instances for the exertion of paternalistic power.

Why should they not take away the child from the mother, select the nurse, regulate the school, overlook the playground, fix the hours of labor and of recreation, prescribe what ballads shall be sung, what tunes shall be played, what books shall be read, what physic shall be swallowed? Why should they not choose our wives, limit our expenses, and stint us to a certain number of dishes of meat, of glasses of wine, and of cups of tea?

How many of these things regarded by Macaulay as grotesquely impossible and absurd in an English monarchy are now attempted by the once free Government of the United States, a Government of limited, specifically delegated powers? Over 15,000 bills introduced in the present Congress, bills by the bale, passed and pending, and a blind and intolerant propaganda still grinding at the overworked legislative mill. Bills to inspect, operate, or regulate "the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker."

Bills to fix the price and control the distribution of lumber and coal, to regulate the making or marketing of cloth and grain. To censor, supervise, stop, or cure baseball, horse racing, moving pictures, venereal diseases, and the social evil.

Nobody escapes, everything in the moral, industrial, and commercial world is to be owned, operated, supervised, or censored from the birth of a baby to the burial of a corpse, and the worst is not yet.

ALL INNOVATION NOT PROGRESS.

The most conspicuous "progressive" is the most ingenious inventor of new ways and means of invading the vested rights of the States and the liberties of the citizens, like legislative ghouls exhuming the dead and buried despotisms of the past, unmindful of the wise aphorism of Edmond Burke that "All innovation is not progress."

In the ownership, operation, or supervision of the industrial and commercial activities of an empire, from telegraphs and telephones, steamships and railroads to the elimination of the boll weevil and the setting of a hen, Congress has created 100 different committees and commissions, boards and bureaus, and within 10 years has actually expended the appalling sum of $3,921,360,167.55, according to the official figures of these departments. If, however, the more dependable estimates of that able and accurate statesman, Senator KING, of Utah, are accepted, it reaches the incomprehensible aggregate of $7,500,000,000.

The bulk of this money was squandered in doing for the people what they could and should have done infinitely better for themselves. The entire cost of the operation of the Federal Government from the inauguration of George Washington to the Civil War does not approach this colossal and incomprehensible sum.

BEGETS NEW BUREAUS.

And worse still, this insatiate lust for inquisitorial power daily begets new boards and bureaus. The appetite for attending to other people's business "grows by what it feeds on," and their devastating cost increases by leaps and bounds. For instance, in the year 1916 the cost of operating the Government exclusive of expenditures for war purposes was $231,625,333; for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, the amount appropriated for the same purpose, not including the cost of the War and Navy Departments, pensions, Veterans' Bureau, and reduction of the national debt, is $1,115,517,366, or an increase of nearly 500 per cent. The difference in expenditures for practically identical services in 1916 and 1921 is, broadly speaking, the cost of these commissions with their innumerable army of agents and inspectors.

This administration's unprecedented majority of over 7,000,000 has been attributed to the League of Nations, although the attitude of the candidate was uncertain then and is an enigma now.

The truth is that the business interests of America accepted in good faith his promise "to take business out of politics and politics out of business." Talk to me of panics and depressions; the business of America is not panicky, it is paralyzed. You are nagging and breaking the brave heart and sanguine spirit of American enterprise. Its mighty limbs are bound by the departmental red tape of a well-meaning but misguided paternalism, subtle, suffocating, and resistless as the coils of a boa constrictor.

LIKE AN OLD, SWEET SONG.

Jefferson's second inaugural address, picturing a Government reverent of the Constitution and duly observant of its delegated powers, reads at this day like some "old, sweet song."

At home, fellow citizens, you best know whether we have done well or ill. The suppression of unnecessary offices, or useless establishments and expenses enables us to discontinue our internal taxes. These covering our land with officers and opening our doors to their intrusions had already begun that process of domiciliary vexation which, once entered, is scarcely to be restrained, reaching successively every article of produce and property. * * * It may be the pleasure and pride of an American to ask what farmer, what mechanic, what laborer ever sees a taxgatherer of the United States?

Senator Foraker in 1907 bemoaned the multiplication of useless offices and officers in his "degenerate day," declaring that—

The little band of 167 special deputies, agents, and inspectors on the pay rolls of the Government 10 years ago has been swelled to an army of more than 3,000.

Three thousand agents and inspectors! There are nearer 30,000 now. Sumptuary and inquisitorial bureaus and commissions have increased since then one thousandfold and Federal agents and inspectors filling the highways and byways, tread upon each other's heels at every turn and corner, more numberless and pernicious than the fleas and frogs of Egypt.

Every business man finds an inspector at his elbow, a Federal sleuth at his heels; houses are searched, homes outraged, and the public highways dappled in the blood of unoffending citizens by a multitude of agents and inspectors, ignorant of and indifferent to the law of the land and the rights of the citizen.

And to cap the climax, a commander in chief of an inquisitorial horde advises us that sacred and ancient safeguards, ordained and established by courts and constitutions, are fragile as "line fences," trifling things, to be demolished or despised, not by any legal authority, State or Federal, but in the name of "community good."

In a recent interview published in the New York World of August 28, 1921, the Hon. Roy A. Haynes blandly asserts that—

All laws restrict our personal liberty in some degree * * *. But these laws do not bother that man who values community good more than he does his self-indulgence. Our laws in this Republic are more than line fences marking the boundary of liberty and license.

What are these "line fences"? Charter rights as old as Saxon civilization, rights engraven in the organic law of the land, rights forever reserved to the States respectively and to the people. The question which confronts the American public at this hour is, Shall these sacred barriers be demolished? Shall Mr. Haynes's "line fences" be removed and the citizen left naked and defenseless before the aggressions of an absolute Federal autocracy dominated and controlled by the mad whim of a majority, unrestrained by any character of constitutional limitation?

WHAT IS DESPOTISM?

What is despotism? What is the essence of that evil thing? It is the invasion of those rights and privileges which are inherent and inalienable, enjoyed not by the grace of governments but of God. The sacred circle which circumscribes the independence of the individual and the sanctity of his person and his property.

This immunity of the citizen from such interference has been admitted for centuries by all free Governments and defended and maintained by the political economists in every civilized country on the globe.

"The liberty of every citizen," says the Commune, "ends where the liberty of every other citizen begins."

"If my action or my condition generally," says Kant, "can coexist with the freedom of every other, according to a universal law, anyone does me a wrong who hinders me in the performance of this action or in the maintenance of this condition."

Herbert Spencer stoutly maintains that—

Every man is free to do that which he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other man. The liberty of each is limited only by the like liberties of all.

Whatever theory we adopt respecting the foundation of the social union and under whatever political institutions we live—

Says John Stuart Mill—

there is a circle around every individual human being which no Government, be it that of one, of a few, or of the many, ought to be permitted to overstep; there is a part of the life of every person who has come to years of discretion within which the individuality of that person ought to reign uncontrolled either by any other individual or by the public collectively. That there is, or ought to be, some space in human existence thus entrenched around and sacred from authoritative intrusion, no one who professes the smallest regard to human freedom or dignity will call in question. * * * I apprehend that it ought to include all that part which concerns only the life, whether inward or outward, of the individual, and does not affect the interests of others or affects them only through the moral influence of example. * * *

NEVER MORE NECESSARY.

There never was more necessity for surrounding individual independence of thought, speech, and conduct with the most powerful defenses, in order to maintain that originality of mind and individuality of character which are the only source of any real progress and of most of the qualities which make the human race much superior to any herd of animals.

It will be admitted without cavil or question that if a king or emperor, a social or ecclesiastical oligarchy, should attempt to invade this sacred circle, to remove or demolish Mr. Haynes's "line fences," it would constitute an act of intolerable oppression, and that a free people, believing that "resistance to tyrants is obedience to God," would be justified in rising in arms against the presumptuous autocrat.

Is the tyrant less odious? Is our oppression rendered more endurable by multiplying our oppressors that a majority, not a monarch, may become the despoiler of its country and the oppressor of its countrymen?

As David Jayne Hill has aptly observed—

The fundamental question therefore is, How far may some individuals rightly enforce their own private will upon other individuals? By "some" we may mean one, in which case we would be thinking of an absolute monarchy; or we may mean a select few, in which case we would be thinking of an oligarchy; or, finally, we may mean a majority, in which case we would be thinking of a pure democracy. * * * It makes no practical difference whether that suppression of the individual is effected by one or a few or a majority of his fellow beings, since in all these cases he is equally divested of his rights. When the State does this, no matter what the form of government may be, it becomes despotic, and this tyranny should be regarded as odious.

OLDEST PROP OF DESPOTISM.

Says Nicholas Murray Butler:

The thoroughly obscurantist and reactionary doctrine is now taught, and curiously enough it is taught under the name of progress, that the individual has no rights save those which society confers upon him, and that society may by majority vote do what it pleases with him. This doctrine is the oldest prop of despotism and autocracy, and the despotism and autocracy is none the less despotic or autocratic because for an individual monarch there has been substituted a temporary and fortuitous majority.

Many—

in latter times have been prone to think that limitation of the powers of the government is only essential when the government itself is badly constituted; when it does not represent the people but is the organ of a class or coalition of classes. * * * This might be true if the nation in such cases did not practically mean a mere majority of the nation, and if minorities were only capable of oppressing but not of being oppressed. Experience, however, proves that the depositaries of power who are mere delegates of the people—that is, of a majority—are quite as ready (when they think they can count on popular support) as any organs of oligarchy to assume arbitrary power and encroach unduly on the liberty of private life.

Again observes this wise philosopher:

In some countries the desire of the people is for not being tyrannized over, but in others it is merely for an equal chance to everybody of tyrannizing.

ASPECT OF OBSESSION.

This willingness to imperil one's own liberty to destroy the liberty of his neighbor has in recent years assumed in certain quarters the aspect of an obsession.

In the words of Nicholas Murray Butler—

The desire to mind other people's business is becoming a disease, and with its spread the real duty of government and the real tests of its effectiveness are lost sight of.

This desire has recently assumed the ominous proportions of a pestilence, destructive of the finest thing in the life of the Republic, the individuality and the independence of the citizen. Strange to say, the advocates of a sumptuary régime are both conscious of and indifferent to the admitted ravages of this national malady.

Recently I heard on the floor of the Senate an utterance which, if made a generation ago, would have been received by press and public with universal surprise and abhorrence:

Another objection—

Said a learned Senator—

is that it infringes the personal liberties and rights of the individual. I have been surprised to hear it made upon the floor of the Senate of the United States. Mr. President, there is no such thing as personal liberty in a republic. * * * No man in a republic has any right to do what the duly constituted majority has declared shall not be done.

The Senator at least is consistent. He admits that the loss of personal liberty is the inevitable result of sumptuary legislation.

NEVER GREATER HERESY.

There never was a more pernicious heresy than that a mere majority is ipso facto vested with despotic power. The Constitution of the United States was primarily ordained and established not to place restrictions upon kings, for kings were impossible, nor upon a social oligarchy, because titles of nobility were prohibited, but upon the people themselves, upon the wild excesses of an unrestrained and temporarily maddened majority. This predominant purpose was reiterated with ever-increasing emphasis in the debates of the Constitutional Convention and universally deplored and condemned by the framers of the Constitution and by none with greater force or emphasis than Alexander Hamilton himself.

It is—

Says the great Federalist—

of great importance in a Republic not only to guard the society against the oppressions of its rulers but to guard one part of the society against the injustice of the other part. In a society, under the forms of which the stronger faction can readily unite and oppress the weaker, anarchy may as truly be said to reign as in a state of nature.

In discussing the efforts of the Constitutional Convention "to break and control the violence of faction," Madison declared:

The friend of popular governments never finds himself so much alarmed for their character and fate as when he contemplates their propensity to this dangerous vice. * * * By a faction, I understand a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community.

LET NOT FAITH LULL YOU.

Let not a cherished and superstitious faith in a universal electorate lull you into a false and fatal security—the delusion that because all have a voice in the selection of officers there is nothing to fear from their exercise of unwarranted and oppressive powers.

I believe—

Says De Tocqueville—

that it is easier to establish an absolute and despotic government amongst a people in which the conditions of society are equal than amongst any other. * * * I had remarked during my stay in the United States that the democratic state of society similar to that of the Americans might offer similar facilities for the establishment of despotism.

There is but one difference between the despotism of a monarchy and the tyranny of a majority, the tyranny of the majority is all-pervading and infinitely more unendurable than the wanton exercise of the same powers by a single individual.

De Tocqueville has well observed that—

When the Roman Emperors were at the height of their power the different nations of the Empire still preserved manners and customs of great diversity; although they were subject to the same monarch, most of the Provinces were separately administered; they abounded in powerful and active municipalities; and although the whole Government of the Empire was centered in the hands of the Emperor alone, and he always remained, in case of need, the supreme arbiter in all matters, yet the details of social life and private occupations lay for the most part beyond his control. The Emperors possessed, it is true, an immense and unchecked power. * * * They frequently abused that power arbitrarily to deprive their subjects of property or of life; their tyranny was extremely onerous to the few, but it did not reach the many; it was fixed to some few main objects, and neglected the rest; it was violent, but its range was limited.

THERE IS LITTLE TO FEAR.

So long as a centralized government exercises only delegated powers there is little to fear from the tyranny of the majority. Unwise and inquisitorial statutes may be enacted, but against their pernicious effects stands the invincible barrier of a sovereign state. It is the house of refuge—freedom's last and sacred sanctuary against every form of federal oppression.

A centralized government is impotent without a centralized administration.

Says De Tocqueville—

If the directing power of the American communities, having regulated the great interests of the country, could descend to the circle of individual interests, freedom would soon be banished from the New World. * * * When the central government which represents that majority has issued a decree it must intrust the execution of its will to agents, over whom it frequently has no control, and whom it can not perpetually direct. The townships, municipal bodies, and counties form so many concealed breakwaters, which check or part the tide of popular determination. * * * This point deserves attention, for if a democratic republic similar to that of the United States were ever founded in a country where the power of one man had previously established a centralized administration and had sunk it deep into the habits and the laws of the people, I do not hesitate to assert that in such a republic a more insufferable despotism would prevail than in any of the absolute monarchies of Europe, or, indeed, than any which could be found on this side of Asia.

LIBERTY NOT ENTIRELY DEAD.

The Attorney General happily assures us that personal liberty is not entirely dead as a result of Federal aggression and sumptuary regulation; it has just been rendered "academic," which is infinitely worse. With our liberties dead and buried, in time, perchance, we may become reconciled to our chains. But if it is "academic" they will talk about it forever, and we shall not even be permitted to forget that we are slaves.

What is this thing they glibly say is now dead or "academic"? It is the assured enjoyment of every privilege, of every right which can not be bought or sold; it is a spiritual, not a material, thing; it is freedom's disembodied soul.

The recent and stupid attempt of bigotry to raise a false issue, to confuse the whole vital question by confounding personal liberty and sensual indulgence, is ridiculous and absurd. Liberty is as far from license as the zenith from nadir. That man is to be pitied who confounds an inestimable blessing and a mere carnal indulgence. The mental caliber of the alleged jurist or statesman who can make no distinction between an aspiration and an appetite is to be commiserated or despised. Compared with human rights, property rights are dross. This confounding of independence and indulgence has no warrant in common law, common sense, or common decency.

Prior to the startling pronouncement of the senior Senator from Washington and the Attorney General of the United States no statesman and no jurist has ever been guilty of so egregious a blunder. It is abhorrent to every sane conception of civil government and confounded by the most simple and elementary principles of the law.

RIGHT TO HAPPINESS.

Bouvier defines "personal liberty" as—

Freedom from physical and personal restraint; the right to the pursuit of happiness; freedom to go where one chooses and to pursue such lawful occupations as may seem suitable.

In its broad sense personal liberty would include freedom from unlawful arrest and restraint, from unlawful seizures and searches, from assault and battery, from libel and slander, from general warrants of arrest, from unfair monopolies in trade, and from quartering soldiers in time of peace; and it would include also the right of trial by jury, liberty of conscience, freedom of the press, the right to travel and emigrate, to bear arms, and to petition the Government for redress of grievances.

In a recent stump speech delivered before the American Bar Association at Cincinnati the Attorney General is credited with the most remarkable assertion ever made by an alleged jurist before any bar association, State or National:

The questions of the limitations of personal liberty—

Said he—is, in the first instance, a question of political philosophy and not of law. * * * There will be differences of opinion among the constituent members of society on questions of this sort. As long as they remain purely speculative questions in the realm of the political philosophy proposed by their respective advocates as the basis for social organization there is and can be no objection to them.

Looking back over the blood and tears and turmoil, ever present and ever enduring between the despoilers and the defenders of human liberty, my heart is filled with a vain regret that some such original and ingenious philosopher could not have made his appearance at an earlier date. Think of the tumults he could have quelled and the dynasties he could have saved.

MADE ENGLAND LIKE CALDRON.

The lawless attempt of Charles I to seize the persons of five members of Parliament made England boil like a caldron and transformed the city of London into a maddened mob. That invasion of the personal rights of an individual plunged a nation into civil war and cost a foolish king his head.

What a pity the Attorney General was not a member of the Long Parliament! How easy it all would have been, how simple was the solution! He could have enlightened an indignant assembly, quieted the turbulence of a seething city by the all-consoling assurance that immunity from false arrest is a strictly personal privilege, a harmless invasion of the personal liberty of the citizen with which legislators and courts are in no way concerned, that it is in fact a matter of philosophy and not of law. Pym and his friends would in all probability have gone to jail, and Charles would have saved his scalp and his crown.

A century or so ago Bourbon despots weary of "the law's delay" fell into the rather reprehensible habit of just handing a little billet-doux to a convenient pimp or pander, and forthwith some hapless soul found himself in a dungeon, left to wonder why he was in jail and how he was to get out. One fine July day a whole city mutinied against this unspeakable outrage; "the mud took fire and a tattered rag became a banner," and all Paris moving against the royal prison razed it to the ground, and then they chopped off the head of the sceptered fool who had peopled it with misery and despair.

MATTER OF METAPHYSICS.

If only Mr. Daugherty had been a citizen of Paris then, how easy to have explained the whole situation to an unreasonable populace. "Lettres de cachet," after all, are not legal documents, just a new and comparatively harmless form of philosophical disquisition; for the cruel and causeless arrest of unoffending citizens is, according to this unique solon, a matter not of law but of metaphysics, a question not for courts but for the encyclopedists and the Royal Academy; not a cause for revolution, just a fitting subject for a high-school debate.

I commend to the country's legal adviser the illustrious example of a learned and immortal predecessor. A civilian by the name of Milligan, having been tried without the intervention of a jury and condemned to death by a drumhead court-martial, the Attorney General, outraged at this invasion of the personal liberty of a comparatively obscure and simple citizen, appeared in person before the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the greatest defense of human rights and free institutions ever uttered in the English tongue, Jeremiah Black, pleading for the personal liberty of a condemned felon, expressed his abhorrence of this cavalier contempt of human rights by officers of the law sworn to preserve and protect them.

In the opening sentence of an immortal plea he impresses the court with the vital importance and the far-reaching effect of the violation of personal privilege and a constitutional right not by an individual but by the deliberate act of an organized society.

I am not afraid—

Said the great jurist—

that you will underrate the importance of this case. It concerns the rights of the whole people. Such questions have generally been settled by arms. But since the beginning of the world no battle has ever been lost or won upon which the liberties of a nation were so distinctly staked as they are on the result of this argument. The pen that writes the judgment of the court will be mightier for good or for evil than any sword that ever was wielded by mortal arm.

The words of the greatest forensic orator of his day will go "sounding down the ages" to thrill the hearts of the free and to inspire the valor of the daring so long as the love of liberty is the highest aspiration of a human soul.

From my boyhood I have abhorred the institution of chattel slavery—that barbarous custom imposing chains and stripes upon the body of a cowering wretch to make him work to suit you. It is only less abhorrent, it is only less barbarous, than that still more savage thing, intolerance—the servitude of the soul—invoking the thumbscrew, the rack and the boot, the stake and the jail to make men think and act to suit a self-constituted master.

Yesterday we embattled 4,000,000 men to save the Old World from the sumptuary sway of a military martinet, from the dominance of a despotism which, having enthralled the spiritual, moral, and industrial life of the German Empire, threatened to fasten its odious chains upon the civilized world. Have we made the Old World "safe for democracy" only to leave the new a hapless prey to intolerance and oppression? God forbid!

By the valor and the blood and the new-made graves of our deathless dead, I appeal to the free spirit of America to stand for our liberties here as they stood for freedom there on the bloody fields of Soissons and of Chateau-Thierry and in the hell of the Argonne.

For a time unmindful, we can not long forget "the proud and tender memories of the past."

To save us from a bigot's sumptuary sway, the ragged Continentals fought and fell, and patriots and sages laid deep and strong the institutions of the free; for the security of the citizen, the sanctity of the home, heroes have reddened a hundred fields of fame and with their precious blood incarnadined the seas. We shall not surrender, we will never betray, the palladium of a people's liberties—the Constitution. It must and it shall be preserved.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, a copy of a letter which I have written to a constituent in regard to the so-called Newberry case.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, in 8-point type, as follows:

JANUARY 26, 1922.

Mr. THOS. MARSHALL,
Lock box 561, Kirkland, Wash.

DEAR MR. MARSHALL: I appreciate very much your courteous letter of 20th. I have made several statements as to my views of the Newberry case, but do not suppose the newspapers to which they were sent have printed them in such a way as to attract attention.

There is no dispute about the central features of the case. Senator NEWBERRY was not in Michigan during either the primary campaign or the final campaign, but during all that time was serving in the Navy at the place to which he was ordered, New York City. At the same time he had three sons and a brother in the military service. He paid little attention to what was going on in Michigan. It is not charged that he expended any money, or at least no amount subject to criticism. A large amount of money was raised by Republicans in Michigan in his behalf and expended in advertising and other legitimate purposes, although the amount, of course, was larger than it should have been. The incentive, no doubt, which influenced the Republicans in this effort was to offset the tremendous publicity carried on at perhaps ten times the expense of the Republican campaign by Mr. Ford through his various business agencies, probably the greatest publicity organization in the country. The campaign was in 1918, in the spring and early summer, at the critical stage of the war, and it was made a war issue. The entire Wilson administration, with every powerful agency under its command, was for Henry Ford, who was attempting to be nominated on the Democratic ticket as well as on the Republican ticket, and who was a pacifist, had opposed the effort to bring the war to a victorious conclusion, was in favor of a compromise peace, and who had secured the military exemption of his son. I only mention these circumstances to show the conditions under which the campaign was carried on.

Another circumstance, which is not disputed at all, is that there is no evidence whatever that any improper amount of money was used in the general election campaign, at which NEWBERRY was elected to the Senate. The only evidence introduced was as to the expenditure of money in the primary election, at which he was nominated. In the general election at which he was chosen Senator the very question of the expenditure of money in the primary election was submitted to the voters of Michigan and made the chief issue in the campaign. In it the people of Michigan, without any undue influence of any kind, and with none charged, vindicated Mr. NEWBERRY from the charges against him and elected him, by a fair majority, in a fair election, to the United States Senate. It is difficult to go back of that election and say to the people of Michigan that it shall have no effect in view of the circumstances related above, in which it is not charged that NEWBERRY was guilty of any misconduct, and when the election was carried on under the circumstances described.

Senator NEWBERRY was prosecuted, with great venom, by the Democratic administration which had backed Ford, and the powerful machinery of the Government, with its myriad of secret-service agents, and with its machinery of district attorneys and marshals, was ordered to the task of securing evidence against NEWBERRY and sending him to prison. This, of course, was also backed up by the powerful influence of Henry Ford, controlling and owning one of the greatest and most powerful and wealthy industrial organizations in the world.

Fortunately for the liberties of the country this tremendous combination was halted by the Supreme Court of the United States, which, in a decision going most thoroughly into the matter in every respect, completely vindicated Senator NEWBERRY of any offense. They also held that the law under which he was prosecuted was unconstitutional, but, in addition to that, they went into the merits of the case and held that he had not received a fair trial and that he was not guilty of any misconduct.

Upon a vote in the Senate, in which every Democrat who voted was arrayed against Senator NEWBERRY, following the partisan attacks which had been made upon him in the election and in the prosecution referred to above, the Senate, following the Supreme Court of the United States, exonerated him from blame and declared his election to the Senate valid.

The country has been filled with malicious propaganda and false charges as to this case. The assertion is constantly made that Senator NEWBERRY'S seat in the Senate was bought for $200,000. As stated above, there is not a single word of evidence to show that a dollar was improperly spent in the general election at which NEWBERRY was elected, and in which the whole matter was fairly submitted to the people of Michigan. It is also repeatedly stated that NEWBERRY bought his seat in the Senate. The evidence shows that he expended no undue amount of money and took no interest in the campaign, but devoted himself to his work in the Navy throughout the campaign, both the primary and final.

Various false assertions have been made as to influences brought to bear to secure votes in NEWBERRY'S behalf in the Senate. I notice a detailed statement in that connection published in several Washington State papers as to my own vote. This statement is libelous and false from beginning to end, as no such influences were brought to bear and no such statements, or anything resembling them or anything to that effect, were made to me.

On the contrary, certain multimillionaire organizations, profiting financially by any popular excitement which they can arouse, were seeking by every means in their power to influence and intimidate Senators to vote against NEWBERRY. This may be referred to in more detail later on.

To have condemned an innocent man, under the whip and lash of powerful agencies of the kind mentioned above, seeking to control the public affairs of the country, would have been a gross act of injustice.

With sincere regards, very truly yours,

MILES POINDEXTER.

MEAT PACKERS AND UNRELATED LINES OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to call up Senate resolution 211, which is now lying on the table. I ask that it may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 211) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE January 16, 1922, was read as follows:

Whereas the former Attorney General, in 1919, following a public announcement that indictments would be sought against the five principal meat-packing companies for alleged violation of the Sherman law, did enter into negotiations with certain representatives of the said meat-packing companies or others, as a result of which on February 27, 1920, a consent decree was entered in a case brought for that purpose in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to wit, United States v. Swift & Co. et al.; and

Whereas there was much publicity as to the alleged benefits that were to result to the public from said consent decree, and particularly that it was to take the packer defendants out of unrelated lines, such as the grocery business, and make them "butchers and nothing more"; and

Whereas in the last three years there have been several reorganizations of packer companies, both before and since the decree, such as those by which the stockholders of Swift & Co. and of Wilson & Co. (Inc.) continue to control very large grocery businesses through Libby, McNeil & Libby and through Austin, Nichols & Co. (Inc.), respectively, and Armour interests likewise still control the Conway Hotel Supply Co., formerly Smith, Richardson & Conroy, a grocery and meat-distributing concern in Florida, and other reorganizations, such as the Armour Leather Co. and the Swift Internacional, some of these reorganizations being tantamount to evasions of the decree, and others tending to confuse the public as to the real extent of packer control in various industries; and

Whereas the existence of said consent decree was a factor affecting the consideration of legislation by the committees of Congress and by Congress itself, to wit, packer and stockyards act, 1921, in that while this legislation was pending the consent decree was agreed to, and based upon that fact provisions concerning unrelated items were stricken from the bill and the said act was passed on the assumption that the decree would stand unchanged; and

Whereas strong efforts have been and are now being made to have the Attorney General seek modification of the decree, so as to permit all the packer defendants to engage without hindrance in the unrelated lines, including groceries: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Attorney General should not, without specific authorization of Congress, advocate nor consent to any modification of the decree already entered in this cause, and that the Committee on Agriculture be authorized and directed to investigate this entire matter and recommend to the Senate what action it deems necessary in the premises.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the nature of a substitute for Senate resolution 211, it is proposed to insert the following:

Whereas it is a current report in the newspapers that the Attorney General of the United States has been considering, and is about to apply to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for a modification of the decree entered by that court on February 27, 1920, against the Big Five meat packers upon their written consent in an action brought under the Sherman antitrust law, which decree prohibited them, among other things, from (a) continuance of ownership of stockyards and stock-market newspapers, (b) owning and operating retail meat markets, (c) owning capital stock in public cold-storage warehouses, (d) handling fresh milk and cream, except as common carriers, (e) transporting and engaging in the manufacture and sale of certain food and other products not related to the meat industry referred to as unrelated lines; and

Whereas the Senate at the time of the passage of public act No. 51, Sixty-seventh Congress, entitled "An act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes," commonly known as the packer and stockyards act, 1921, had before it the decree of the court above referred to, and in determining the various provisions of the said packer and stockyards act, 1921, as finally passed, did so in reliance on said court decree, consented to by the packer defendants in a prosecution under the Sherman antitrust act, to cover the subjects contained in said consent decree; and

Whereas any modification under said decree upon agreement between the Attorney General and the defendant packers, or at the request of either, would entail upon Congress the reconsideration of the subject in part covered by the packer and stockyards act, 1921: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be requested to report to the Senate (a) what steps, if any, have been taken to enforce and carry out the terms of said decree, (b) what modification, if any, has been proposed to him, or is being considered by him, with a view to his applying to the court for the adoption thereof, (c) any and all evidence which may have been taken in the recent hearings on the subject before the representatives appointed by the Attorney General's office; and be it

Resolved further, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized and directed to investigate this entire matter fully and recommend to the Senate what action it deems necessary and desirable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator yield for a suggestion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The resolution as read refers to the proceedings of the committee as appointed by the Department of Justice or the Attorney General. My advice was some time ago—and I made inquiry because I have had, as, no doubt, the Senator has had, a great many inquiries touching on that question—that the plan at that time was that there would be a hearing before a committee to be composed of one representative from the Department of Justice, one representative from the Agricultural Department, and one representative from the Department of Commerce, and it was suggested that those who desired to be heard—and there were a great many of them, as I understood—would be heard by this committee. There is simply that little variance between what I understand the facts to be and the facts as stated in the resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I have recited those facts in the preamble to the resolution substantially as the Senator has stated them. Such a committee was appointed, the committee has had its hearings, now has the subject under consideration, and is likely very soon to make some recommendation to the Attorney General. I very much fear that the committee will recommend a modification of the consent decree. The purpose of this resolution is to call for the testimony that has been taken by this interdepartmental committee and to have the matter thoroughly looked into by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry before any action is taken by the Department of Justice on the recommendation of this committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think I am in entire sympathy with the purpose of the Senator. Possibly I did not gather the full import of the resolution from the one reading.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I have recited in the preamble substantially the facts, and a succinct statement is there set forth as reasons why the resolution should pass. As it is a resolution looking merely to the securing of information by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and reporting such information to the Senate, I am disposed to submit it to a vote without taking the time of the Senate to discuss it at length. I do not think that a valid objection can be offered to its adoption. I am quite prepared, however, to go into it very fully if it is the desire of the Senate that it should be debated.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield, of course, to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the resolution should pass. The Congress will need the information that it calls for, and need it in the early future.

For some months a somewhat unusual proceeding has been in progress. A committee composed of one representative from the Department of Justice, another from the Department of Agriculture, and a third from the Department of Commerce, have been conducting a quasi judicial proceeding——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Entirely extra legal, however.

Mr. ROBINSON. And without any authority of law, within my knowledge, to determine the question of policy underlying a decree of the court affecting very important subjects. The decree of the court is intimately related to questions of legislation, not only those which Congress has heretofore considered, but others which Congress is now considering and may be called upon to determine in the early future.

I have received hundreds of communications relative to proposed modifications of this decree, and I am anxious to know what has been done and what is proposed to be done by this unusual committee, created as has been explained. I think the resolution calls for information that Congress should have in the immediate future, in order that we may be able to decide whether it is necessary to legislate upon the subject.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to make a suggestion in regard to this resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's resolution has two parts, as I look at it. The first one calls upon the Attorney General for certain information. The second one directs the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to make an investigation. I want to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that at the present time he take out the second resolution, directing the committee to make an investigation, and have the resolution passed—to which I can see no possible objection, either in this form or in any other, so far as that is concerned—calling on the Attorney General for this information. When the information comes in, it may be that the Senator and the Senate will be satisfied with the information; and, if not, then they can instruct the committee to go on and make an investigation. It struck me that it would be unnecessary for the committee to make an investigation while the Attorney General had instructions from the Senate to send certain information to the Senate.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is equipped, I think, to make this investigation and to get all the facts. There is no doubt but that the committee would be able to do it in a short time; but, if I correctly understand the resolution, the Attorney General may give all the information that is necessary, and make an investigation unnecessary.

I should like to inquire of the Senator if he does not believe that that would be the proper course to pursue?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I must say that I think it very important that the Committee on Agriculture should investigate this whole matter, as provided in the resolution. If such an investigation is made, I am convinced that facts would be disclosed which would result in such a report to the Senate as would insure legislation which would so safeguard this consent decree that neither the present Attorney General nor any successor will give assent to its modification.

Mr. NORRIS. I see the point the Senator makes. I think it is a good one, and it probably will be well for the Senate to take some action after the committee reports; but I think I ought to add that probably the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry would feel just a little bit embarrassed about starting out and making an investigation at the same time that we ask the Attorney General for practically the same information. When the information comes in—and I have an idea that it will come in fully and be satisfactory—it seems to me it would then be very proper for the Senator from Wisconsin to have the reply of the Attorney General referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with a view of getting, if the return of the Attorney General is not satisfactory, a further investigation, but in any case to report to the Senate what action, if any, ought to be taken in regard to the decree. If they reported that it ought not to be modified, that it ought to stand, and the Government ought to insist on its standing, and the Senate affirmed that kind of a resolution, it would accomplish, as I understand, just what the Senator from Wisconsin is trying to do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the consent decree is of vital importance to all lines of business which directly and indirectly compete with packer products. There is ample evidence which the committee can secure that there is a strong movement to modify the terms of the decree and destroy the protection which it now affords to the grocery trade and to other lines of business. I believe that this resolution should be passed and this investigation ordered; and if it is necessary to go into the matter fully to secure that action of the Senate, I am quite prepared to do it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, in view of the fact that the defendants in the case consented to the decree, what has been the change in the facts which would now justify a change in a decree to which they consented?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am very certain that there have been no changes in the situation; that the menace of the invasion into the field of unrelated businesses by the packers' organization is just as great to-day and in no respect different from what it was when this consent decree was signed and agreed to; and I ask for a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SPENCER. If I am right in my information, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia entered its packers' decree some time ago.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SPENCER. Now, upon what the Senator recites in Senate resolution 211, there is a current report in the newspapers that the Attorney General of the United States has been considering and is about to apply to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for a modification of that decree. Has there been any application to the court for any modification of the decree, or is it a matter which, so far as the Senator from Wisconsin knows, is now or may be now in the Attorney General's office for consideration? I am asking for information.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There has been an appearance before the court here on the part of a representative of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association seeking the right to intervene on the ground that the decree was about to be modified. That right was granted by the court, and in a hearing on the motion H. J. Galloway, representing the Department of Justice, made statements which indicated his prejudice against the association which was trying to prevent a modification of the consent decree, but he was nevertheless appointed as a member of the interdepartmental committee of three, another member of the committee being selected from the Department of Commerce, and another member of the committee from the Department of Agriculture.

At the instance of the department this extra-legal committee was created and an investigation was started. Hearings have been had before this committee. These hearings covered a period of some two or three weeks. Testimony was taken. One of the packers, Mr. Armour, who is interested in a California fruit canners' organization but who himself has remained in the background, has, through this California fruit canners' organization, been the chief promoter of the movement to secure the modification of that decree.

Some 12 or 15 witnesses have appeared on the part of those seeking a modification of the decree. To be a little more specific about it, two representatives of the California Cooperative Canneries—a Mr. Campbell and a Mr. Gray—two representatives of the National Sauerkraut Packers' Association, two Virginia tomato canners, a tin-can manufacturer and a banker, two Maryland oyster canners and a tomato canner, and one Michigan farmer—Mr. Roland Morrow—were the witnesses who appeared and who have been examined by those proposing a modification of this consent decree.

The representatives of more than 2,000,000 business men and producers in this country have appeared in opposition to the modification of that decree. Much testimony has been taken. The matter has been argued. I have gone over the record pretty carefully. I can not escape the conviction that this committee has manifested a strong bias in favor of a modification of this decree. I believe that the decree is in danger. I think action should be taken to remove that danger, both for the present and the future, in so far as may be. I have conferred with the representatives of the Wholesale Grocers' Association, those representing farmer and other organizations, some of whom have taken part in the hearings before the Attorney General's interdepartmental committee, and I know that they are very apprehensive that unless the Senate acts upon this resolution this consent decree will be speedily so modified that the packers may be given an opportunity to capture the entire grocery business of the country.

Mr. President, that is not a thing which the American people will submit to, and I believe that the Senate should move in this matter, and should move promptly.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I am indebted to the Senator from Wisconsin for answering the question, and my information leads me to be sympathetic with the purpose he has in mind. As far as I have information, my present judgment is that the decree should not be modified; but what occurs to me is the impropriety of saying to the Attorney General of the United States in a pending case where as yet no definite action in regard to modification has even been applied for, much less granted, "Send us down a statement of what your plans are, what you propose to do."

As lawyers we know that is premature. We have no business to ask the Attorney General to send us information with regard to his plans in connection with a pending case until that case is determined. If the Attorney General seeks a modification and consents to it and there is a modification granted, it may well be that Congress may have to act; but as the Senator from Wisconsin outlines it, no modification of that decree has yet been asked for by the Government. There is no modification of that decree pending. There is a newspaper rumor that the Attorney General is considering the possibility or the desirability of seeking some modification of that packers' decree.

I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that the decree should not be modified, but I can not agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that we have any right to ask the Attorney General for the information, which this resolution asks for, at this stage of the proceedings, and I am wondering whether the Senator from Wisconsin would feel that the purpose of his resolution, with which I sympathize, would be entirely carried out if the first resolution—that is, lines 1 to 9 on page 2—were eliminated, and the second resolution, by which the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are authorized and directed to investigate the entire matter fully and recommend to the Senate what action it deems necessary and desirable, were adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri were coupled with the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, it would wholly destroy the resolution and leave nothing for the Senate to consider.

Mr. President, there is information enough before the Senate to warrant action on the part of the Senate for the protection of legislation which the Senate, in conjunction with the House of Representatives, enacted into law less than a year ago. At the extra session of the Congress we passed a bill to regulate the packers. In the passage of that bill it was argued, not only before the committee of the Senate and the committee of the House but before the Senate and before the House and finally in conference, that there was no reason why Congress should write into that bill any provision to prevent the packers from monopolizing the grocery and other unrelated lines of business because this consent decree had been entered into and could be relied on to restrain the packers and to protect the unrelated lines of business from being captured by this great monopoly.

Relying upon the consent decree Congress enacted the packer bill and left out of it all provisions for the protection of the grocery business and other unrelated lines of business.

I have before me a paragraph taken from the conference report on the packers' bill, which related to the packers' surrender of the ownership of the stockyards. The conferees struck out that provision, relying upon the consent decree for its enforcement.

The report of the managers at the conference on amendment No. 8 reads as follows:

This amendment adds to the bill a provision that after two years from the passage of the act no packer engaged in interstate or foreign commerce shall own or control, or have any interest in, any stockyards unless the Secretary of Agriculture determines that such ownership or control or interest "is not in violation of the purposes of this act, or that the packer has been able, 'despite due diligence,' to dispose thereof, in which case the Secretary may by order extend the period during which such ownership, control, or interest may continue." The matter is now dealt with more effectively in the consent decree as it relates to the large packing concerns; and the Senate recedes.

The Senate receded from that provision of the bill because of the existence of this consent decree, and now, after the packers appeared before the committees of Congress and secured immunity in the legislation which we passed last session from any interference with these unrelated lines of business, and time has been allowed to elapse so that the interest of the public in the matter is somewhat less sharp and watchful, a movement is started to modify this consent decree. It is not a matter of mere newspaper rumor and report; hearings have been held by this committee appointed by the Attorney General, the facts are before us, and it is high time for the Senate to act in this matter.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will ask the Senator from Ohio to wait just a moment, if he will.

Mr. WILLIS. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association became alarmed last September and obtained the right to intercede after a hearing on September 30. In the hearing on that motion the Wholesale Grocers' Association protested through its counsel, Senator Hoke Smith, and Mr. Galloway, of the Department of Justice, who is now one of the impartial judges upon this committee which is to make recommendations to the Attorney General, resented in this language the appearance of the representatives of the grocers' association to protest against a modification of the consent decree. Addressing the court in opposition to the motion, Mr. Galloway said:

> This Government, your honor, does not need any Ku-Klux Klan or any Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association or any similar association to enforce its laws.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. What form did the request for modification take? What did they ask for in the way of a modification? That point has not been made clear to me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will refer to the record and state exactly what it was.

Mr. McNARY. If it will require any time, I will not ask the Senator to do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to have the Senator read further what was said by this man who represents the Government in speaking of the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association. I would like to know what he means by that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can only determine his meaning by what he says.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suppose the southern grocers have a right to intervene.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would suppose so myself.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suppose they had a right to protest against the action of a Government officer who slanders the representatives of the South who are there looking after their interests.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator whether the Southern Wholesale Grocers' Association have not, by order of the court, been allowed to intervene in the case——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand they have.

Mr. FLETCHER. And become a party to the suit? So perhaps any modification of the decree would have to be based on their consent, as well as the consent of the others.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senator from Wisconsin, while he is looking up his notes——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Probably in a proper proceeding the power inheres in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to modify its decree in this or in any other case to meet what it finds to be the requirements of justice. It is certainly an unusual proceeding, after an application for a modification of a decree has been made to the court, that proceedings there should be temporarily suspended while an extrajudicial body enters upon a prolonged investigation to determine whether the decree already entered by the court shall be modified.

The Attorney General, of course, in determining whether he will consent to a modification or advise it, has the right to inform himself by any means that he selects. I apprehend that after the objection to the modification was made the committee, composed of one representative from each of the three departments—Justice, Commerce, and Agriculture—was created for the purpose of obtaining information and advising the Attorney General as to the propriety of entering the supplemental decree applied for.

The question in that view of the matter assumes an aspect of extraordinary importance to the Congress. Underlying the decree and underlying any material modification of it are involved questions of important public policy. That the proceeding of the extrajudicial committee created at the instance of the Attorney General should have extended over a period of some three or four months emphasizes the comprehensive scope and character of the investigation being made for the Attorney General.

The statement quoted by the Senator from Wisconsin and attributed to the representative of the Department of Justice indicates that he felt the question of modification was one solely for the Department of Justice, and that the business interests affected or to be affected by the modification had no right to express an opinion or to intervene. The statement in any view was intemperate, indicative of passion, and lacking in any element that could have contributed to an impartial judicial determination of the public interest involved. It therefore becomes of very great importance that the information called for in the pending resolution be obtained before the modification has occurred. Congress, of course, can not control the discretion of the Attorney General in consenting to a decree or in consenting to a modification of a decree, but Congress can legislate on subjects within its jurisdiction to prevent what it deems to be action harmful to the public through the exercise of powers conferred by law on coordinate branches of the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. By courtesy of the Senator from Wisconsin, certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose we got a report from this man Galloway, a representative of the Government, who goes into court when the Wholesale Grocers' Association asked to intervene to protest against what was about to be done, and who asks for a modification of the decree and denominates them as Ku-Klux Klan? Does the Senator think such a man could sit as an impartial judge or make an impartial report?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated that the character of that remark is indicative of the fact that the proceeding, in so far as that representative of the Department of Justice is concerned, was controlled by passion and not characterized by attributes which are usually considered characteristic of able and honorable representatives of the Department of Justice. That is as modest a manner as any in which I can find language to characterize the conduct of this officer.

The point I am making is that if we are to do anything at all we should, paraphrasing the old adage, lock the stable door before the horse is stolen. Congress should move promptly in this matter, and if it is going to do anything it should act now, because the necessity appears.

I favor the resolution substantially as it is presented. We should get the information and go into the subject fully. Congress, as the proper authority of the Government to determine questions of public policy, should decide whether, if the decree should be so modified as to permit the packers to engage in businesses which they have been restrained or enjoined from pursuing, further legislation is necessary to protect the public against threatened monopoly. I think this is peculiarly a question for the Congress, and under all the facts and circumstances I shall take pleasure in supporting the resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, manifestly the executive departments have nothing to do with matters of policy. It is for Congress to fix the policies that are to be pursued by the Government.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] asked me a question which I did not have the opportunity to reply to at the time, and I wish to answer him now. The consent decree, among other things, provided that the defendants should be prohibited from owning any interest in public stockyard companies or stockyard terminals or in any stockyards, markets, newspapers, or journals. That was No. 1 of the consent-decree provisions.

No. 2 provided that the defendants are prohibited from permitting any other person, firm, or corporation to use their distributive system except that they were permitted to lease refrigerator cars to common carriers for public use.

No. 3 provided that the defendants are prohibited from engaging in any way in the manufacturing, selling, or distributing, except as common carriers, of a large number of specified food products, commonly known as unrelated lines.

No. 4 provides that the defendants were prohibited from owning, operating, or conducting retail meat markets; No. 5 enjoined them from owning any capital stock in public cold-storage warehouses; and No. 6 prohibited them from handling fresh milk or cream except as common carriers, and except as the same was used in the manufacture of products.

The proposed modification of the decree would entirely eliminate paragraphs 3, 4, and 5, which I have just read, and paragraph 12 of such decree, and also parts of other paragraphs.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator from Wisconsin has been very patient, and others have been very generous with his time. I do not desire to interrupt him. It may be that he has responded to the inquiry I am about to make, but I did not hear the inquiry made by the Senator from Nebraska.

The suggestion I wish to make to the Senator is quite the reverse of that made by the Senator from Missouri, with whom I do not agree in this matter. I think the purpose which the Senator from Wisconsin has in view in the first resolution is perfectly proper and I think I am in sympathy with it. He is asking there that the Attorney General should be requested to report to the Senate what steps, if any, have been taken to enforce and carry out the terms of the decree, and so forth. I see no objection to that.

But I am wondering whether the Senator would not consent to a modification of his resolution by striking out the second resolution, because it seems to me that it puts the matter in a light that the Senator does not intend. If I may be pardoned for saying it, I know the Attorney General and know him to be a man of courage, directness, and character. I have not any doubt at all that if the first resolution is adopted there will be full and immediate response. I would rather dislike to vote for a resolution that seems to put the Attorney General's department under inquiry and under investigation.

Why could not the Senator do this, or why would he not do it? Let the first resolution be adopted. Then, when the information comes back here, as one Member of the Senate I will say to him that if such information seems to warrant the investigation, I shall join with him in having it referred to the committee, but it seems a little bit ungracious to call for a committee investigation before we have given the department any opportunity to respond. I ask him, therefore, if he would not consent to let the vote be had on the second resolution, striking out the second resolution until we get the information? We can then determine that latter question. What does the Senator think about that?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is precisely the suggestion that was made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I answer now as I answered then. I think that the Senate is in possession of facts which should admonish us to act, and to act promptly and thoroughly, in the premises.

I am apprehensive that action may be taken by the Department of Justice and, I think, so long as the consent decree which the Department of Justice secured was made a basis for certain definite legislative action by the Senate that when a proceeding is under way in a department which can have no other purpose than to affect that legislation most harmfully that we are not called upon to wait until the injury is done. I contend that we should be prompt in taking action to forestall the modification of that decree.

I would like to call your attention to the fact that the Attorney General has inaugurated this investigation. There can be no dispute about that. He is already proceeding in the matter with a purpose that can have no other apparent objective than a modification of this decree. He has taken that action, as appears from the record, upon the application of no one who was a party to the decree, unless Mr. Armour, who stands in the background, can be considered as being on the record. This action by the Attorney General on the part of the Government to take up this question, with a modification of the decree as a possible outcome, does not give me the same confidence in resting secure without taking thoroughgoing action that it appears to afford the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator, with his usual sense of justice and fairness, says "apparently." That is right; that is just what I am driving at; "apparently" this may be so; but does not the Senator think it is a fair way to proceed, even if these things are "apparently" true, to give the head of this department, before the department is investigated, a chance to state to the Senate the facts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But in the meantime the head of the department may consent to this decree; and I do not myself want to take the chances of losing that position which we have secured through his predecessor in office of having these gentlemen on the record sign a consent agreement in the form of a judgment to stay out of these unrelated fields.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator has been so patient that I hesitate to interrupt him further, but I desire to ask one other question. If the resolution shall be adopted in its present form, does the Senator contemplate that the Committee on Agriculture should immediately institute an investigation of the Attorney General's Department? What are they going to do? Are they to wait until they get the information called for in the first portion of the resolution?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is a matter that can well be left to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. They will take these two resolutions and act upon them with intelligence and interpret them as related one to the other. If they get all the information they want from the Attorney General without pursuing the requirements of the second resolution, and are satisfied that the entire matter is in their hands, perhaps they will not find it necessary to act under the second resolution.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator from Wisconsin, I trust, understands my position. The resolution directs the committee to investigate somebody, and meanwhile we call on that somebody to report the facts to the Senate. It seems to me that the fair way to do is to let the report come to the Senate, and if such facts are shown as to warrant an inquiry, then let the department be investigated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am perfectly willing to take the judgment of the Senate upon it, and the Senator has a right to call for a division on the vote if he desires to do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin who is this man Galloway? I have been unable to find by examining the record.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He is an employee or an assistant in the department of the Attorney General.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is he acting under the Attorney General's orders?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He is.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is a fact which we ought to know. We should find out who he is, in view of his having made such a statement as that which has been quoted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We shall find out all about it when the resolution shall have been agreed to and executed.

Mr. President, the decree is inextricably involved in the packers' and stockyards' act that we have passed, in the administration of that act, in the administration of our anti-trust laws. The questions covered in this consent decree and its proposed modification are questions of public policy which Congress alone should decide. The dignity of the legislative branch of the Government, the rights of the public which are vitally affected by this decree, demand that these issues be brought before a legislative committee for full hearing and consideration. Congress ought to have opportunity to act in the light of adequate information. The matter is urgent. I hope this resolution will be passed promptly, for when it is passed I think the Attorney General will very properly and gladly defer action, pending the inquiry under the resolution.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, as I understand this matter, in effect the consent decree was the basis of most important legislation in this body. Having obtained that legislation upon that consent decree the parties now desire to change the contract upon which the Congress of the United States acted. I can not see any reason why we should not institute this inquiry in order to be informed, and I see every reason why we should demand to know before it is too late, because after the decree has been entered it will be too late.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I still believe the suggestion which I made and which was afterwards made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] would be the proper course, although I am not very particular about it; I do not consider it vital, as it involves merely the method of procedure. I have no objection to the amendment as it stands, except in so far as it seems to me that it is not the proper procedure, although the difference between what I think we ought to do and what the amendment proposes to do is not, probably, very great.

I have never had an opportunity to discuss the question before the Senate, and I shall not be able to go into the matter fully now; at any rate, it is not my intention to do so; but the consent decree, which an attempt has been made to modify, was a very peculiar proceeding in court, in my judgment. I have always believed that the decree was entered in court for the purpose of influencing legislation on the part of Congress. That it did influence Congress there can be no doubt, although it may be that if the decree had not been entered as an excuse for influencing Congress some other reason would have been given that might have accomplished the same result.

Mr. President, before the decree was entered, the newspapers were full of statements to the effect, and the country was led to believe, that an action had been commenced by the Government of the United States through the then Attorney General, Mr. Palmer, against the packers. Items of news which were printed and circulated all over the United States in practically all of the newspapers conveyed that idea. I believed it; I got my information from the newspapers. I supposed an action had been commenced by the Attorney General, Mr. Palmer. Various interviews from him and all kinds of propaganda went out over the country as to the wonderful results he was going to accomplish by that action against the five big packers. Then it was afterwards said that the packers thought it was such a "cinch" that they consented to it and did not go to trial.

At that time the Senate Committee on Agriculture was investigating questions relating to the packers. We had been investigating them for weeks; we had been conducting hearings which lasted over months, and made, I think, as nearly as a committee can, a complete investigation of the subject with a view of legislating. Everybody knew that; the country knew that; the Attorney General knew that.

I happened to be a member of the committee which was making that investigation. I know the committee discussed the matter, and I was of the opinion then, and so stated, that the agitation about an action in court was intended to cut us off.

I do not wish to be placed in the attitude of one who after a long time has elapsed says, "I told you so"; but I did tell you so; I said that if we paid any attention to that decree the time would come when the decree would be set aside or modified, after the agitation for the legislation had ceased, and thus the packers would obtain indirectly what they were satisfied they could not obtain directly.

The Senate committee did not pay very much attention to that decree, although it developed later that the action which the Attorney General was alleged to have commenced against the packers had not been commenced at all. That action never was commenced until the decree was ready to be signed. The petition was filed the day the decree was entered, and the answer was also filed at that time. It was a friendly lawsuit from beginning to end; the packers and the Government got together and agreed upon what they would do. Probably the packers consented to some things which they did not wish to consent to, but they were afraid they would get something worse in the way of legislation, and in order to head off legislation—I think they imagined they might head it off entirely—the consent decree was entered into. There never was any argument in court, there never was any evidence taken, and there never was a witness sworn; but the whole thing was shoved up to the judge, who had nothing to do but sign his name on the dotted line. When we obtained the facts it looked more like a "put up job" than anything else; it seemed to me there was nothing else to it. I think its sole object was to defeat legislation on the part of Congress.

I realize, Mr. President, that I can not prove that statement, but I believe it from the evidence, and I have said so in writing outside of this Chamber. I remember that when I sent to a farm paper, in response to their request to give my views, a statement concerning the matter, the editor of the paper was afraid he would be prosecuted if he printed what I had written, and wrote back to me and asked, "Can it be possible that what you have stated about this decree being agreed upon before the papers were filed and that there really never was any case commenced is true?"

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. How soon after the filing of the bill in equity was the decree entered?

Mr. NORRIS. My understanding, from my recollection of the testimony of the Attorney General himself, is that the decree was entered about three seconds after the bill was filed. All the papers were filed at once. It may be that, as a matter of fact, the decree was signed first; I do not know; but it was all done at one time.

There was not any suit pending; there was not any summons issued; there was not any evidence taken; the whole thing was fixed between the Attorney General and the packers.

As to the legislation affecting the packers which was passed by Congress, I did not get what I wanted. The Senate by a majority of two or three votes defeated the proposal of those who thought as I did and accepted the House bill and turned down the Senate bill. The House bill was less drastic than was the Senate bill. It was drafted around the consent decree to some extent. The amendment which was placed on the House bill in the Senate and which went out in conference was designed to avoid the very condition that we are facing now.

Mr. President, in order that the record may be properly understood, and because it shows that I was one of the conferees on that bill—in fact, it shows that I was chairman of the conferees on the part of the Senate—I wish now to state how it came about that the conference report was agreed to and submitted to the House and to the Senate.

The conference report was presented to the Senate just after I had broken down and had been carried to my home. I had a solemn agreement with the other Republican member of the conferees on the part of the Senate—and together we constituted a majority of the Senate conferees—that no conference report should be agreed to unless something would be conceded by the House in reference to the Federal Trade Commission during that session of Congress, which adjourned, as Senators will remember, some time late in November. But after I had been stricken down and taken to my home in this city and was in bed sick, hovering between life and death, the very next day the conference report came out and the Senate conferees receded, as the record shows, not only from the most important Senate amendment but from practically all other amendments which, in my judgment, were of any value and which would have made the bill better if they had been agreed to. I concede that men disagree as to that, and I may be entirely wrong and others right; but, while I was unable to be here, while my voice was stilled and I could not be heard, contrary to the agreement which had been solemnly made, that conference report came into the Senate and into the House of Representatives and was agreed to and became a law. Word of that action was brought to me on my sick bed. So, if the record be examined closely, it will be disclosed that when the report came my name was not attached to it. I wish to make this statement now, so that when the historian, whoever he may be, undertakes to investigate the subject and goes into it to find out what actually did happen, if he goes far enough, if he goes to the bottom of the matter, at least he must give me a clear record.

Mr. President, I understand from the newspapers that several interested parties want to have this decree changed. It is difficult for a man to say that a decree should not be changed, and I would not want to say it, because the changing of a decree of court is a matter of evidence. The court ought to look into it and see, and if there is reason for a change it ought to be changed, so I should hate to go on record as laying down a hard-and-fast rule and say that this decree never should be changed. It is different, however, from the ordinary decree, While it does not show on its face how it was put together and how it was gotten together, or that it was gotten on the record for the purpose of influencing legislation of Congress or of defeating legislation, everybody knows that that was true in regard to this decree.

It may be that somebody can show a reason why the decree ought to be modified. I do not know of any, but I do not want to foreclose anybody to show it; but it ought to be shown to Congress rather than to the Attorney General, because, as a matter of fact, as I have said, this is really a legislative decree, and the Attorney General never ought to modify it until the law is changed by Congress or until he is instructed by Congress to enter into a modification of it.

In other words, this decree is one about which legislation was to a certain extent drafted, and Congress did certain things in the legislation that it would not have done had it not been for the decree. Assuming that what the decree did would be permanent law, as the act of Congress was permanent, it omitted to legislate on some of the things included in the decree. We might have passed it as an act of legislation, and afterwards another Congress might have been convinced that we were wrong and modified it, so that there is nothing sacred about the decree or about an act of Congress. My contention is, however, under the peculiar conditions that surrounded this decree, that it ought to be treated the same as an act of Congress, and that the Congress ought to act before the decree is changed in the same way that it would be required to act if the decree, instead of being a decree, were an act of Congress.

I am entirely in sympathy with the proposition of passing the resolution here, or of passing a law—perhaps it ought to go through both Houses—instructing the Attorney General or the Department of Justice not to consent to any decree without submitting the facts to Congress and first obtaining their consent. I am inclined to think that when the Attorney General thinks of the matter in the light of what is shown by the record of the court and the Congress put together he would not do that.

This decree was brought about not by the present Attorney General but by his predecessor, and it may be that the present Attorney General does not know what moved the bringing about of this decree or how intimately it was connected with the legislation on the part of Congress; and I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I do not want to take any chance of having something happen while we are legislating.

The only objection I see to the suggested change that I think ought to be made in this resolution is that in the meantime this decree might be changed. That is true. I concede that, and if I thought that were true I would not want to change the resolution; but, in the first place, the resolution calls on the Attorney General for certain information, and then it instructs the Agricultural Committee to make an investigation along those same lines.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that he realizes that if the suggestion he made, and which I had the honor to follow, should be adopted this decree might then be changed.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. If we are to assume that the Attorney General is going to do any such rash thing as that, there is nothing in the resolution that would prevent it.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it might be changed anyway.

Mr. WILLIS. I am arguing with the Senator in favor of his own suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I know the Senator is; but I do not want the Senator to get the idea that I think the Attorney General is going to do anything underhanded or wrong about this matter. I have said that the Attorney General probably is uninformed as to how this decree came about, and how intimately it was connected with the legislation of Congress, and that if his attention is called to it and he finds out how it is connected I do not believe he will ever consent to a new decree—I do not see how in all fairness he can—unless he gets his instructions either directly or indirectly by a modification of the law from an act of Congress itself. It seems to me that if I were Attorney General, and I had brought to my attention how this decree came about and how it was connected with legislation, I should feel that while technically I could consent to any kind of a change, as a matter of equity and right I would not have a moral right to consent to any change unless I were directed to do so by the legislative body that was influenced by the decree in its official acts.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, several days ago I brought this matter to the attention of the Senate and urged that the Attorney General not modify the decree, as the packer legislation that was passed was based on that decree, and it would be unjust to the Congress to modify it in any way. I strongly favor the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for just one moment? I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not quite sure that I understood the Senator from Nebraska. Did the Senator take the position that even Congress would have the moral right to direct the Attorney General to assent to a modification of this decree?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not put it on the moral ground; but, in my judgment, Congress would have the same right and the same duty to consent to a decree that it would have to pass a law or to modify a law that had already been passed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Without being at all antagonistic to the Senator, I had made up my mind that the people have a right under this decree that the Attorney General has neither the legal nor the moral right to give away. I think the people acquired a right under this decree.

Mr. NORRIS. To the same extent, I will say to the Senator, that they would have acquired a right if the decree, instead of being a decree of court, had been an act of Congress. I think that decree, on account of the peculiar conditions that surround it, is practically the same as an act of Congress.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the people had a right to rest securely on a decree of court; that they had a right that nobody could take away.

Mr. NORRIS. There might be a right acquired under a decree of court, as there might be under an act of Congress, that could not be taken away without just compensation, at least; but I do not believe the decree had any more force than an act of Congress would have had.

Mr. CARAWAY. I rather think so, and I thoroughly agree with the Senator in the view that the decree was assented to by the packers because they thought it would be to their interest rather than to have an act of Congress. In view of what the Congress did with the other packer legislation, however, I rather think they made a mistake; I think they would have done better to rely upon Congress, but they were afraid to do it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not seen this decree; but I can understand how the court might keep a continuing jurisdiction of the subject matter of the case, as is often done.

I am going to vote for this resolution as it is presented by the Senator from Wisconsin. I would not so vote if I took the view of it which my distinguished colleague [Mr. WILLIS] seems to take. I do not regard this resolution as a reflection upon the Department of Justice. I do not think it was so intended. I certainly would not want to reflect upon the Attorney General in the least before I knew what his conclusion may be. I think he was within his rights in trying to get all of the information he could touching the question as to what policy he should pursue. On the other hand, I think the Senate is entirely within its rights if, under all of the circumstances, it thinks that there ought to be some additional legislation.

It is true that we ask for information from the Attorney General. It is true—and this is the only construction, it seems to me, that can be justly placed upon this resolution—that conditions are such that it may be necessary for the Congress to pass some further legislation. There is no reason why we can not pursue such course as seems fitting to us or why the Attorney General can not pursue such course as seems fitting to him. From the statements that have been made here it looks very much as if the entering of that decree might have had some influence with the conference committee in the preparation and presentation of its report. If that is so, then there is an additional reason why the Congress should be on its guard so as to protect the interests of all the people.

I certainly want it to be understood when I cast my vote on this question that I am not in the least reflecting upon the Department of Justice, and I do not think the head of that department would so construe it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3 of the proposed substitute strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4. The words "and be it" should be stricken out also, on page 2, line 9.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. President, I do not desire to be contentious about this matter. I shall support the resolution whether this amendment is adopted or not; but in view of what I have already said I want to call the attention of the Senate again to what we are about to do here.

Of course, it is perfectly proper to ask for this information. It is a very important matter. I suppose all Senators have received many letters and inquiries about it, and I think the matter embodied in the first portion of the resolution is perfectly proper. As I stated before, from what I know of the present Attorney General—who is a man of character and ability and courage; I know of his courage both as friend and as foe—I am perfectly confident that the information requested in the resolution will be promptly forthcoming.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it is an ungracious act, a thing that I do not believe the Senator from Wisconsin really had in mind in drafting the resolution, to say to a Cabinet officer: "We want this information, and meanwhile, while you are getting it ready for us, we will start another investigation of the department."

That, in effect, is what the second resolution means. Would it not be logical to adopt the first portion of the resolution and get the information? Then, when we have the information, if it becomes apparent that the subject should be gone into further, the Senate can readily act. It seems to me that is the fair thing to do, and better than to condemn the department by implication before there has been any investigation of them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the language of the resolution which the Senator from Ohio proposes to strike out, on page 3, is very broad in its terms, and was intended to elicit information not only from the Department of Justice but from the Federal Trade Commission, from the Department of Commerce, and from the Department of Agriculture. There is much information which the committee should have before it acts upon this matter, and I trust, sincerely, that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will not prevail.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I read the latter part of the resolution, it seems to me the only effect of it is a direction to the Committee on Agriculture to investigate, and my understanding is that the committee could do that now. If it saw fit to do it and thought the exigency required it, the committee could proceed to make all the investigation it is directed by this resolution to make. Does not the Senator so understand?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the Senator mean that it has that power without any direction from the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I mean.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not certain about that, and I would not want to leave it uncertain. I think the preservation of this decree just exactly as it stands on the record is very important to the people of the country, and I believe that the resolution should be passed in the amended form in which I have offered it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I agree entirely with the Senator in that respect, but I am inclined to sympathize with the view against directing the Committee on Agriculture to proceed with an investigation at any rate before we get the information we call for from the Attorney General, and for the further reason that I think the committee has full authority to make whatever investigation it thinks ought to be made along this line, and that the only effect of that part of the resolution is to direct the committee to do something which it has full authority to do now if it thinks wise to do it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the passage of the resolution, because I am heartily in sympathy with it. I am opposed to any modification of the decree entered, the so-called consent decree. I think it is more helpful than the legislation which went through at this session of Congress. I think the bill which passed the Senate would have been very valuable, but the one which finally passed was not.

I think there are rights construed under this decree which ought not to be displaced. I do not think the Attorney General has the moral right to consent to a modification of the decree, nor do I think Congress has. Therefore I hope the resolution will be adopted with the language in it which the junior Senator from Ohio seeks to strike out. I think there ought to be a full inquiry. There is no criticism of the Attorney General, either expressed or implied, in that part of the resolution, any more than there is in the part of the resolution which goes before. It simply asks for information. The assumption is that we are entitled to know, and that the Attorney General will be glad for us to know everything he knows, or anyone else knows, about this matter, and therefore I hope the amendment will not be adopted and that the resolution will be agreed to as introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Whereas it is a current report in the newspapers that the Attorney General of the United States has been considering, and is about to apply to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for a modification of the decree entered by that court on February 27, 1920, against the Big Five meat packers upon their written consent in an action brought under the Sherman antitrust law, which decree prohibited them, among other things, from (a) continuance of ownership of stockyards and stock-market newspapers, (b) owning and operating retail meat markets, (c) owning capital stock in public cold-storage warehouses, (d) handling fresh milk and cream, except as common carriers, (e) transporting and engaging in the manufacture and sale of certain food and other products not related to the meat industry referred to as unrelated lines; and

Whereas the Senate at the time of the passage of Public Act No. 51, Sixty-seventh Congress, entitled "An act to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes," commonly known as the packer and stockyards act, 1921, had before it the decree of the court above referred to, and in determining the various provisions of the said packer and stockyards act, 1921, as finally passed, did so in reliance on said court decree, consented to by the packer defendants in a prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Act, to cover the subjects contained in said consent decree; and

Whereas any modification under said decree upon agreement between the Attorney General and the defendant packers, or at the request of either, would entail upon Congress the reconsideration of the subject in part covered by the packer and stockyards act, 1921: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be requested to report to the Senate (a) what steps, if any, have been taken to enforce and carry out the terms of said decree; (b) what modification, if any, has been proposed to him, or is being considered by him, with a view to his applying to the court for the adoption thereof; (c) any and all evidence which may have been taken in the recent hearings on the subject before the representatives appointed by the Attorney General's office; and be it

Resolved further, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized and directed to investigate this entire matter fully and recommend to the Senate what action it deems necessary and desirable.

AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business and that it be proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, for a long while we have generally appreciated the fact that we have no well-established system of distribution of farm products in this country. It is one of the great problems in which the people everywhere are vitally interested. It is a question affecting the well-being not only of the producers but also affecting very greatly the highest interests of the consumers of the country.

We have done very little toward solving that problem, toward establishing some system of economical distribution of farm products. The effort now being made is in that direction. I do not know that this measure, if enacted into law, will cure the evils which we have experienced owing to a lack of system or that it will accomplish all that we would hope it might accomplish. It is, however, certainly a step in the right direction and one which we ought, without a moment's delay, to take, in my judgment.

It provides that the producers may organize into associations, may incorporate, if they like; that they shall be privileged to cooperate for the purpose of processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing their products in interstate and foreign commerce.

The feature about it especially interesting to my mind is that it is based upon the true principle of cooperation. If there are associations formed or if there are corporations organized, they will not be controlled by those having the largest interest in the capital produced and furnished for the use of these associations or corporations. A member of such association or corporation is allowed one vote. No member is allowed more than one vote. That feature itself would prevent a large amount of capital being handled so as to control such a corporation as may be formed, or such an association, and thereby create to a certain extent a monopoly. So, I say, the bill is based upon the true principle of cooperation, and it does not by its terms or by implication, and can not be made to, establish a monopoly or an association or organization in restraint of trade. I see no possible danger of the farmers of the country organizing in any way so as to establish a monopoly in the distribution of their farm products.

The farmers are in violent competition with each other at all times, and in competition with the world, and you can not change that situation. All you can do is to provide facilities whereby they may cooperate in the matter of marketing their products, assembling them, preparing them, and that sort of thing, for their own benefit, and which ultimately would be likewise for the benefit of the consuming public. This system would result in advancing the interests of both the producers and the consumers of the country.

I am cordially in full sympathy with the ideas and the plans which are back of this bill. I do not agree that it is necessary to amend the bill as proposed by the committee in order to avoid the establishment of a monopoly and I think it is advisable to place these associations or organizations outside the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law.

In my judgment there could be no monopoly established under the bill, and sufficient safeguards are provided in the original bill to protect the public against any sort of tendency toward a monopoly that would be injurious to them or unsound in principle.

Mr. President, whether this system, if established, will result in all we hope for it or not will depend a very great deal upon the management of the associations or organizations and upon their proper operation.

I venture to say that nothing has ever been done by Congress quite so beneficial to agriculture as the passage of what is known as the Farm Loan Act.

That act has been fully sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States as being in all respects constitutional and valid. Under that act the farmers of the country have been receiving some of the advantages and benefits which we contemplated, but they have not been receiving all that they were entitled to receive under that act, because it has not been allowed to function as it should have functioned.

The system was intended as a system of farm finance, based upon the cooperative principle, to be controlled by the farmers, managed by them, and independent of private capital and independent of political influence.

Conclusive evidence has come to me to the effect that although the needs of the farmers of the country have never been as great as they are to-day for the use of the facilities provided by this act, they have been denied the benefits which they were entitled to have and should have had if that act had been allowed its proper scope and function and operation.

There have been a few amendments to the act since it was first passed, some of them helpful. One amendment, however, has been distinctly detrimental. That was the amendment which provided that the temporary organization of the Federal land banks should be continued so long as the Federal Government held any of the bonds issued by those banks. The temporary organization of those banks was arranged by the Farm Loan Board. They designated the directors of the Federal land banks; and under that amendment, therefore, the Federal Farm Loan Board will appoint the directors and control the management of every Federal land bank in the country, notwithstanding the original act provided that the stockholders of any of those banks, namely, the farm loan associations, after the subscriptions to stock in the banks, respectively, by national farm loan associations shall have reached the sum of $100,000, were to have the right to elect six of the directors in such banks, known as local directors, and the Farm Loan Board was to name three of the directors, ultimately, to be known as district directors. In other words, the farmers themselves, for whose benefit the system had been established, who were the parties chiefly concerned and interested in the system, who were the owners of the stock of the bank through the national farm loan associations they organized and of which they were members, who were obligated as borrowers not only for the amount of the stock but in double the amount of the stock held in those banks, were entitled under the law to elect six out of the nine directors of the banks when the stock had been taken by the associations to the amount of $100,000 in the bank thus ready for permanent organization. But they have been denied that privilege by reason of the amendment mentioned.

The system therefore is at present almost entirely in the control of the Farm Loan Board, sitting here in Washington, appointed by the President, instead of being under the management of the people mostly concerned and interested, namely, the farmers of the country, who own the stock through their associations, and who are, as it is, denied their proper influence and direction and cooperation in connection with the operation of the system.

That situation is not only most harmful at present, it is not only denying to the farmers of the country the advantages to which they are entitled under the original act, but the result is to deny to them the benefits which they have a right to derive from it and expect as members of the farm loan associations, over 4,000 in number throughout the country, and as producers who are eligible under the act to enjoy the benefits for which the act provides. They are notified by Federal land banks, by direction of the Farm Loan Board, that they are to send in no more applications for the present; they are notified that the available funds have been exhausted.

They are discouraged and disappointed, unnecessarily so, because the law provides that when mortgages to the amount of $50,000, based upon appraisals through the Farm Loan Board, by its own appraisers, are tendered to and approved by the Federal land banks, then the Federal land banks are authorized to vote for the issue of bonds against those mortgages and offer those bonds to the public, subject, however, to the approval of the Farm Loan Board. No Federal land bank can issue the bonds and put them upon the market and obtain funds for the accommodation of the farmers until the Farm Loan Board approves such issue in writing.

So that at present the entire supervision of the whole system is in the hands of the Farm Loan Board; practically the control of the whole system is in the hands of that board, and the system is not allowed to function so as to meet the needs of agriculture and the crying demands of the farmers of the country who are prepared to come within the provisions of the act in respect to their applications.

It is now proposed by the Farm Loan Board that they shall have additional authority and power. In their last report they have made five recommendations, showing that their purpose is not only to continue this most unsatisfactory and unnecessary condition, but they are asking for additional power in order to perpetuate what will ultimately mean, I very much apprehend, a course that will result in the destruction of the system.

What do they recommend? First, that the executive management of the Federal land banks be permamently vested in the Federal Farm Loan Board. A conclusive answer to that proposal is the present situation of the farmers of the country and the present condition as to agriculture. Their management and control has resulted in such an inadequate supply of funds, such delays, and halting as to give rise to widespread complaint and dissatisfaction. They do not permit it now to function as it should function, and yet they say that they want Congress to so provide by law that they shall name a majority of the directors of each bank, thus giving to them the executive management of the banks for all time to come.

They boldly "recommend immediate legislation authorizing the permanent organization of the banks on the basis of seven directors, four selected by themselves and three by the national farm-loan associations. That means, of course, that they themselves would control those banks, because they would name a majority of the directors of each of the banks. I say the complete answer to that, without going into detail, is the present situation which has been brought about by the Federal Farm Loan Board, or which has arisen under their management. Up to this time they have selected all the directors in these 12 banks.

Second, they recommend in their last report that the Federal land banks be authorized to make loans direct to borrowers. That is an absolute departure from the principle upon which the farm loan act is based. It violates every notion of cooperation. Not only will they in that way destroy the farm-loan association and the principle of cooperation involved in the original act, but they will take from the bonds themselves one of the obligations upon which they rest, and that is the obligation of the farm-loan association.

Every farm-loan association is required to indorse and thereby become liable for the payment of mortgages taken from its shareholders by the Federal land bank of its district.

The bonds are secured by mortgages on real estate, by the personal obligation of the borrower, by the indorsement of the farm-loan association, and by the obligation of the bank. This recommendation would remove from their protection and deprive them of the additional security afforded by the indorsement of the farm-loan association in each case.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what reason they give for the suggested change which the Senator is now discussing?

Mr. FLETCHER. They do not exactly give it, but the only reason I can imagine is that the present Farm Loan Board wishes to do away with the national farm loan associations. They apparently wish to destroy the national farm loan associations. They seem to regard them as nuisances. I think they might have spared themselves the reflection which they make upon the farmers of the country in their annual report when they said, as they did on page 6:

> Numerous instances have arisen where after the organizers of an association have obtained their loans the association ceases to function, to the detriment of others in the community. This arises from two sources—selfishness and indifference. For example, a dozen farmers, each with a good farm and abundant security and confidence in each other, organize an association. After having obtained their loans, as to which they feel no uncertainty, they selfishly decline to enlarge their responsibility and let other neighbors in.

That seems to be the idea upon which they base this recommendation. They deliberately charge to the farmers of the country selfishness and indifference in connection with the system which they themselves refuse to allow or do not cause to function.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have not been in the Chamber to hear all of the remarks of the Senator. It seems to me the language which I have just heard, and heard for the first time, does not quite warrant the broad charge of the Senator that the condemnation, if it be a condemnation, or the criticism by the Farm Loan Board of the farmers, is so comprehensive and general as indicated by the Senator. It seems as though the Farm Loan Board differentiated between those who had obtained the charters for the land banks. They instance cases where there have been failures, and they give two grounds for the failures—selfishness and indifference. They are not criticizing those organizations which do function. The criticism applies to those organizations which do not function.

If it be true that charters have been obtained and, after the charters have been obtained, those who procured them ceased to carry on the corporation after they had made their own loans, then undoubtedly those particular organizations would be subject to the criticism to which the Senator has called our attention. I hold no brief for the Farm Loan Board. They may have been guilty of very serious mistakes; I do not know; but it occurred to me as I listened to the Senator's reading of the statement and then listened to his remarks that perhaps the statement might be misunderstood and construed as a criticism of all farmers of the United States and of all the land banks, whereas, as I read it, it is a criticism only of those which have ceased to function.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Farm Loan Board would not indulge in a general wholesale denunciation of farmers as being selfish and indifferent people. They were referring to the members of those associations now in existence, and they do not approve of the associations, otherwise they would not make this recommendation. The law requires that before a farmer can take advantage of the facilities provided by the act he must become a member of a farm-loan association. There must be 10 or more natural persons owning or about to own land, qualified as security for a mortgage loan under section 12 of the act, unite to form one of those associations. They must be persons desiring to borrow money on farm-mortgage security under the terms of the act.

For the purposes named in the act—and they are limited purposes, too—high purposes, such as (a) to provide for the purchase of land for agricultural uses; (b) to provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizers, live stock necessary; (c) to provide buildings and for the improvement of farm lands; (d) to liquidate indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged in certain circumstances, only borrowers can be members or shareholders of the farm-loan association. Ten or more farmers must get together, and when their applications are filed they must take 5 per cent of the amount of the loan which they propose to obtain in the stock of the national farm-loan association, and they are also liable for 5 per cent more on that stock. He must take one share of stock, par value $5, for each $100 of the face of his loan. That stock is held as collateral for the loan. The law provides that "said capital stock shall be paid off at par and retired upon full payment of said loan." In the meantime the owner of the stock is entitled to any dividends accruing and payable on the stock while it is outstanding. The farm-loan association must, to secure a loan for any of its members, subscribe for capital stock of the Federal land bank to the amount of 5 per cent of such loan, to be paid in cash upon the granting of the loan, the stock to be held as collateral security for the payment of the loan, the association to be paid any dividends accruing, precisely as stated with reference to the member's stock in the farm-loan association.

The security back of the bonds, I may mention, has these features: First, the note is executed for the amount of the loan; and to secure the note the mortgage is given by the individual borrower upon real estate which has been appraised by an appraiser who has been sent out by the Farm Loan Board, who has been appointed by the Farm Loan Board, and who is under the control and direction of the Farm Loan Board. The amount of the loan can not exceed 50 per cent of the value of the land mortgaged, and 20 per cent of the value of the permanent, insured improvement thereon. There is the first security—a mortgage upon that sort of property. In addition to that, there is the personal obligation of the borrower; and in addition to that, there is the indorsement of the National Farm Loan Association; then there is the obligation of the bank issuing the bonds and of every other bank in the system.

Now, the recommendation of the Farm Loan Board is to do away with the National Farm Loan Association, and, of course, when that is done, the indorsement of the association on each loan which is made to each member of that association is also taken away. Therefore I object to that recommendation. I object to it also because the cooperative principle involved in the act would be destroyed when the National Farm Loan Associations are destroyed. Their third recommendation is:

> That provision be made for the voluntary liquidation of national farm loan associations, their members becoming direct borrowers and direct holders of Federal land bank stock.

I object to that. That is another method and means of getting rid of the farm loan associations. I can see no other purpose than that—the eventual elimination of the national farm loan associations. There would be an utter disregard of the rights and interests of the minority in those associations.

The fourth recommendation is:

> That the board be empowered to remove the secretary-treasurers of the national farm loan associations.

In other words, more power in the Federal Farm Loan Board, less power in the national farm loan associations. Such associations are chartered by the Farm Loan Board; they have the perfect right to elect and they ought to elect their secretary-treasurers, and that officer ought to be responsible to the directors of the farm loan association in each case. It is now proposed that he shall be named by the Farm Loan Board, and thereby they will control whatever may remain of the national farm loan associations. At present the secretary-treasurers are required to furnish a suitable surety bond, to be prescribed and approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In connection with the statement made by the Senator from Florida, I wish to observe that some time ago the farm loan associations of the country, taking counsel with each other, deemed it advisable to organize themselves into a national federation of farm loan associations for the promotion of their general and common interests. Such an association was formed, and asked a membership fee of $10 from each of the constituent associations. Some of them paid the amount from their association funds, when the Farm Loan Board served notice upon the associations that such use of the money of the associations was in violation of the law, and a suggestion was made that criminal prosecutions would be instituted against any association which utilized any of its funds, even to the extent of $10, for such a purpose.

A careful study of the law has convinced me that the Farm Loan Board is entirely in error in its interpretation of the law, and I have introduced a bill, which is now pending before the Agricultural Committee, to authorize the expenditure of this amount of the association's funds. I hope to secure action by the Committee on Agriculture upon the bill very shortly.

The point is that the Farm Loan Board does not want these associations to organize and federate themselves for the purpose of considering the legislation that is here pending before Congress or to suggest legislation to improve the present Federal farm loan act. It prefers to be the sole body making recommendations to Congress as to what legislation should be enacted or as to what legislation should not be enacted.

Another act on the part of the Farm Loan Board that seems to me to be open to serious criticism is the obvious obstacle that it places in the way of the farm loan associations being appropriately represented upon the directorate of the farm land banks, the stock of which, of course, is held to a very large extent by these associations themselves.

Mr. FLETCHER. I quite agree with the Senator. The board is in error, in my judgment, in the position which it takes in regard to the effort of the national farm loan associations to cooperate for the protection of their rights and interests under the act of Congress and for recommending such further legislation as may be needed to carry out the purposes of the act. I think the board is wholly mistaken in its position regarding that matter. It bases its assertion upon some ex parte opinion by the Attorney General rendered at one time or another at the request of somebody; but there is nothing in the law that justifies the board in that position, in my judgment, and their course is ill-advised. There could be no harm and there might be great good come from stimulating and encouraging the national farm loan associations to more active interest that would be helpful to themselves and the board, which finds them selfish and indifferent now. The board, however, seems to desire to increase their own power by the elimination of farm-loan associations and by the control and designation of the secretary-treasurers of those farm-loan associations which survive. That is its proposition; that is its recommendation in this report. If the board has the naming of the secretary-treasurer of these farm-loan associations, who is a very important factor in connection with transacting the business of the association—he is the very life of the association in nearly every case—it will practically control those associations. In other words, the board proposes to build up this system upon inadequate foundations, reduce its supporting columns and walls, and put a great roof over it—the Farm Loan Board—and then the roof will fall in. That is about the end it will come to if the recommendations are adopted to centralize at the top all control and power.

It says that one reason why it is not accommodating farmers as it should is that there is a question of doubt about its capacity to do the business. Suppose the New York Life Insurance Co. should send out notices all over the world and say, "We are behind in our business; we have more applications than we can attend to; we will take no more applications until we catch up with our work," how long do you suppose they would last? Suppose any bank in the country should send out a notice, "Do not bring any more deposits to us; do not come to us for any more discounts or loans; we are behind with our business; wait until we catch up," how long do you suppose they would last? Yet that is the position the Federal land banks are in, because the Farm Loan Board does not authorize a sufficient issue of bonds in order to raise the money to enable those banks to uninterruptedly continue their operations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the criticisms of the Farm Loan Board are a little severe. The Senator will recall that it has not been very many months since Congress was compelled to authorize the Farm Loan Board to increase the interest rate on its bonds; that is to say, at that time the operations of the farm land banks were greatly restricted because of the difficulty in providing money for making loans, and, at the request of the Farm Loan Board, Congress authorized a higher rate of interest in order that the bonds might find a market and the board be put in funds. It seems to me that when we recall that history we will appreciate how in the past the operations of the farm land banks have been restricted by the difficulty of finding a market for 5 per cent bonds. Fortunately at about the time the legislation was passed the bond market improved so that the board has not been under the necessity of putting the rate of interest at 5½ per cent, but before that time the operations of the farm loan system were greatly restricted because of the fact that the Government of the United States was in the market borrowing money at a low rate of interest, and the Secretary of the Treasury objected to having a large amount of farm loan bonds put upon the market at that time. Furthermore, previous to that there was the case which was pending in the Supreme Court of the United States for something like two years, which restricted the operations of the farm land banks. Now, notwithstanding all these things, the actual amount of loans made by the farm land banks is something like $400,000,000, as I recall.

Mr. FLETCHER. Something over $500,000,000 now, including the joint stock land banks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am speaking of the farm land banks proper.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amount is a little over $400,000,000 under those banks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that that system is placing loans at the present time at the rate of something like $200,000,000 a year, which is making a reasonably satisfactory progress in extending this credit system. It must be realized that with their facilities it is not possible to go beyond a certain rate of speed, and if it is desired to speed those banks up in making loans it will be necessary to take some chances on the loans.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me at that point?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have had occasion to look into this question at some length. There is now, at least in some sections, a great demand for loans from the farm loan banks. A policy of restriction has been adopted and pursued by the Federal Farm Loan Board which I think is very detrimental and which ought to be reversed in the immediate future. Not the slightest difficulty would be experienced by the board in selling these bonds under existing law. In my judgment, the board ought to proceed at once to procure additional funds with which to meet the requirements for loans in the various districts.

Take, for instance, the land bank in the St. Louis district, which embraces the State of Arkansas. No applications have been accepted by the bank for several months. Hundreds of attempts to make applications have been refused by the bank because no blanks are available and because funds to make the loans are not on hand. In the St. Louis district $17,000,000 in applications are now pending—applications that are undetermined. If one-half of this amount should be accepted, approximately eight or nine million dollars would be required to meet the loans that have been pending for a period of six months to one year.

The bank states that for the next six months, to meet the applications that are already on file and those that may hereafter be made, there exists approximately $7,000,000, and that for want of funds and for lack of a sufficient number of agents to consider and determine the loans the bank is unable to meet the requirements of the district.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator mean in the St. Louis district alone?

Mr. ROBINSON. In the St. Louis district. I have received hundreds of letters from persons who have made application, or attempted to do so, some of whom have informed me that they can not get answers to their inquiries. They state they have been informed that no blanks are available on which to make the applications. This has no relation to the value of the security offered, because in most instances the question as to the acceptability of the applications has not been gone into by the farm land bank. It does show, however, that the bank is not functioning so as to meet the requirements for loans in the district.

We are passing through a period of great stringency. Instead of adopting a restrictive policy, I believe that the Federal farm land banks should be permitted and encouraged by the Farm Loan Board to adopt a liberal policy in making loans. Certainly bad loans should not be accepted; but when applications are made they should be investigated and determined with reasonable promptness. How can any Senator justify the existence of applications in the pigeonholes of the Federal farm land bank of St. Louis for a period of a year or a year and a half undetermined?

Mr. FLETCHER. That illustrates the situation very clearly, and it obtains all over the country. But the banks can not make loans without funds, and outside of Government deposits, which help quite a little, they can not get funds except from the sale of bonds, and they can not issue and sell bonds without the authorization and approval of the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will permit me just a moment further, I have made some inquiries of members of the Federal Farm Loan Board. No difficulty has been experienced and none will be encountered by that board if it should attempt to sell bonds sufficient to meet the urgent requirements of the various farm-loan districts throughout the country. I have been unable, from any inquiries I have made, to ascertain why the policy was adopted or why it is being pursued. It seems to me axiomatic that in a time of financial stringency these banks ought to function with more promptness than in periods when there is less demand for loans. It is failing pitiably in the St. Louis district to meet the requirements for loans, and if the Federal Farm Loan Board does not act itself in the early future I hope that Congress will do something to require the procurement of additional funds by the Farm Loan Board for the uses of the various districts. I have some information that that may be done in the early future, and indeed I believe public announcement of its purpose to sell $70,000,000 in bonds has just been made by the board.

I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD my letter to the president of the Farm Loan Bank of St. Louis, and his reply thereto, setting forth some of the facts which I have related.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 13, 1922.

Hon. H. W. DANFORTH,
Farm Loan Bank, St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR MR. DANFORTH: I am daily receiving complaints of applicants for loans and representatives of farm loan associations to the effect that the authorities in that district are declining to receive additional applications and are deferring unduly consideration and determination of requests for loans.

In my opinion the farm loan banks and related institutions furnish an available means for relieving in part the stringent financial conditions now existing throughout the Southwest as respects agriculture. I would be pleased to have you advise me at once fully regarding this subject. Please give me all available information concerning the number of applications pending in your district and the reason underlying the policy which appears now to be in effect.

With expressions of personal regard, I am,

Very truly, yours,

JOE T. ROBINSON.

THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF ST. LOUIS,
St. Louis, Mo., January 16, 1922.

Hon. JOE T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ROBINSON: I have your letter of the 13th instant, and in reply will say that we have endeavored to curtail in every way within reason the receipt of applications in such volumes as they have been coming in so that we might be able to handle what we have on hand and give better service. But in spite of all our efforts, we have accumulated over $17,000,000 in applications and we are working overtime trying to handle them.

Our past experience has demonstrated that only about 50 per cent of the applications received are finally closed, the other 50 per cent being canceled or rejected for various reasons, viz, defective title, eligibility, etc.

We have been informed by the Farm Loan Board that our next allotment of funds from the sale of bonds will amount to about $7,000,000. This will mean that we could not close all of the applications that we now have on hand if we used every possible effort to do so. Our executive committee feels that we should take care of such applications as we have on hand and give these applicants as prompt service as is possible, and curtail the sending in of new applications until we are in a position to take care of them. The demand for assistance is not confined to the State of Arkansas only, but comes from both Illinois and Missouri also, and, while the number of applications is not as great as we receive from Arkansas, the aggregate amount is considerably more, due to the fact that the loans are larger. We do not feel that it would be good policy to make commitments in excess of our ability to close, and inasmuch as our funds for the next five or six months are to be limited to $7,000,000 we have decided to hold our commitments as near as possible to that amount.

Yours, very truly, H. W. DANFORTH, President.

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I now answer the Senator from Arkansas? I will yield to the Senator from Ohio in a moment. Let me take up one thing at a time. I am not able to pursue logically the argument I had in mind, because of the interruptions.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I was simply going to confirm what the Senator from Arkansas this moment said. I think either yesterday or to-day I saw a statement to the effect that $70,000,000 worth of farm loan bonds would soon be sold—in the next few days.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; $75,000,000, I think.

In the first place, I desire to disabuse the minds of Senators of the idea that I have any grievance against the Farm Loan Board. I do not want to be unjust to them at all. I know the members of the board. I have always had very pleasant relations with them. I esteem them most highly. I like them very much, personally. I think they are in error, that they make a mistake, in the recommendations which they submit. I differ with them as to the theory upon which, evidently, they are administering this act, and I differ with them in their view of the principle upon which the act is based. I can not agree with them, and I think I have the right to point out what I conceive to be their viewpoint and wherein and why I differ with them. I am not doing it in a spirit of criticism or faultfinding merely. There is too much at stake for that sort of thing, if I was capable of it. The very life of this great, beneficent scheme for meeting the financial needs of agriculture is involved. The board apparently has not realized the importance of finding and furnishing the money, which the instrumentalities provided by the act make possible, as and when it is so greatly needed by those entitled to it under the law. The board appears to wish to ignore or minimize to a dangerous degree and to depart from the principle upon which the system is founded, namely, a cooperative system. As to their position, I feel bound to say that it never was intended that this entire system and all its elements, factors, and agencies should be in the absolute control, the complete domination, under the arbitrary dictation of a board made up of political appointees sitting here in Washington. When that aim is achieved the whole plan will come down in ruin. That is why I try to protest in the face of those recommendations.

It was never intended to create here in Washington, at the very top of this system and in complete command of all details, a board of political appointees with full and exclusive power to run this whole system throughout the whole country. That never was the idea. They seem to have that in mind as the principle upon which the act was founded. Just the contrary is the case. It was founded upon the idea of cooperation among the farmers themselves. They are the foundation; they are the ones who own the stock in these banks through their farm loan associations; and they are the ones who ought to manage their own system so as to be independent of any other financial arrangements and of private capital. They can originate their own source of supply and manage their own affairs under this system according to their judgment and their best interests under the very ample supervision the Farm Loan Board already has and exercises; but the idea of the board seems to be that these farmers are incapable of managing these affairs, that they are too selfish or indifferent, or what not, and that the board must have the supreme power and authority over the whole system, and that unless they can have that the system can not function. They are wrong about that.

I do not mean to criticize the members of the board or question their motives, because I can see some excuse for some of the things that have been happening. In the first place, I believe that the board themselves would have recommended the issue of bonds and supplied funds heretofore faster than they have been supplied but for the fact that the Treasury Department has been opposed to their issuing the proper amount of bonds to furnish the needed funds. I may be in error about that, but the indications are that way. I think the Treasury Department has so advised and managed and perhaps directed that the board themselves have been unable to do the things that in their judgment ought to have been done; and I go further and say that the farm loan associations are not to blame, the Federal land banks are not to blame, because they have not the funds.

They, however, are not themselves allowed to function as they should. They are now controlled by the Farm Loan Board, because all the directors are appointed by that board. They are not recommending to the Farm Loan Board the issue of the bonds as they are authorized to do under the act.

They are the instruments of the Farm Loan Board. They recommend only what the Farm Loan Board wants them to recommend. They control the banks.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Just let me finish this thought. I am afraid that the Treasury does not want the farm loan bonds to compete with certificates of the Treasury, or other obligations that might be issued by the Treasury; but that is not fair to the farmers of the country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have no brief to defend the policy of the Treasury Department, but I think the Senator perhaps is a little in error there. Most of the purchases of farm-loan bonds which the Treasury made were made by special authority of Congress; and they were purchased because, owing to the financial conditions, they could not be sold upon the open market at 5 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. There the Senator is absolutely and wholly in error. There never was a time when those bonds would not sell in the public market. The fact of the matter was that the Treasury did not want them to compete with Liberty bonds. The public would buy farm-loan bonds when they would not buy Liberty bonds, and that was the whole secret of the matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I participated in those discussions and in the legislation that passed through the committee, and I know from statements made to the committee that while the order of the Supreme Court was being withheld those 5 per cent bonds could not be sold upon the market. They were not marketable bonds, and the testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee shows that fact, and because they could not be sold in the open market we passed through Congress several acts directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase them, and he did purchase them, because they could not be sold.

Mr. FLETCHER. He very gladly purchased them; and there is another thing——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The decision of the Supreme Court, which finally validated the farm loan act, was not handed down until February 28 of last year.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Since that decision was handed down there has been a possibility of selling the bonds, and I want to cite the fact that at once $40,000,000 of those bonds were put upon the market.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I know, and $60,000,000 in November.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And later on $60,000,000 more were put upon the market.

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly; I know that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And now $70,000,000 more are to be put upon the market.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Making $170,000,000 of money provided within a year for the use of these banks.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes. That is about one-quarter as much as they ought to have.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a matter of judgment. I am told that the officers of these banks themselves, not the members of the board, are not able safely to put out a larger amount of money than is being provided in this way; that is, from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 a year.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then they ought to increase their force.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is easy to say they ought to increase their force, but as the Secretary of the Treasury says in his report: "It should be borne in mind that the Federal farm loan system was not designed as an emergency measure, but is a steady-going and permanent enterprise."

Mr. FLETCHER. Absolutely. I agree with that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. "It should be treated accordingly, responding, of course, as far as circumstances permit, to extraordinary conditions; but it must not be asked or permitted to sacrifice its permanent and safe upbuilding to temporary expediency."

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, those banks can operate only by selling their bonds. Their bonds can only be sold upon the market in case the banks are carefully and conservatively managed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Any attempt to speed up those banks, creating a suspicion in the money market that the bonds are not good, will throttle the sale of those bonds, and I am in sympathy with having those banks proceed carefully, as well as with enterprise, in making their loans.

I do not quite understand why the statement is made here that the funds of the cooperative farm associations can be used without any restriction. Those funds are provided for a certain purpose. They are provided as a part of the security back of the farm loan bonds, and it seems to me it would not do to permit those associations to use those funds without any restriction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The restriction is undoubtedly contained in the statute. No one contends that they should be at liberty to use the funds for any purpose they see fit. The contention I was making was that the use which they sought to make of them, the small sum of $10, easily falls, as I think, within the power granted by the statute as it stands; but, in order to avoid controversy, I have introduced a bill allowing the use of that small amount.

Mr. FLETCHER. These national farm loan associations are not without certain powers and responsibilities. Section 11 of the act gives them power "to acquire and dispose of such property, real or personal, as may be necessary or convenient for the transaction of its business."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is wise in introducing that bill. I would like to see them specifically authorized to use that small amount of money for the purpose of cooperating with the national organizations, but I do not like to hear criticism of the board when it is carrying out the very spirit of that law. I was one who had something to do with the passage of that law, and I have been one who has had to defend it against the great sentiment of the country that has antagonized it. We have a great thing for the agricultural West and the agricultural South, and we should so use it as to keep it sound and safe, and not impair the marketability of the bonds upon which we have to depend in order to secure our funds.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Florida let me ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to get through with this, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he anticipates that there would be any difficulty in selling, say, a hundred million dollars of these bonds at the present time?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator was out at the time I showed that we have sold a hundred million dollars within a year and are now offering seventy millions more. I have not had a chance to go into it. I have talked with the officers of one of the Federal reserve banks, the one located at Omaha, and I know from conversations with them that they feel that they have adequate funds, and they are making their loans. I have never heard any complaint there.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can show the Senator a number of letters from his own State making complaint.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not received one complaint, but I have received a great many letters in commendation.

Mr. FLETCHER. From May 1, 1921, to December 31, 1921, there were $9,900,000 allotted to the Omaha bank. They loaned, absolutely disposed of, up to December 31, 1921, $9,426,700. They loaned their entire allotment by the 31st of December and have not had anything since. They can not get anything.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is in error there. There were funds on hand before that last allotment was received.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think I can put into the RECORD, if the Senator wants to know about it, a statement showing what the situation is, and if that bank out there has funds, it is in a more fortunate position than any other bank in the country, I think.

But I want to say this, further, with reference to what the Senator has been observing, we never were under any pressure to pass any law authorizing the Federal land banks to charge 5½ per cent interest. A bill on that subject was introduced for the purpose of enabling the joint-stock land banks to raise the rate of interest on their bonds from 5 to 5½ per cent. They are still restricted to a charge of 6 per cent to borrowers. The joint-stock land banks and the Federal land banks can not charge any borrower over 6 per cent. But the joint-stock land banks were finding difficulty in disposing of their bonds bearing 5 per cent, and they asked permission to raise the rate to 5½ per cent, still being restricted as to the amount they must charge the borrower to 6 per cent, as under the old law. That legislation was introduced for the benefit of the joint-stock land banks. It was made so broad, however, as to cover both; but, as a matter of fact, that is where the whole thing originated.

That was the situation with reference to the joint-stock land banks. They could not readily sell their bonds bearing 5 per cent at that time, and they wanted authority to make the rate 5½ per cent, being willing to do business on one-half of 1 per cent.

The Senator is quite right in saying that the system was paralyzed for about 15 months. The Farm Loan Board is not to blame for it, and I am not blaming them for it. For about 15 or 18 months this litigation lasted. But the case was decided on the 28th of February, 1921, by the Supreme Court of the United States, and there never was, from the beginning to the end of that litigation, any restraining order at all against the Federal land banks or the Farm Loan Board from proceeding with their business. No injunction or restraining order was ever issued. The case involved the constitutionality of the act, and the pendency of the case had the effect of paralyzing the operation of the system.

The organization was there, the Farm Loan Board was there, the members drawing their salaries all that time, and they should have been ready, in my judgment, to go right on at once with the disposition of the applications which had previously been on file. They changed the plates; they got out a new bond issue; they junked all the applications which were then pending and ordered everybody to put in new applications; and they issued $40,000,000 of bonds, which they got on the market about the 1st of May, and it was the 1st of June before any money got out. From February 28 to the 1st of June the farmers were held by the eyelids, not knowing what to do, or what would be the result of their applications.

Bonds to the amount of $40,000,000, a mere bagatelle, were issued. The applications in two of the districts amounted to more than $40,000,000. There were 12 districts. Those $40,000,000 of bonds were sold promptly; they were distributed to the 12 land banks and the proceeds were soon taken up.

Then, in November, $60,000,000 more were issued, and those were taken up at once. Does the Senator mean to tell me that there is any question about the public taking these bonds? The experience is that every time they are offered, they are immediately taken up by the public. You can not buy one of those bonds to-day for less than 103, and probably not for less than 104. They are not for sale by any land banks in the country. No land bank in the country has a single bond, so that if you buy them, the money does not go to the farmers; it goes to the holder of the bond. Every one of those bonds is selling above par in the open market, where it is sold at all, at from 103 to 104. There is no question but what the public will take those bonds.

I am delighted to know that $75,000,000 will soon be issued; I do not know how soon, but I hope very soon. It is the plan to issue $75,000,000 soon, and I have not any question but what they will sell immediately and sell above par. I venture to say that the board will not offer those bonds at less than 102 or 103. They will not put them on the market for less than that. Then why is there any question about whether the public will take the bonds or not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have said distinctly that there is no question about the marketability of those bonds now. I know that they will sell for 103, but the Senator knows, if he is familiar with the facts, that those farm-loan banks were urged to press the people in their own neighborhoods to buy the bonds at par, because they were not marketable, and I bought some myself at the solicitation of my bank, because they could not sell them at par; and the Senators know that when the Secretary of the Treasury made his annual report in June of last year he reported that there were $189,000,000 of those farm-loan bonds in our Treasury because they could not be sold at par.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make certain deposits in Federal land banks, and the Treasury has been paid 5½ per cent on such deposits. See page 2 of the fifth annual report of the board. It is a very profitable transaction for the Treasury. If the Senator knows where he can get a farm-loan bond below par I wish he would let me know about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not said that. I said the farm-loan banks were urging the people in their neighborhoods to buy the bonds at par, because they could not be marketed last summer at par, and it was a matter of favor for public-spirited men to buy those bonds at the banks, because they could not sell them at par in the open market.

The Senator must remember when the officers of the board came before the committee and asked us to authorize them to issue 5½ per cent bonds, because they might not be able to market them at 5 per cent, and if the Senator had read the market reports, he knows that the bonds could not be sold in the open market.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator is confused. I think it was the joint-stock people who came before the Banking and Currency Committee, that they were the people who wanted the legislation. This is borne out by the last report of the board, on page 10, under the heading "Joint-stock land banks."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Federal Farm Loan Board also came before us, and they asked to have the law apply to the Federal farm loan banks, not the joint-stock land banks.

Mr. FLETCHER. They had no objection to it. That issue of $40,000,000 of bonds was sold within 30 days, and the $60,000,000 was sold within 30 days. Before I go into that question a little further, I want to read to the Senate what the farm loan commissioner, Mr. Lobdell, wrote to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] on October 15, 1921. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], and I were a subcommittee who went to see him about speeding up the operations of the board, and he said in his letter:

> Leaving out then the question of direct loans from the Treasury the question arises as to the rapidity with which the investing public will absorb farm loan bonds.
> That question has never been fairly tested out, because until the present time we have never been permitted to make two successive sales in a single year, the Treasury heretofore preferring to take the bonds rather than have us make repeated offerings.

That is a statement by the commissioner of the board, that the board have never been permitted to make offerings they felt ought to be made, the Treasury preferring to take the bonds rather than have them make repeated offerings. So, you see, according to their own statement, what the power behind the throne is. I can see no other meaning than that it is the Treasury Department that is holding back the Farm Loan Board in the matter of supplying the funds needed by the farmers of this country. That is their own statement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, he was referring to the time when the Government of the United States was marketing its Liberty bonds at 4¼ to 4½ per cent interest.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; up to that time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He was not referring to last year, because they had two issues last year. He could not have been referring to the two years during which bonds could not be marketed because of the Supreme Court decision being held up. He was referring to the time that the Government of the United States was marketing its Liberty bonds.

Mr. FLETCHER. This letter is dated October 15, 1921. Of course, when the system was not functioning on account of the litigation, there was no question about the Treasury having to intervene. This $75,000,000 is not going to be sufficient to go very far. There are over 4,000 farm loan associations in this country. Divide the $75,000,000 by the 4,000 and see how much they will get for the next six months or the next year. It may be another year before they have another issue. We do not know when the next issue will come along.

With reference to the bank mentioned by the Senator from Arkansas, the one at St. Louis, they were allotted out of two bond sales $9,900,000, and they loaned up to December 31, 1921, the sum of $7,617,400.

They had at that time a loanable balance of $2,282,600, but, of course, that was December 31. I do not know what their applications were.

The last recommendation of the board is as follows:

> That a corporation, to be controlled by the presidents of the Federal land banks and the members of the Farm Loan Board, be created to manage for all of the banks the business of buying and selling farm-loan bonds.

Under the law, the Federal land banks themselves were to market these bonds. The Farm Loan Board was not given any authority to put the bonds on the market. They were simply to approve and authorize the issuance of the bonds, but the Federal land banks were to offer the bonds and sell them in their various districts, as contemplated by the original act. It was the thought that those banks would not necessarily market the whole issue within 30 days or within any specified time, but in the course of the operation of the system there would be on hand all the while bonds of the Federal land banks, affording a safe and desirable investment for anyone in the district having funds he or she would like to invest.

Suppose a man has a thousand dollars which he would like to invest in farm-loan bonds. He goes to the farm land bank and inquires, "Can I get a bond? I would like to invest this amount in your bonds." He is told, "We have none. They are all sold; all gone." "When are you going to have any more?" "We can not tell. That is left entirely to the Farm Loan Board. We do not know whether it will be 6 months or 8 months or 10 months." The man with the thousand dollars to invest is not going to put it in his bank and hold it there for an indefinite time to invest in a security at an indefinite price, because he does not know at what price the bonds eventually will be offered. The result is he will go and buy something else or lend it out on some other basis.

There are hundreds of thousands of dollars in the various communities where these banks are located and in the States which they serve, money that is not being used at all, farmers' money, money that is buried, money that is in stockings or put away, which people would like to invest in these bonds if they had the opportunity to do it, and they would do it if the banks had the bonds.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I wish to say to the Senator that the condition which he has related as existing in his district is precisely the same as that which exists in mine. The farmer can not get the money and can not even get his application acted on.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I agree with my colleague, and I wish to make the further statement that they have even stopped receiving applications, let alone acting on those already on hand.

Mr. FLETCHER. As bearing on that phase of the matter, I have 25 or more letters from various portions of the country, all to the same effect, illustrative of what I have said and what my colleagues from the various other States have said of the situation as it exists to-day. I have one here from Caldwell, Idaho, dated January 27, 1922, signed by Mr. E. L. Shaw, who said:

> I wish to state the position that this association—
>
> The Caldwell National Farm Loan Association—
> is in at this time. A short time ago I had a customer who wished to buy $500 worth of Federal land bank bonds. I immediately wrote the Federal land bank at Spokane for these bonds, and they replied that they had no bonds on hand at this time.
> Now, this seems to be a queer situation. At present this association has applications before the bank for consideration amounting to about $200,000 and a good many of them were filed in November, 1921, and no action has been taken on them yet.

Here is a letter from my own State, dated January 29, 1922. This is just a sample of those coming from elsewhere throughout the country. This letter says:

> I have had an application in for a loan since March 2, 1921, and have had no action on it yet. Unless I can get some relief in 30 days I am afraid it will be too late.
> Our local secretary can give no light on the question and we have to struggle in the dark, not knowing whether the bank at Columbia, S. C., is ever going to come to our aid. There are 71 applications in the Ocala branch, and if every one is as urgent as mine there will be 71 less farmers in this country in a very short time, for if relief does not come soon in the shape of a loan I can not say what the consequences will be. We can not even get an appraiser to come here.

From the Federal land bank at Houston, Tex., is a letter sent to me dated December 26, 1921. I ask to have that inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

> THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF HOUSTON,
> Houston, Tex., December 26, 1921.
> To the SECRETARY-TREASURER, addressed:
>
> In view of the many repeated and urgent calls for application blanks, we find it necessary to write you.
> The demand for farm loans is, as you know, overwhelming, coming with equal force from every quarter of the State. To meet this appeal for money the Federal land bank has used all of its offices as adequately as possible to extend loans to worthy farmers now in pressing need of help. During the months of November and December we loaned approximately $4,000,000 to 1,200 farmers.
> To extend maximum service we have accepted applications much in excess of our present funds and have already anticipated funds to become available to us under the first bond sale of 1922. This means we have already approved applications for loans sufficient to exhaust both the funds now on hand and the funds that will be available to us for the first few months in 1922.
> In view of the foregoing facts, prudence compels us to address you again on this same subject in order that in our zeal to serve we may not overreach the limit which present calculations impose. To do otherwise would result in greater disappointment and needless confusion.
>
> For the present, or until there is assurance of provision for funds beyond that now promised, it is considered best not to make further distribution of application blanks. We trust this necessity will only be temporary and that changed conditions will permit us within a short time to resume the sending out of application blanks as they are requested.
> Yours, very truly,
>
> THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF HOUSTON,
> By JOHN V. VAN DE MARK, Secretary.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if it is not very important that these loans be passed upon as quickly as possible in order to enable the farmers to make a crop for the coming year?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. The situation is just as this farmer in Florida states, that if something is not done in a few months they are going to quit.

From Parkers Prairie, Minn., I have a letter from N. A. Jacobson in which he says:

I have had several letters from the land bank at St. Paul, Minn., in response to inquiry, that they are not forming any new associations, as they have not enough money to take care of the applications they now have on hand from the old associations, and they say it would be bad business to create a still larger demand until they can meet it.

Mr. FLETCHER, the farmers need money and need it quick, or from 50 to 75 per cent of them will go out of business, judging from conditions here, and I have been told by people that I know well and know to be truthful that conditions are good here compared to what they are in other places.

From a former Member of this body, ex-Senator W. H. Milton, now secretary and treasurer of the Marianna National Farm Loan Association. I ask that this letter may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MARIANNA NATIONAL FARM LOAN ASSOCIATION,
Marianna, Fla., January 30, 1922.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I received the Fifth Annual Report of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and there are some portions of it which I think should call for corrections and criticism.

Page 2, fourth paragraph, indicated that for a Government deposit they paid 5½ per cent interest. It seems to me that this interest was excessive, as the Government has at various times placed with banks money at 4 per cent interest, to be used in handling cotton crops, and I am satisfied did not receive as high interest from other depositories.

Page 3, first paragraph, would indicate that the delay in making loans had been eliminated. According to my experience, this is incorrect. This association now has with the Federal land bank over 130 applications for loans which have been on file from early in August to the latter part of October of 1921, a period of from three to five months, and no decision has been made on any of them, nor have they even been appraised by the Federal appraiser. Our association has not been visited by the Federal appraiser since June of 1921, more than seven months. If any of these applications are granted, the applicants will hardly receive their loans within a year from the time they made application.

The recommendation contained in the last paragraph on page 3, I think, is a good one.

The first paragraph of page 6 shows that the Federal Farm Loan Board has been furnishing the States with their determination of farm values for the purpose of taxation. I do not think that this information should be furnished States or municipalities for taxation purposes, but that it should be confidential information; and from the reading of the law I understood that all information obtained from farmers would be confidential.

In regard to the information and recommendation in regard to secretary-treasurers of national farm-loan associations, pages 7 and 8, I do not agree with their recommendation that the Farm Loan Board should have the power to appoint acting secretaries who should be authorized to serve until such time as the association shall legally elect a successor. Secretary-treasurers are all under bond by a bonding company, and there are ample laws to punish them for misappropriation of funds and neglect of duty, and as the board says they can not only get rid of the secretary-treasurer but of the entire board of managers of the association by refusing to make loans through the associations, and I can not see where the board could need any more authority or law to handle secretary-treasurers for misappropriation of funds or other neglect of duty; but if they are authorized to remove secretary-treasurers and appoint acting secretary-treasurers, it would take away from the local association entirely their control of their association. Within a short time the secretary-treasurers would all be appointees of the Federal Farm Loan Board and the entire system would be controlled from Washington, and in my opinion would defeat to a great extent the intentions of the Federal land bank act. The compensation of the secretary-treasurer as paid by the local association is small but satisfactory; if the secretary-treasurer was an employee of the Federal Farm Loan Board, he would necessarily receive a greater compensation than he now receives, and this compensation would necessarily be paid from the proceeds of the banking system which would reduce the dividends paid by the banks to the associations. From my experience it seems to me that the Federal Farm Loan Board should not have such entire control of the entire system as would result from giving them the power to appoint acting secretary-treasurers to the local associations.

I do not agree with their recommendation, second paragraph, page 9, authorizing a permanent organization of the bank on a basis of seven directors, four appointed by the president of the Farm Loan Board, and three selected by the National Farm Loan Association. I think that the majority of these directors should be selected by the National Farm Loan Associations and be more in touch with the borrowers and less in touch with the Treasury Department. The national banks all have their local directors and are more than sufficiently controlled by the Treasury Department through their bank examiners, and I really see no reason why all of the directors of the Federal land bank should not be elected by the National Farm Loan Association; certainly they should be controller of the system.

The entire report, however, shows very clearly that in order for the Federal land banks to obtain money to lend it is only necessary for them to offer their bonds for sale, for if they sold forty millions of bonds in May and June and sixty millions more by October 3 of last year, when interest rates were high and investment funds scarce, there is no doubt that they can sell these bonds in almost unlimited amounts. And if the banks would increase their force, they could give relief to the farmers by closing loans within three to four months from date of applications for loans and not delay applications for loans for from 8 to 12 months.

If 12 Federal land banks can not handle annually all of the applications, it seems to me that it would be advisable to increase the number of land banks, for these 12 can not or are not giving the needed relief; and the law, as I understand it, was passed for the relief of farmers and not for the upbuilding of the system for the making of money by the Federal land banks or the furnishing of employment to a number of employees of a bureau in Washington.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours, sincerely, M. H. MILTON.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the situation has been very clearly discussed in a calm, forceful way by a gentleman who has studied the farm loan act and plainly knows whereof he speaks. The discussion bears not only on the present situation but on the recommendations made by the Farm Loan Board in their last report. Those recommendations are considered in this communication by Mr. Lester C. Manson, attorney for the National Union of Farm Loan Associations, addressed to the committee on credit and insurance, National Conference on Agriculture, held in Washington last week. The communication is dated January 24, 1922. It is so able a discussion of the whole subject, and particularly of certain very important provisions of the Federal farm loan act, that I know it will be enlightening and helpful, not only to the Congress but to people generally throughout the country, if they could have the benefit of it. Therefore I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The communication referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 24, 1922.

TO COMMITTEE ON CREDIT AND INSURANCE,
National Conference on Agriculture.

GENTLEMEN: In accordance with your request, at the conclusion of my remarks before your committee to-day, I am submitting, for your consideration, the following memorandum of my objections to the recommendations of the Federal Farm Loan Board as to amendments to the farm loan act.

The original farm loan act created a cooperative system of farm finance, to be owned by the farmers, through which they could reach the sources of money supply by independent means entirely within their control.

The cooperative control of the system has never been permitted to function.

Cooperation is to be permanently eliminated, and the political management of Federal land banks is to be perpetuated, if the recommendations of the Federal Farm Loan Board are adopted.

PROPOSALS OF FARM LOAN BOARD.

By permitting Federal land banks to make direct loans to borrowers upon less security than required upon loans made through farm-loan associations, the Federal Farm Loan Board proposes to drive the associations out of business and into liquidation.

By dispensing with the indorsement of the associations, backed by the double liability of stockholders, the risk of the present stockholders and bondholders is increased, and future bonds will be less salable and require higher interest.

By giving the national farm loan associations a minority representation until direct loaning eliminates voting stockholders from the Federal land banks, the Farm Loan Board proposes to forever kill cooperation and perpetuate political control of the Federal farm loan system.

Through the power of removal, the Farm Loan Board proposes to make the secretary-treasurers their servants and the associations, so long as they last, their subjects.

Through the organization of a corporation to handle all farm loan bonds, the board proposes to perpetuate the system which has failed to supply the farmers' needs for money.

Such will be the effect of legislation recommended to Congress by the Federal Farm Loan Board in its fifth annual report, just filed.

COOPERATION AND INDEPENDENCE.

The cooperative system provided for in the farm loan act was intended to make the farmer financially independent. To borrow, he is required to furnish the capital for the Federal land banks in proportion to the amount borrowed. This he does by subscribing for stock in a farm loan association, which in turn subscribes for stock in the Federal land bank. These subscriptions equal 5 per cent of the loan—no more, no less. Each borrower is also liable for losses to an amount equal to 5 per cent of his loan in addition to his stock.

When his loan is paid, the stock of the association in the bank issued upon his loan and his stock in the association are retired at par. Thus none but borrowers are to be stockholders, and only so long as they are borrowers, and only in a fixed ratio to their loans.

Outside capital was barred from the system to insure its independence; that the farmer might own and control the means of financing himself; that outside influence might not interfere with agriculture getting the money it requires and its credit deserves.

For the same reason, as well as because they owned the system, the borrowers were to be given control of the management of the banks. The farm loan act provides that the Federal land banks shall be managed by boards of directors consisting of nine members, six of whom shall be elected by and be representative of national farm loan associations, and three of whom shall be appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Solely for the purpose of "priming" the system—to get it started—the Government advanced $8,892,130 by subscribing for the stock of the 12 Federal land banks in that amount. The act provides that when the subscriptions of farm loan associations to the stock of any bank reach $750,000, 25 per cent of the subsequent subscriptions shall be applied to the retirement of the stock held by the Government.

Solely for the purpose of getting the system into operation the act provides that the Federal land banks shall be temporarily managed by boards of five directors appointed by the Federal Farm Loan Board. By the terms of the act these "temporary" boards were to be succeeded by the permanent directors when stock in any bank had been subscribed to $100,000 by farm loan associations.

The borrowers, through farm loan associations, now own and hold $21,109,215 of the capital stock of the Federal land banks. The Government's subscription has been reduced to $6,598,770. The balance of the Government stock will soon be retired and the borrowers will own all of the stock.

Notwithstanding the fact that the borrowers own 78 per cent of the stock, are liable for all the losses, and the whole system was designed to make agriculture independent of all outside influence, the borrowers have so far had no voice in the management of the banks.

FARM LOAN BOARD OPPOSES COOPERATION.

In the first annual report of the Federal Farm Loan Board the following statement appears:

"It is doubtful if the direct management and control of any bank which is dependent upon borrowed capital for its control and operation can be safely delegated to the borrowers from such bank.

"An amendment to the act providing for a lengthened period of governmental control has therefore been prepared and is respectfully submitted for the consideration of the Congress."

The foregoing extract from the report of the board demonstrates conclusively that they do not believe in the cooperative system established by Congress, and that they do not consider the farmers of the country competent to select the directors in the banks in which they own the stock and for the losses of which they stand a double liability. The cooperative features of this law were borrowed from Europe, where for 150 years they had proven a success. They were adopted upon the recommendations of a Government commission which went to Europe for the purpose of making an exhaustive investigation of rural credits.

On December 31, 1917, the stock of eight of the banks had been subscribed to the required amount by the associations. Notwithstanding the plain provisions of the act, no steps were taken by the Farm Loan Commissioner to enable the associations holding stock in these eight banks to exercise their right to elect directors.

In January, 1918, Congress, at the instance of the Farm Loan Board, enacted the amendment suggested by the board and referred to in the report above quoted. The purpose and effect of this amendment was carefully concealed. On its face it does not appear to destroy the cooperative features of the law and to transfer from the stockholders to political appointees the management and control of these banks. Such, however, is its effect.

The amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase $200,000,000 of the bonds of Federal land banks, and provides that so long as any of the bonds of any such bank shall be held by the Treasury the temporary organization of such bank shall continue in power. The amendment "authorizes" the Secretary of the Treasury to require the banks to repurchase any bonds held in the Treasury one year after the termination of the war.

TWENTY YEARS TEMPORARY CONTROL.

The bonds sold to the Government do not mature for 20 years. The question whether bonds would be sold to the Treasury, and the stockholders thereby deprived of a voice in the bank's affairs, was passed upon by the "temporary" boards. As these boards could perpetuate themselves in office by selling to the Government, it is needless to say they did so sell. The question whether these bonds will be repurchased for resale is up to these same "temporary" boards, and, as by buying back the bonds they will be ousting themselves from office, it is needless to say that they will not do so. As a bank can not be forced to rebuy a bond when it has no money available, the power given to the Secretary of the Treasury to require the repurchase is meaningless.

Thus, under the guise of giving security for a loan, the Federal Farm Loan Board secured action by Congress, the effect of which was to change the whole system for a period of 20 years, from a cooperative to political control.

It can not be believed that, had Congress realized the purpose and effect of this amendment, it would have been enacted. The subject of farm finance had been under discussion for years before this act was passed, but no one ever suggested a bank, the stock of which should be bought and paid for by private individuals, but the management of which would be in political appointees.

This amendment was, furthermore, a fraud upon those who had bought and paid for their stock under a law which gave them the right to elect the directors, and then deprive them of that right without receiving back their money, or being released from their liability as stockholders.

Furthermore, it was not until July, 1920, that the board notified the associations of this change in the law. After this amendment had been adopted, they continued to send out to the associations copies of the original act without the amendment, and they continued to subscribe for stock in the banks, believing that the law had not been changed.

AMENDMENT IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

This amendment is clearly unconstitutional. The stock of many of the associations was purchased at a time when the law provided that, when subscriptions by farm loan associations amounted to $100,000, boards of directors, upon which the association would be represented, should be elected. When the subscriptions reached $100,000 this right to vote for directors became a vested property right. Lord v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 194 N. Y., 212.

In Union Pacific Railway Co. v. United States, 99 U. S., 700, the Supreme Court of the United States held that under the power to alter, amend, or repeal the charter of a corporation, organized under act of Congress, Congress could not constitutionally deprive the corporation of vested property rights.

ACTION TO RECOVER VOTE.

A mandamus proceeding has been commenced in the name of the Brentwood National Farm Loan Association in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to compel the farm loan commissioner to take the steps necessary to enable the associations to elect directors in the Federal Land Bank of Berkley.

This action is a test case for the purpose of determining the constitutionality of the amendment of 1918 continuing in power the "temporary" organizations of the banks.

PROPOSE PERMANENT POLITICAL CONTROL.

The Farm Loan Board does not mention this suit in their report. However, by offering a compromise they admit defeat. They recommend that Congress enact a law providing for the immediate installation of permanent organizations for the Federal land banks, to consist of seven directors, four of whom shall be chosen by the Farm Loan Board and three of whom shall be chosen by the farm loan associations.

Thus they seek to evade the issue we have raised in this suit by offering the stockholders three directors, who may attend meetings and watch their four appointees run the banks.

Thus the Federal Farm Loan Board attempts to permanently deprive the stockholders of the right to manage their own property. Thus they attempt to permanently destroy cooperative control of the Federal land banks.

INTERESTS OF BONDHOLDERS AND STOCKHOLDERS—BONDS PURCHASED UNDER EXISTING LAW.

The board says in its report (p. 8):

"Experience has fully demonstrated that the stability of the Federal farm loan bonds rests very largely, if not almost entirely, upon the close Government control and supervision of the Federal land banks. Deprived of these, the board can but feel that the continued sale of bonds in any considerable volume would be at least very uncertain."

Prior to the enactment of the amendment of January, 1918, and between the first and second Liberty loan issues, "there was no difficulty in marketing nearly $30,000,000 farm-loan bonds at a substantial premium." (First Annual Report Federal Farm Loan Board, p. 19.)

The purchasers of these bonds were certainly not relying upon the continuance of the political management of the system because the law then provided for the management of the banks by boards of directors, two-thirds of whom were to be elected by farm-loan associations, to succeed the temporary boards, as soon as the subscriptions by associations in any bank reached $100,000. Eight of the banks had reached this point when this report was issued.

The provisions of the act providing for permanent organizations have never been changed. Every bond sold since January, 1918, has been sold under the law providing for boards of directors, to be controlled by those to be elected by the associations, to assume office upon the repurchase of the bonds held by the Government. As this might happen at any time, it can not be said that the bondholders were induced to purchase these bonds, by the fact that the banks were to be managed by political appointees. These bonds sold because they were secured by gilt-edged farm mortgages.

I assume that every member of the committee knows something of bonds and the attitude of investors toward them.

I will go along in all that has been said about the investing public being conservative, cautious, and timid. I know that the part of the investing public which buys bonds will not invest unless satisfied as to the adequacy of the security. That part of the investing public which buys stocks (in ordinary times) often has not so much concern about the safety of the investment, being more keen for large returns. But the bond buyer consults his lawyer, examines the law under which the bonds are issued, inquires as to the stability and the current and prospective condition of the general industry, and asks for reports on the financial responsibility of the particular corporation issuing the bonds.

Frequently I am called upon to advise clients in such matters. Indeed, conducting such inquiries for investors constitutes the major portion of the business of many large and reputable law firms.

Knowing this—and we all know this to be the practice—how can any sane man ask you to believe that the present holders of Federal land bank bonds, which now aggregate more than half a billion, purchased these securities in ignorance of the provisions of the present law?

Every bond that has been issued and every bond that has been sold by the Federal land banks has been issued and sold under a law which provides, always did provide, and still does provide, that these banks shall be owned and managed by the borrowers; that the borrowers shall elect six of the nine directors and that the Government shall appoint only three.

True, an amendment was passed that the temporary organization (which means an organization appointed wholly by the Government) of any Federal land bank should continue so long as the United States Treasury holds a bond of the said bank. But the same amendment provides that any Federal land bank bond held in the Treasury "one year after the termination of the war shall, upon 30 days' notice from the Secretary of the Treasury, be redeemed or repurchased by such bank at par and accrued interest."

No sane man believes that an investor who is so conservative and so cautious and so timid that he would not buy a bond of a bank managed by the borrowers would be so careless and so negligent of his own interests as to depend upon some secret arrangement or understanding between a group of bond houses, of whom he made the purchase, and a politically created administrative board of the Government, the personnel of which may be changed at any time, or which, by act of Congress, may be wiped out of existence, for the continuance of the temporary organization which protects him as an investor against the mismanagement or bad judgment or self-interest of directors representing the borrowers.

The point I would make is this: Either these bonds were purchased freely and gladly for what they are—bonds of a bank to be controlled by the borrowers—or they were sold by the bond houses under fraudulent representations.

Mind you, I am not charging that they were sold under fraudulent representations. I am merely pointing out how ridiculous is the claim that the investing public will not buy these bonds if the borrowers are given control of their own banks, as the law originally and still provides. These securities were not sold on fraudulent representation. They can not be sold on fraudulent representation. The only fraudulent thing about this whole proceeding is the present claim that they can not be sold at all if the borrowers are given their rights. In other words, the only fraud I know of in connection with it is the one which the Farm Loan Board is now seeking to perpetrate upon borrowers who own the stock of these banks.

PERMANENCY OF STOCKHOLDING.

As another reason for making political control permanent, the board says:

"The stockholdings in the Federal land banks are unlike those in any other bank, in that they are not permanent and the shareholder knows that he has not a permanent interest in the institution."

The stock in the Federal land banks is held by national farm loan associations. These were intended to be a permanent part of the system. By taking in new members, from year to year, old maturing stock is constantly being replaced by new subscriptions.

If the board was referring to the stockholder in the farm loan associations, it is safe to say that no present stockholder will have had his stock retired during the incumbency of the present members of the Federal Farm Loan Board. Neither the stock of the borrower in an association, nor the stock of an association in the bank can be sold. The sale of the latter is expressly prohibited by the act, and the sale of the former is prevented by the fact that it must be deposited as collateral security for the loan.

Thus each stockholder, unless he sells his farm, is a stockholder for at least 33 years. It is safe to say that in no other corporation is such permanency assured.

COMPARATIVE INTEREST.

The board says that the purchaser of a $10,000 bond has an interest equal to twenty times that of a borrower of $10,000, because the latter only buys $500 of stock. They overlook the additional liability of $500 imposed upon the borrower.

But even considering this additional liability, it can not be said that the stockholders have but one-tenth the interest of the bondholders. If each were to share the profits and losses, and secure the return of his principal in proportion to his contributions to the funds of the bank, the proposition of the board would be sound. Such, however, is not the case. The stockholder assumes the risk of losing his stock, his profit, and an additional amount equal to his stock before the bondholder loses even his profit.

On the theory advanced by the board the Federal Reserve Board should name the majority of the directors of national banks, because the deposits exceed the capital stock.

Because the owner loses everything before a mortgagee loses anything, the bondholders of a corporation are never considered to have such an interest in the mortgaged property as to give them the right to manage until there has been default in payment of either the principal or interest of the debt.

BONDHOLDERS FULLY REPRESENTED.

The board claims to represent the bondholders and therefore should name a majority of the directors of the Federal land banks.

The directors of Federal land banks have no discretion, not subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, over any matter which can adversely affect the interests of the bondholders.

Loans by Federal land banks must be secured by first mortgage on farm lands and can not exceed 50 per cent of the value of the land mortgaged and 20 per cent of the value of the improvements thereon. (Sec. 12.)

No loan can be made without the approval of appraisers, who are appointed by, and are under the direction of, the Federal Farm Loan Board. (Sec. 10.) Federal land banks can not issue bonds without the approval of the Farm Loan Board (sec. 18), nor in excess of twenty times the amount of their capital and surplus (sec. 14); and such bonds shall be issued only upon such mortgages as shall be accepted for that purpose by the Federal Farm Loan Board. (Sec. 18.)

In case of default by any Federal land bank in the payment of the principal or interest of its bonds, all other Federal land banks are proportionately liable (sec. 21), which liability is to be enforced by the Federal Farm Loan Board. (Sec. 17.)

Twenty-five per cent of the net earnings of Federal land banks shall be carried to a reserve, until such reserve equals 20 per cent of the outstanding capital stock, and thereafter 5 per cent of the net earnings shall be annually carried to such reserve. Whenever any reserve shall be impaired below 20 per cent of the capital it shall be restored to such amount before any dividends are declared. Such reserves shall be invested as directed by the Federal Farm Loan Board. (Sec. 23.)

All salaries fixed by the directors of Federal land banks are subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board. (Sec. 4.)

The Federal Farm Loan Board is also authorized "to exercise general supervisory authority over the Federal land banks * * *." (Sec. 17.)

From the above-mentioned provisions of the act it is clear that Congress has specifically given to the Federal Farm Loan Board direct authority over every element which may affect the security of the bondholders.

INTERESTS OF PROSPECTIVE BORROWERS.

The Federal farm loan act makes all charges against borrowers to be made by Federal land banks subject to regulation by the Federal Farm Loan Board. (Secs. 13-9 and 17d.)

The act fixes the maximum interest rates to be charged (sec. 12), and authorizes the Federal Farm Loan Board to review and alter such interest rates. (Sec. 17.)

Thus nothing which can affect the prospective borrower is left to the discretion of the directors of the land banks.

GOVERNMENT AS STOCKHOLDER.

By the provisions of section 5 of the act, when subscriptions by national farm loan associations to the stock of any bank reach $750,000, 25 per cent of the subsequent subscriptions are to be used to retire the Government's stock. The stock owned by the Government is not entitled to participate in dividends. (Sec. 5.)

Thus no action by the directors can adversely affect the Government as a stockholder.

INTERESTS OF NATIONAL FARM LOAN ASSOCIATIONS SUBJECT TO CONTROL BY DIRECTORS.

While, as we have already shown, the discretionary powers of the boards of directors of these banks are so limited that neither the interests of the Government as a stockholder or as a bondholder, the interests of any other bondholder, nor the interests of the prospective borrowers can be impaired by their action, yet they are vested with powers, the proper exercise of which is of vital importance to the national farm loan associations as stockholders.

NO CONTROL OVER LOANS.

While the directors of a Federal land bank can not prejudice the interests of bondholders by making loans without the approval of the Farm Loan Board, the national farm loan associations, as stockholders, have no protection to-day against the making of loans by the appointees of the Farm Loan Board which meet with the approval of that board but which do not meet with the approval of the farm loan associations.

LOSSES REDUCE DIVIDENDS.

Losses are chargeable, first, against reserves set aside out of net earnings, and these reserves must be made good before net earnings are available for dividends. (Sec. 23.) As the farm loan associations own practically all of the dividend-earning stock, they are the ones primarily interested in preventing losses.

LOSSES FALL ON ASSOCIATION STOCKHOLDERS.

The stock of the Government is to be retired at par out of the proceeds of subscriptions by farm loan associations. Thus any losses which can not be met out of reserves and earnings fall upon the farm loan associations as stockholders. Their entire investment is wiped out before either the Government or a bondholder can lose a cent, yet they are deprived of any voice in the management of this property.

DIRECTORS DETERMINE DIVIDEND RATE.

As the owners of practically all of the dividend-earning stock, the national farm loan associations are solely interested in the extent to which net earnings available for dividends shall be distributed as such. This is a matter of more vital importance to these stockholders than to the stockholders in any ordinary business corporation.

In an ordinary business corporation any surplus accumulated enhances the value of the stock, and the stockholder receives the benefit of such undivided surplus upon the sale of the stock. The stock of national farm loan associations can neither be sold nor hypothecated (sec. 5) and must be paid off at par upon the repayment of the loan in connection with which it was subscribed (sec. 7). Thus any net earnings available for dividends but not distributed as such are lost to those who owned stock when such earnings accrued.

DIRECTORS INITIATE BOND ISSUES.

While no bonds can be issued without the approval of the Farm Loan Board, yet none can be issued without the bank applying for that privilege. Whether the business of the bank shall be speeded up and expanded, so as to meet the demands upon it and do the largest possible business with the least overhead expense, is a matter entirely within the control of the directors of the banks.

The ability to name the personnel of the bank's organization is another factor which has a direct bearing on the percentage of expense to business done.

The policy of the management of the banks with respect to the amount of business to be done and the character of the personnel are the two most important factors affecting dividends.

We believe that the foregoing review of the provisions of the Federal farm loan act warrants the conclusion that Congress has protected the Government against loss as a stockholder by the provisions of the law, and the bondholders by the discretion it has vested in the Federal Farm Loan Board, but has vested in the boards of directors of the Federal land banks most important discretionary powers vitally affecting the property rights and interests of the national farm loan associations as stockholders.

DIRECT LOANS BY FEDERAL LAND BANKS.

The recommendation of the board is that the Federal land banks be permitted to make direct loans "in the same manner as the joint-stock land banks."

Thus, these loans need not be indorsed by either a farm loan association, or by a financially responsible agent, as the law now requires. This indorsement is one of the most important elements in the security of both the bondholders and the stockholders.

If losses occur on such direct loans, they will fall first upon the farm loan associations, as stockholders, and after the exhaustion of the assets of the bank, on the bondholders.

As the associations now have no representation on the boards of directors of the banks, they have no voice in determining what loans shall be made. Even under the scheme of permanent organizations suggested by the Farm Loan Board, the associations will have but a powerless minority in passing upon unindorsed loans.

The board recommends that such direct borrowers be required to purchase Federal land-bank stock equal to 5 per cent of the loan.

There is no double liability attached to the stock of Federal land banks as there is to the stock of the associations. The result is a discrimination against borrowers through associations who must assume a double liability of loss and must have their loans indorsed by the association. This advantage will be an inducement to try to borrow direct.

The stock in the hands of direct borrowers has no voting power. This recommendation is a part of a general plan to eliminate the associations, to get the stock in hands having no power to vote, and thus entirely destroy the cooperative feature of the system.

If the law is amended in accordance with this suggestion, the Farm Loan Board and the Federal land banks can ignore the associations entirely, make loans direct to whoever they choose, and the associations thus ignored will have no functions except to make collections. When they reach this stage the overhead expense will make it desirable that they be wound up. To complete their purposes of destroying the cooperative side of the farm loan system, the Federal Farm Loan Board makes a further suggestion providing for winding up the associations.

LIQUIDATION OF ASSOCIATIONS.

The Federal Farm Loan Board recommends that the farm loan act be amended to permit a majority of the stockholders to liquidate an association. Under the scheme proposed, when an association votes to liquidate, its stock in the Federal land bank will be canceled and reissued to the borrowers in exchange for their stock in the association.

Under this provision the borrowers would be in the same position as the direct borrowers contemplated by the amendment above discussed. There would be no associations secondarily liable for the payment of the loan, no double liability of the stockholder to look to, and the stock would be in the hands of nonvoters.

The National Farm Loan Association is the corner stone of the whole cooperative theory. The law was based upon the principle that the borrowers in a community, knowing each other, and knowing the value of each other's property, would, by cooperation, mutually guarantee the repayment of each other's loan through the farm loan association's indorsement, and thus secure money more advantageously than could anyone acting alone. These farmers, being on the ground, would know to what purpose the borrowed money is applied, and their associations, being liable as an indorser of the loan, would have an interest in seeing that the interest and amortization payments were made when due. Through this association the borrowers would own the Federal land banks and exercise their right to manage the banks by electing directors. The adoption of these amendments means the destruction of the very foundations of the system.

LESS MONEY AND HIGHER INTEREST.

Eliminating the indorsement of the association from loans made direct is bound to make the bonds less salable. This means less money available to loan. Having less security behind them it will be necessary to increase the interest rates on bonds. This means higher interest must be paid by the borrower.

REMOVAL OF SECRETARY-TREASURERS.

The Farm Loan Board recommends that it be authorized to remove the secretary-treasurer of a national farm loan association "for willful neglect of duty, misuse of funds, or the refusal to carry out an authorized order of the Farm Loan Board" and appoint an acting secretary in his place until his successor is elected.

The farm loan associations are independent, private corporations, in which no one except their stockholders have a cent of interest. The secretary-treasurer is an officer of the association, not an employee of the Government.

The secretary-treasurer is selected by, and removable by, the directors of the associations who represent the stockholders. He owes no duty except to the stockholders, therefore no one except the stockholders, or the directors representing them, have any just cause to complain if he neglects his duty.

The association alone has cause to complain for misuse of funds. If funds are misused it is either the funds of the association, or funds for which the association is responsible.

The Federal Farm Loan Board has no authority to order the secretary-treasurer of an association to do anything, therefore there can be no such thing as an authorized order to disobey.

This proposed admendment is an attempt to make the secretary-treasurers, and through them the associations, subservient to the Federal Farm Loan Board. Having destroyed the cooperative control of the Federal land banks, the Farm Loan Board now seeks to destroy the cooperative control, and arrogate to itself the control of the national farm loan associations.

CORPORATION TO HANDLE BONDS.

It was the intention of the farm loan act that the several land banks would each dispose of its own bonds, when and where it could, and if a borrower elected, bonds should be delivered to him instead of cash.

The law contemplated that when a bank had accumulated mortgages amounting to $50,000 or more, it would issue and offer bonds for sale. If the sale of bonds did not produce sufficient money, and a borrower elected, he could take bonds and sell them to his local bank, or to his friends and neighbors. Thus these bonds would always be available for sale, and money would keep coming into the system as fast as the market absorbed them.

Instead of following this plan the board, arbitrarily and without any apparent reason, concluded that these bonds must be offered in immense issues once or twice a year, when the market would be flooded and glutted with them. They also concluded in the same arbitrary fashion and with as little show of reason that the market would only absorb $150,000,000 of these bonds in a year. They admit that they have had no experience to vindicate this judgment, because continuous offerings have never been made.

In the last two instances the market absorbed all that were offered in about 30 days. Does it not stand to reason that the purchasers of these bonds were those who happened to have money to invest during the particular 30-day periods while the bonds were being offered? Is it not also reasonable to believe that there are as many people whose money becomes available for investment during the remaining 10 months of the year?

We firmly believe that were the bonds issued and offered for sale continuously the market would absorb sufficient to meet the demand of the farmers for money.

The law gives the Farm Loan Board authority to approve bond issues, but gives them no authority over the sale of bonds.

This amendment proposed by the Farm Loan Board is for the purpose of legalizing its usurpation of the functions of the banks with respect to the sale of bonds and of perpetuating the method which has resulted in the failure of the system to produce more than one-third of the money required.

RESULTS UNDER FARM LOAN BOARD MANAGEMENT.

During the last year applications amounting to $296,859,381 were approved by national farm loan associations and forwarded to Federal land banks. Loans amounting to only $73,238,626, or 25 per cent of the amount applied for, were made. The board admits that even under their system of selling bonds the market will absorb them at the rate of $150,000,000 a year. Only $100,000,000 were issued during the last year. The bonds are selling at a premium, yet the farmers can not get the money.

DIVIDENDS.

The 6 per cent dividends paid by the Federal land banks are a mere return to the stockholder of the money borrowed to pay for his stock. They represent no profit to offset the risk of loss he incurs as a stockholder.

This report shows that after setting aside the reserve required by law and paying the dividends which have been declared the Federal land banks were, on November 30, 1921, holding undivided profits amounting to $2,355,309.78.

Under the provisions of section 23 of the Federal farm loan act this money is available for dividends. It averages $573.34 per association. If directors elected by the national farm loan associations were in control of the land banks, this extra dividend would be paid at once.

This sum would provide an average dividend of more than 11 per cent on the capital stock eligible for dividends. It equals 0.5673 of 1 per cent of the outstanding loans and carried on to the borrower of $10,000 amounts to $56.73. If declared as dividends and applied on the interest on loans, it would average a reduction of over one-half of 1 per cent in the interest rate the borrowers are required to pay.

Unless this money is declared as dividends the associations and their stockholders lose the benefit of it.

In an ordinary corporation an accumulated surplus adds to the value of the stock, and the stockholder receives the benefit of it when he sells his stock. But the farm loan act provides that an association can not sell its stock in a Federal land bank, and on the repayment of the loan its stock shall be retired at par. Thus the benefit of any accumulated surplus or undivided profits is lost forever.

It was the intention of the law that the cooperative borrower would receive his money at cost. The purpose of the act in requiring borrowers to subscribe for stock for no more and no less than 5 per cent of the amount of the loan, to assume an extra liability of 5 per cent in case of loss, to retire as a stockholder when the loan is paid, and in forbidding any except borrowers from becoming stockholders, was to make the system strictly and purely cooperative. The stockholdings of the borrowers, being in exact proportion to the amount of their respective loans, was intended to be the means of so distributing the profits and losses as to give the borrower his money at cost.

To carry out the spirit of the law, the money available for dividends must be declared as such from year to year as earned. Even deferring dividends works an injustice. If this money were distributed now it would be divided among the stockholders in proportion to their present holdings, regardless of the length of time stock has been held. This fund is made up of surplus earned during preceding years when many present stockholders had no interest in the system. Thus a borrower, who has held his stock and paid interest on his loan for four years, will receive no more than the borrower of an equal amount, who has held his stock and paid interest only one year. A borrower of $10,000 who had been in the system since 1918 would have received about $110 in dividends, in addition to those paid, had this surplus been distributed annually. He will receive about $56 if the fund is distributed now.

An injustice has already been done to all stockholders of preceding years. This injustice will increase with each succeeding year until this fund is distributed.

Thus the Federal Farm Loan Board is denying to the borrowers the fruits of cooperation. The farmer suffers the disadvantage of being liable for losses with no compensating advantage of receiving the profits.

GIVE COOPERATION A TRIAL.

Political management having failed to meet the demands upon the banks, cooperative management, by the stockholders, should at least be tried before it is forever condemned, executed, and buried.

Respectfully submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the injustice of the present cotton futures contract law and to propose necessary amendments thereto. To my mind a change in this law is needed more than any other or, perhaps, all other remedial legislation combined to benefit the producers of cotton in the United States. It is a compound proposition, but is as simple as A, B, C's.

I want to apologize, but I make bold to assert that both the old custom and the present law of marketing have always been wrong, and only during a few exceptional years since the adoption of the exchange has the grower of cotton ever realized its value.

Let us get the foundation of my argument in your mind. Under my contention the price of the spot cotton is controlled almost absolutely by the future contract market. The interest of the grower and that of the purchaser of a future contract is identical—both want the price to go up—but as soon as the latter becomes a seller, his interest is turned against the grower. The interest of the seller of a contract is diametrically opposed to that of the grower and of the purchaser of a contract. He desires the price to go down. My father, who was a practical, successful farmer in a modest way, complained most bitterly as long as he lived that the exchanges kept a quantity of "dog-tail" cotton on hand to tender on contracts, and thereby depressed the price of his actual cotton.

Before the Civil War there was no such thing as a cotton exchange. The actual commodity was sold either on the spot or shipped to commission merchants. During the Civil War it was impossible to get a sufficient amount of cotton through the lines, hence great premiums were offered for the "staple to arrive." This is the origin of the cotton exchange. The first year after the exchange was established there were sold 101,665 bales of contract, whereas eight hundred and seventy-three thousand and odd bales of spot were sold in New York. Since that time dealing in contracts has increased and dealing in spots has diminished.

About 1868 the cable was laid to Liverpool, and at once the practice of selling "cotton to arrive" was put into operation. There was no law on this subject, but the custom was for all contracts to be made on the basis of middling, with the right of the seller of the contract to deliver any one of 32 grades of cotton. Of course, if he delivered below middling, a discount was allowed the purchaser, or if above middling, a premium was added. This was a very injurious practice to the grower and manufacturer.

This practice became so odious that practically all the Southern States passed legislation on the question of bucket shops, but to little avail. Congress was appealed to for many years; from 1884 to 1914 bills were continuously before both Houses. In the latter year the present cotton futures contract law was passed. This was a victory for the people and remedied a great many evils that existed under the custom of the exchanges, and no doubt was intended to correct all of the injustices. At first the law reduced the number of grades tenderable from 32 to 20, and later it was amended, and as it now stands allowing 10 grades tenderable. It went too far in one view and not far enough in another.

There are two provisions in it, one which authorizes a specific grade of cotton to be specified in the contract. This is as it should be, but there has never been one of these contracts sold on the New York exchange.

Under the second provision the seller of the contract has the right to deliver all the quantity in any one or in any number of the 10 tenderable grades. This is a one-sided contract, and is where all the injury is done the grower of cotton. This was the most vicious part of the old custom and is the burden of my song. It is my subject. Let me repeat: The seller of the contract has the right to deliver all the quantity in any one or all of the 10 tenderable grades. The buyer has no rights except to accept whatever is tendered him or to sell out.

The people who actually produce cotton are principally of small means, and something like half of them are Negroes. They procure advances from time to time on which to make the crop. They are compelled to dispose of their crop in a short space of time—something like 75 per cent in four months—and thereby supply the actual cotton needed. The cotton world knowing this condition sells futures. The owner of the contract, who has hedged, knowing he has no choice of selection, sells out, hence the price of the actual cotton is depressed.

It is claimed that any change of the present law would ruin the exchanges. I am not an enemy of the exchanges and am not trying to put them out of business. I believe they would serve a good purpose under proper laws and regulations. They tend to bring the buyer and seller together, and if it were not for them the users of cotton might combine and the producer would be at their mercy. There is some question, however, whether they serve a useful purpose. There are no such places to sell eggs, poultry, lumber, hay, iron, steel, wool, and many other products. My only object is to get a fair and equitable contract, and if the exchanges can not exist under a fair and just law then let them retire.

There are something like 160,000,000 spindles in the world, with only 35,000,000 in the United States, with 60,000,000 in England. Liverpool, with a great exchange, not to help her people sell cotton, because they raise none, but for the purpose of supplying spindles of England and elsewhere, will sell contracts. This affects the New York and New Orleans markets; hence the price of spot cotton all over the world is immediately affected.

It is claimed that Liverpool fixes the price of cotton. This is partially true. The price is fixed wherever the surplus is sold. Anyway, let us look at this proposition in a broad view. The annual world's consumption of cotton is around 21,000,000 bales. Assuming that every mill should by its requirements aggregating this amount, then if parties are permitted to continue to sell on the exchanges, would not this depress the price? Consider the figures of 1919, where 104,860,000 bales of contract were sold. Who purchased the excess over 21,000,000 bales? Speculators, of course. There being no other purchasers who are users of cotton, the market would get in the hands of the speculators, and they knowing the inequality in the contract, would not purchase except at a tremenduous discount. We are taught that overproduction depresses prices. Does not overselling in this instance have the same effect?

It is claimed that the exchanges are used for the exporters and mills to hedge their contracts, but under the present law they, knowing that they have no choice of selection, will join the multitude of sellers. Therefore the parties who desire the actual cotton have their buyers all over the cotton-growing sections and purchase the article for less than its value.

The question might be asked whether or not the farmer is interested in the exchanges. At once we will say no, he has nothing to do with contracts; but indirectly he is most vitally interested. When contracts go up or down, the price of spot cotton follows.

For example, under the rules of the exchange, cotton can only decline 2 cents a pound per day, and often this is the case, and for several successive days. Does any reasonable person believe that the intrinsic value of the article has so declined?

In other words, the interest of the grower is affected by every transaction on the exchange and he is totally unable to help himself. Another great injury that is done the grower no doubt is the difference between the value of the grades of cotton, but I know of no legal way to remedy this.

I am not particularly concerned about the parties who deal in contracts and would care nothing about the exchanges provided the effects of operations upon it could be severed from the result on the price of the actual commodity. When the price so declines and the people of the other countries of the world buy the actual cotton for less than it is worth, the people of the United States are deprived of that much wealth, and we in the South are crippled to that amount of our buying capacity from other sections of this country and the other parts of the world. Therefore this question is not sectional, but national and international. The exchanges have become so subject to manipulation—even the mills and exporters will not rely upon getting their supplies through them. The mills do not object to paying high prices for cotton, but what they do object to is such violent fluctuations. The present practice of these parties is to purchase contracts against sales of goods, then procure cotton and close out contracts. This is used as a kind of insurance.

Candidly, I am endeavoring to help the grower, and all other interests will regulate themselves.

In 1919 there were produced in the United States less than 12,000,000 bales of cotton. On the New York and New Orleans exchanges alone there were sold 104,860,000 bales of contract, and yet there were only delivered 139,100 bales of cotton. In 1920 there were grown in the United States 13,340,000 bales of cotton and there were contracts sold for 128,907,500 bales of cotton. From August 1, 1920, to July 31, 1921, the actual number of bales delivered in New York was 267,700; in New Orleans, 106,600 bales. This clearly demonstrates the uselessness of the exchange as a practical hedge. If the purchaser of the contract knew that he could select under this contract the kind of cotton suitable to his purpose, he would naturally demand delivery before he would sacrifice his contract, but when he realizes that the seller of the contract has a right to tender any one of 10 grades, and that he has no choice whatever, he almost invariably sells out.

It will be said that no one is hurt, because there is a purchaser for every sale. My answer is that he is not a purchaser at value. No one would buy a contract under this law unless he thought he was getting it under the value of the commodity. He buys it as a depreciated commodity—an outlawed and a blacklisted commodity, I might say.

Suppose a drummer were to sell a hat merchant 10 dozen hats at $6 a dozen to $60 a dozen and when delivery day comes the drummer would deliver all of the quantity in $6-a-dozen hats under similar authority to the cotton futures contract law. Does anyone think that these hats would bring their value under such conditions? Would not the merchant tell the drummer to dispose of them and save him whatever he could out of the margin? Certainly no one would make such a purchase unless he obtained it at a great discount; and it so operates on the cotton contract.

A few years since some friends of cotton combined to demand delivery and were prosecuted by the United States Government.

It is true that under the classifications of the present law any of the tenderable grades is spinnable cotton, but different mills can not use all the grades of cotton. It is unsuitable for their machinery and for the kind of goods they are manufacturing, hence it is necessary for them to have a particular grade or grades of cotton.

Some time since the Government had a test made of the 10 tenderable grades of cotton. This showed that there was not so great a difference between the strength and bleaching qualities of each grade, but there was more waste in the lower grades. A short time since I asked a practical millman why he was so particular about certain grades and why he did not mix more of them. He stated that this was impractical; that, for example, one of his mills was manufacturing a cloth under a certain trade-mark and that he attempted to manufacture similar cloth at another mill and mixed the grades of cotton. From one shipment of this to China he had to pay a claim of $20,000.

The value of a commodity is its intrinsic worth coupled with the use to which it is to be put.

I desire the contract to be more definite, that it be mutual, so that the purchaser and the seller will be on equal terms. There is no custom or law in the world, so far as I know, that allows the seller of a commodity to select the quality for the purchaser. More particularly would this be inappropriate when the commodity is to be used in machinery. Corn, wheat, and other products are not sold under any such practice. This rule reverses the laws of common sense and the custom of merchandising. Under this practice even the lower grades of cotton are not sold at their value because you have not brought the right parties together. For instance, many people would not pay $2 for a pair of brogan shoes, not that they are not worth $2 but that party would not want to wear them, neither would he want to pay out his money and hunt someone who would care for them. Just so in the different grade cotton; unless the mill could use that kind of cotton it would not care to purchase it and then have to pay carrying charges and dispose of it as best it could, hence the result is a great drove of sellers of contracts. The maturity day will be approaching, and when the seller realizes that he has no choice of selection, and not wanting to tie up his funds, necessarily he will sell out, and this depresses the price of the actual commodity. He will not necessarily want high-grade cotton; on the contrary, the kind of cotton that suits his purpose.

Furthermore, the prices quoted on the exchanges do not reflect the price of the market. For example, on March 23, 1920, March contracts in New York were 36.52, spot 40 cents a pound; in July spots 43.75, contracts 36.50.

Not only this, but the quotations are misleading, to put it mildly, and operate along the line of false pretenses. I mean, take any day's quotations for any month; the buyer of cotton can quote that to the holder and tell him he can not expect to get more for his cotton than is quoted for a future month, whereas the owner of that contract can not command any particular grade on it, still the farmer parts with his cotton, on the belief that the quotation can be turned into middling cotton. The same argument is used to force or induce the manufacturer of goods to part with them.

Another objection that could be urged is the unlimited amount of contracts that are sold. The 10 years' average of the cotton crop in the United States is 13,300,000 bales. After all that is grown has been sold, it does seem that the sale of contracts should cease, and this would be the case if anyone were dealing in the actual cotton and hedges. But, take the example of the year 1919. There were something like 93,000,000 bales of cotton sold by future contract over the amount produced. In other words, every bale of cotton grown in the United States was sold over nine times. Artificial supplies are created at the pleasure of the sellers of contracts without enlarging the demand. The law of supply and demand is thus hobbled. Whoever puts up the most margins can carry prices his way. I am not endeavoring to legislate value into a commodity. This should not be attempted.

To my mind, the foregoing clearly demonstrates the inequality of the present law and its unjust operations against the grower.

Allow me to reiterate, the price of the future market controls the spot market.

The interest of the grower and the purchaser of contracts is identical; that of the seller of the contract is the opposite.

There is no equality or mutuality in the present contract—the seller having the right to deliver any one or all of 10 tenderable grades of cotton, and the purchaser of the contract having no choice of selection, ninety-nine times out of a hundred sells out, hence the price of the spot cotton is depressed. A more ingenious plan could not be devised to depress the price of a commodity than for a person to be permitted to sell one grade or quality and then be allowed to deliver another. The game is one of marked cards.

I suggest either one of three remedies, which I am satisfied will greatly improve conditions, but urge the last one, to wit:

First, require the specific grade to be specified at the time the contract is made.

Second, allow the purchaser and the seller of a contract to each select half of the quantity; but in order to avert the possibility of a corner, either up or down, let them divide each half equally in two, or even three grades.

Third, do away with the middling-fair as one of the grades tenderable and divide the other nine grades into three classes, to wit, A, B, and C, with three grades in each class, and make the middle class the basis, with a discount for a grade below and a premium for a grade above.

Briefly, the objection that would be raised to the first suggestion would be that we would drive off a great many dealers in contracts. This would not affect legitimate dealers, but no man should be allowed to sell what he has not or what he does not expect to have. It is also claimed we would practically convert the exchange into a spot market, but I do not think so. Another objection would be that there would be 10 quotations instead of one. I want to require the contract on the exchange to represent the actual commodity and to be a fair index of its value.

The objection to the second proposition might be that the purchaser would be required to take half of a quality that he did not want in order to get half that he could use. This is true; but it would be a great improvement over the present law.

I can see no objection whatever to the third proposition. This limits the tender of the seller from 10 grades to 3 in a given contract. I do not claim to be an expert, but I am satisfied that the final user of the cotton—the mills—could handle any one of the three contiguous grades under this division, and by specifying the class he could get the desired grade. I understand the custom of the trade in filling a given contract is to allow a latitude of one grade, up or down.

I am satisfied beyond a peradventure of a doubt that an amendment along the above lines would stabilize the price of cotton and would increase the price of every pound at least several cents. Under the present and former systems there is no question but what the South has been deprived of a great proportion of the value of every crop since the adoption of the exchange. Under the present condition and laws our people will not be able longer to produce cotton and exist, much less to make a decent living or any profit. We have come to a parting of the ways.

I have introduced amendments in the Senate along the lines suggested above, but I am told that the task is too monumental to be accomplished, and that it would cause a revolution in marketing. I believe in revolutions when they are necessary to accomplish justice. Because the practice is old is no reason why it should not be changed. I am not asking favors, but simply demanding justice. Congress has the good of the people at heart, and I am satisfied when we all look into this subject we will agree along the lines of the above suggestions. There is no use telling farmers to make a living at home, diversify their crops, build warehouses, organize cooperative marketing associations, hold meetings in Washington and elsewhere, and to do other things which are essential, and then for us to stumble around like a set of blindfolded schoolboys, professing not to know the real reason why our section of the country does not prosper. The cotton industry is in bondage and everyone knows that something is wrong, but they do not realize the exact trouble nor the remedy. An amendment along the above lines would bring immediate relief and would be more beneficial than all others combined.

Mr. WALSH of Montana obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harris	McNary	Robinson
Brandegee	Heflin	Moses	Sheppard
Broussard	Hitchcock	Nicholson	Spencer
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sutherland

Curtis	King	Page	Watson, Ga.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the absence on official business, in attendance upon the Committee on Finance, of the following Senators:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

Wadsworth Walsh, Mass.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Bursum Phipps Sterling Warren

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator yield to me to make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of to-day's business the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock on Monday morning next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 11 o'clock on Monday morning next. Is there objection?

Mr. POMERENE. Just one moment. What reason is there for taking a recess rather than having an adjournment so as to permit morning business on Monday?

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], in charge of the pending measure, desires to conclude it on Monday, as he has been called away and must leave as soon as may be possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent asked by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not understand the explanation of the reason why we should take a recess over to-morrow. I wish to know why that should be done?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am perfectly willing to proceed to-morrow and then take a recess until Monday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to state that we have been notified that the concluding session of the International Conference is to take place to-morrow morning at 10.45 o'clock. There are many Senators, of whom I am one, who have not had an opportunity to attend a single session of the conference, and we would like to be present once before the conference ends.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection, if there is a good reason why Senators want to have a recess, but I am particularly interested in continuing with the work of the Senate. In view of the delays which are occurring every day on every measure that comes up, and the unlimited debate that is indulged in, it seems to me that we have not any too much time in which to transact the business which is before Congress. However, if Senators desire to be present on the occasion to which the Senator from Connecticut has referred, and which is a most important one, I shall make no objection to taking the recess as suggested by the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas that when the Senate concludes its session to-day it take a recess until Monday next at 11 o'clock a. m.? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in view of the wide range which the discussion has taken this afternoon, I dare say the attention of Senators may have been diverted from the bill which is before the Senate. I therefore ask that it may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire the entire bill read?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely ask that the bill be stated by title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill by title.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am very sure that but few of the Senators have followed the discussion of the bill, the title of which has just been stated, and so far as it has proceeded are aware that the bill was reported by and is now before the Senate from the Committee on the Judiciary, accompanied with a report on the bill. I ask that the report may be read. The committee is under obligation to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] for calling the measure to the attention of the Senate and for opening the debate upon it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, would not the Senator from Montana be satisfied to have the report printed in the RECORD?

Mr. KING. Let us have the report read.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The report succinctly states the position of the Committee on the Judiciary with respect to the bill. It draws a distinction between the bill as reported by the Senate committee and the bill which came to us from the House of Representatives, to which I should like to have particular attention invited, in view of the fact that in the comments of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] on yesterday he stated that the bill as reported proposed to strike out everything in the House bill and to substitute something in lieu of it that is quite different. Apparently, therefore, at least the Senator from Kansas is not familiar with what was done by the Senate committee, nor the relation that exists between the bill reported by the committee and the House bill. The report of the committee undertakes to point out the difference between the two.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection to the reading of the report. My suggestion was simply in the interest of saving time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I would not be understood as desiring the report to be read simply for the enlightenment of the Senator from Kansas. I rather suspect that the view entertained by him is also shared by other Members of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall not object to the reading of the report; but I know that all Senators can probably read and many of them have read the report. However, if the Senator from Montana wants personal and present treatment for those Senators who do not see the light on this matter, I do not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The Secretary will read the report.

The reading clerk read the report (No. 236) submitted by Mr. WALSH of Montana on July 27, 1921, as follows:

[Report to accompany H. R. 2373.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all of said act after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the following:

"That persons engaged in the production of agricultural products as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, nut or fruit growers may act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively handling and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce such products of the persons so engaged and in processing or preparing such products for so marketing the same. Such associations may have marketing agencies in common; and such associations and their members may make the necessary contracts and agreements to effect such purposes: Provided, however, That such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof, as such producers, and conform to one or both of the following requirements: First, that no member of the association is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein; or, second, that the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent per annum: And provided further, That the association shall not deal in products of nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled by it for members.

"Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the creation of, or attempt to create, a monopoly, or to exempt any association organized hereunder from any proceedings instituted under the act entitled 'An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes,' approved September 26, 1914, on account of unfair methods of competition in commerce."

The foregoing is a reproduction of the House bill, omitting therefrom section 2, and adding thereto the provision to guard against the establishment of a monopoly, in substance like the amendment proposed by this committee and adopted by the Senate to a like bill which passed the House at the last session, and the further provision to meet an important change appearing in the bill before us, the purpose of which evidently is to permit the associations to deal in products of nonmembers. A slight change is made in the language of the bill that its scope may not be so extensive as to be in part without the field of interstate or foreign commerce, the expression "in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interestate and foreign commerce" becoming "in collectively handling and marketing in interestate and foreign commerce such products of persons so engaged and in processing or preparing such products for so marketing the same."

The hearings conducted by the subcommittee have confirmed the members thereof in the conviction that the amendment insisted upon by the Senate at the last session is essential for the protection of the consuming public and can do no possible harm to the great body of farmers in whose interest the legislation is demanded.

Inasmuch as it is utterly impossible to establish a monopoly of any of the ordinary farm products, cereals, cotton, live stock, etc., an inhibition of monopoly must be unobjectionable to the producers of such. Moreover, your committee is entirely satisfied that they have no desire or purpose to establish a monopoly. Why anyone should insist, under these circumstances, on the enactment of a law which, in terms, would authorize them to do so, your committee finds it impossible to understand.

It is possible, however, to establish a monopoly with respect to farm products which can be produced profitably only in a very limited area, or in the case of highly perishable products, like milk, which will not stand shipment long distances. It would not be in the public interest, your committee believes, to permit all producers of milk within the area from which one of our great cities is supplied to effect a single organization having thus a monopoly which might or might not be utilized to exact extortionate prices of consumers. Your committee sees no good reason why two, three, a half dozen, or a dozen cooperative associations might not properly be organized for the purpose of supplying a city with its milk, nor why, in the case of raisins, for instance, produced only within a limited area in the State of California, a monopolistic organization should be permitted and encouraged, rather than two or three cooperative associations organized and operating on similar lines.

Section 2 of the House bill has for its purpose the alleviation of the evils of monopoly, or those that may follow from authorized combinations, by the granting of something like supervisory control to the Secretary of Agriculture. It was quite generally understood by the committee when the bill was before it at the last session that this section gave to the Secretary of Agriculture the authority to fix prices. The proponents of this bill, however, repudiate that idea and insist that it is not the proper construction of the bill, and assert that they are resolutely opposed to reposing such power in the Secretary of Agriculture. They assert that the bill gives to the Secretary power to declare that a price charged is unreasonable, but gives him no power to fix what is a reasonable price. It is quite likely that even if he were given power to determine what is a reasonable price the provision would be inoperative, as conditions might so change pending a hearing as that the result arrived at would be eminently unjust so far as prices for the future are concerned. However that may be, the experience of the Interstate Commerce Commission under a similar provision, giving it power to determine what is an unreasonable rate but no power to determine what is a reasonable rate, satisfies your committee that as this provision is construed by the proponents of the bill, and perhaps correctly, it is utterly valueless. If competition is preserved—that is to say, if no monopoly can exist under the act—regulatory provisions are superfluous.

The bill before us during the last session authorized the organization of associations dealing in "products of their members." The bill now under consideration authorizes them to deal in the "products of persons so engaged." Obviously, under the former the associations would be restricted in their dealings to members; in the latter, though they are restricted as to the character of the products in which they may deal, it is clear that they may deal with any person in such products, whether he be a member or not.

The bill has for its purpose the removal of obstacles, if such there be in the Federal statutes, in the way of the organization of cooperative farm marketing associations, a purpose with which the majority, at least, of your committee is in full sympathy. It may be, and probably is, true that such associations can not operate with the highest degree of success, or with that degree of success which your committee would be glad to see attend their efforts, unless they are permitted to deal to some extent in the products of nonmembers similar in character to those handled for the members. But the protection of the statute ought not to be given to a small number of persons of the classes named in the bill who contribute from their own farms an inconsiderable quantity of the products handled by the association.

A further condition is accordingly added to those set out in the bill as requisite in order that the benefit of the act may be enjoyed, namely:

"And provided further, That the association shall not deal in products of nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled by it for members."

By the terms of the bill the persons mentioned therein are authorized to associate themselves "in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce such products of persons so engaged," namely, agricultural products. If the processing or preparing for market is not limited to activities of that character, directly connected with interstate or foreign commerce, they would not be within the domain of Federal legislation, and the phrase in the bill "in interstate and foreign commerce" can not be read as qualifying "processing," whatever may be the case as to "preparing for market." The language of the bill is accordingly modified, or perhaps transposed, so as to read "in collectively handling and marketing, in interstate and foreign commerce, such products of persons so engaged and in processing or preparing such products for so marketing the same."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question to get his thought about this matter?

This bill provides that these members may associate themselves together—in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce such products of persons so engaged.

Assuming that one of the great millers of Minnesota had a farm, and that one of the great packers of Chicago had a ranch, what is there under this bill to prevent those two men and half a dozen other farmers of very modest means organizing together, and in that way fixing exorbitant prices for meat or flour?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Nothing, if the conditions of which the Senator speaks should exist; but they do not exist. I do not believe that the word "persons" here would include corporations. If there is any doubt about it, it might be corrected. Of course, Mr. Ogden Armour and Mr. Crosby, both being farmers, might join with other farmers, and under this bill they would be entitled not only to handle the products of their own farms but to engage in the handling of the products of others; but the Senator will notice that their power to deal is restricted by a further amendment proposed by the committee, to the effect that they shall not deal in the products of nonmembers to an amount greater than the amount which they contribute from their own farms.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking now of the Senate amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am speaking of the Senate amendment; yes. No provision of that kind is embodied in the House bill, and the condition to which the Senator refers would find no provision applying to it in the House bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I really intended, however, to take up the details of the bill a little later on, and if Senators will follow that course I would rather take that order.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall not interrupt the Senator then.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. After discussing the general features of the bill I shall be very glad to answer and, indeed, invite any questions that Senators may care to propound concerning the details of the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. The question I asked was for information. I did not want to divert the Senator from his line of argument.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, I understand perfectly. The question which the Senator propounds is one of very grave importance and one that ought to be reflected on very carefully. Some other features of the bill, I think, also are worthy of serious consideration. To those I shall invite the thought of the Senate as we proceed.

Mr. President, it has been justly said that agriculture is the great basis of the wealth of this country at the present time, as it has been at all times in our history; and it may doubtless be said, unfortunately, that perhaps there never was a time in the history of this country when this great, basic industry was suffering from such intense depression as prevails at the present time. The hardships which the growers of agricultural products in my own State suffer at this time are extreme, and are accentuated by the fact that we have suffered a series of extreme droughts. Anything which could be proposed to alleviate the present condition, characterized by the depression of which I have spoken, or which would tend to promote the welfare of the farming industry generally, even under normal conditions, ought to have the earnest consideration of Members of this body, and it certainly has my sympathy.

Moreover, Mr. President, I am profoundly convinced that the salvation of the industry of this country depends in no small degree upon the adoption and the extension of the principle of cooperative marketing. The enormous spread which exists between the price which the producer of the agricultural product gets when he puts it on the market and that which the consumer pays for it is little less than a national scandal, and anything which can be done to take up that expense will be at the same time a benefit to the producers of the agricultural products on the one hand and the ultimate consumer on the other. I am, as I said, a profound believer in the wisdom of giving every encouragement possible to the extension of the cooperative principle.

I had occasion some years ago to make a very careful and exhaustive examination into the organization of the California Fruit Growers' Association. I am satisfied that it has made fruit growing a great and profitable industry, when it was of doubtful success, and I am entirely confident that upon the whole the people of the United States have paid less for citrus fruits than they would have paid if the product were not put upon the market by the present organization which it represents.

In the northwestern section of our country, including my own State, is a great and powerful cooperative organization, for the marketing of grain chiefly, known as the Equity Association. It had to struggle for its life against the competition of what is known as the old-line elevator system. Most Senators are familiar with the character of those organizations. Some grain company will secure something in the nature of a concession or the right to establish elevators through the grain-growing sections at each of the little towns, and there practically controls the market for the farm products of the Northwest.

One company will have something in the nature of a concession along a certain line, another company along another line, and a third upon another line. The exactions of those old-line elevator companies have been such in the estimation and judgment of the farmers in the territory that they serve, or are organized for the purpose of serving, as to induce them to organize cooperatively, the most powerful organization being the Equity Association, of which I have spoken.

The farmers in a certain locality would gather together and associate themselves and build an elevator of their own, and through their own elevators transport to the terminal markets their products, and there put them upon the market and secure the profits. They thus secured what was believed to be perfect grading and the going market price for their products.

But it was found, some way or other, that when these local associations transported their products to the terminal markets they were there met with all manner of difficulties about marketing their products. In some way or other they never were able to get cars when they needed the cars. When they got to the terminal points they needed switches and there were not switching engines to do their switching. They met with difficulty about getting money at banks with which to finance their operations, and they were obliged to federate and extend their association, and eventually, against great odds, to construct at the terminal points elevators of their own, to which they made shipments. Increasing in their financial strength and ability, they eventually overcame the difficulty of getting money for the purpose of moving the crops. All of this is to be commended, and has my most hearty support.

I might say, in that connection, that during the past summer I had the good fortune to be in Denmark for a brief period, and there learned of the wonderful development of the cooperative system of marketing in that country. The details of it were given to me by a very intelligent citizen of Copenhagen, who speaks English perfectly, having served for some time as a professor in one of the English universities. He told me that the farmers of the entire country are federated into an organization which puts their products—butter, cheese, eggs, and poultry—directly upon the London market, with no intervener at all. Under the old system, the farmer would bring a dozen or two dozen eggs of uncertain date and more uncertain condition to the local buyer, the local buyer would sell to some transportation company, possibly, and the transportation company would take them to London, and there they would be turned over to a commission merchant, and the result was what might have been expected.

As it is now, they put their own products right on the London market, and he told me they had the system so perfect, that the eggs, for instance, are all marked as they are laid, and if a bad egg goes upon the London market, they can trace the egg back to the farmer who put it in, and the penalty for anything of that kind would be expulsion from the association.

So they preserve the reputation of their association in that way.

On the other hand, I was going to say that in my State is the celebrated Bitter Root Valley, a section for the culture of apples probably without an equal, certainly not surpassed, in any section of the country. Perhaps all Senators will recall that some five or six, possibly ten, years ago a great campaign was organized to sell lands in the Bitter Root Valley for the culture of apples. Lands were sold at as high as four or five hundred dollars an acre, but for the want of a marketing system the whole thing has fallen flat. They are cutting down the apple trees and turning the ground again into alfalfa and other forage products. They never were able, some way or other, to develop a marketing system.

So, Mr. President, I am not to be put down at all as being opposed to any measure which would forward that great purpose. The simple question before us, however, is as to whether we ought to enact the bill as it passed the House, or whether we ought to enact the Senate substitute. I want to explain what the difference is between the two bills, and it is a very simple one.

This is not the first time this measure has been before the Senate. It was considered by the Senate in the month of December, 1920, upon a bill, which came from the House, substantially like that which is the subject of consideration here at the present time. There is a feature of difference to which I shall invite attention a little later. To the bill as it came from the House the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, to which it was referred, proposed certain amendments. Among other things, the bill as it passed the House provided for a supervisory authority in the Secretary of Agriculture. The Senate proposed to put the supervisory authority, or revisory authority it might perhaps be more appropriately described, in the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. POMERENE. So that I may be able to follow the Senator, do I understand he is referring to the bill before the Senate one year ago?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am now referring to the bill considered by the Senate in 1920—that is, a year ago last December. This further amendment was proposed by the Senate committee:

> Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the creation of or attempt to create a monopoly, or to exempt any association organized hereunder from any proceedings instituted under the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, on account of unfair methods of competition in commerce.

The question as to where the revisory authority should be placed was not a matter of very serious consideration. The bill went to conference, and the conference was unable to agree, the Senate conferees insisting upon that amendment proposed by them, to the effect that nothing in the act was to be deemed to authorize the creation or the attempt to create a monopoly, and that, Mr. President, is the only substantial difference now, the only real subject of contention between the bill as it passed the House and now before us, and the Senate substitute, namely, whether we should authorize, under the protection of this act, the creation of or the attempt to create a monopoly in the products to which the bill refers.

Accordingly, Mr. President, quite at variance with the statement made on yesterday by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senate substitute differs from the bill as it passed the House only in this respect, with just a verbal change to which I shall call attention after a time. Section 1 of the bill as it passed the House is section 1 of the Senate substitute. Section 1 of the bill as it passed the House is the part of the bill which authorizes the existence of these corporations.

Section 2 of the bill as it passed the House provides for correcting any wrongs which these corporations may do. We take that out. The report has advised Senators that in our judgment it offers no remedy at all for any wrongs which may be done. But Senators will bear in mind that under the Senate bill the parties in whose interest the legislation is enacted are authorized, just as they are in the bill as it passed the House, without any let or hindrance at all, to go on and organize, so that by taking out section 2 of the bill as it passed the House the Senate substitute is more liberal to the farmer than is the bill as it passed the House.

We say that we do not feel there are evils to be taken care of likely to arise from the enactment if we put in a provision, such as is suggested in another section, that no authority is granted by the act to set up a monopoly.

So that the sole matter of difference—in substance, the sole question for determination—is the question as to whether we shall authorize the setting up of monopolies under the protection of this bill. That is the one question for the Senate to determine.

The Senate committee insists that we shall not authorize that to be done. I understand the position of Senators on the other side to be that we shall, and that is a plain statement of the issue between us.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, am I right in this, then, that the difference between the two is that under the House bill, if I understand the Senator correctly, there may be a monopoly, but subject to regulation——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. POMERENE. And under the Senate committee bill there may be a monopoly, but without any regulation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senate committee bill forbids monopoly utterly.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the provision to which the Senator refers as forbidding the monopoly?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It will be found on page 5 of the committee substitute, as follows:

> Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the creation of or attempt to create a monopoly, or to exempt any association organized hereunder from any proceedings instituted under the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, on account of unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I agree with very much that has been said by the distinguished Senator from Montana, but in view of the provision in the Senate committee amendment which the Senator has just read, may I inquire what rights are given to these associations that they do not now have under existing law?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to answer the Senator, and that is the course my argument would naturally take.

Mr. President, this legislation is asked because, it is said, the organization of such associations as those authorized by the bill is fraught with peril of prosecution under the Sherman Act as in violation of its provisions. Bear in mind that no prosecution, so far as the committee was able to ascertain, has ever been instituted under the Sherman Act against any organization of farmers except the proceedings brought against what is known as the California Raisin Growers' Association, of which I shall speak later. I have indicated to the Senate that at the present time vast cooperative associations are actually in operation, the Equity, for instance. Recently there has been organized a great cooperative association known as the National Grain Dealers' Association. The California Fruit Growers' Association has been operating for something like 15 years.

At no time has any prosecution been instituted against any of these organizations upon the ground that they are violative of the Sherman Act, I take it, because it is the view of those charged with the operation of the law that such combinations as are in existence are not in unreasonable restraint of trade, and that therefore they do not fall under the condemnation of the statute. That seems to have been the judgment of everybody up to this time.

But it is said that when advocates of the organization of these cooperative farm associations go about for the purpose of inducing farmers thus to cooperate and to associate themselves in cooperation for the purpose of marketing their products, interested parties, those who handle the business now, the old-line elevator companies in our section of the country, the old commission men dealing in raisins in California, and generally throughout the country the dealers in milk products, noise it about and circulate a rumor to the effect that organizations of that character are violative of the Sherman Act and prosecutions are likely to be instituted if they are organized. Thus it is said, though I do not know how effectively, that farmers are deterred from associating themselves with these associations by reason of fear of prosecution under the Sherman Act.

It is my purpose, and I think the purpose of most of the members of the committee, at least a majority of the members of the committee, to relieve these people from the peril, if there be peril, of prosecution under the Sherman Act, so far as section 1 is concerned.

Now, I will answer the question of the Senator from Oregon. The Sherman Act in its important provisions deals with two problems. It penalizes two different things. Section 1 of the Sherman Act forbids any combination, contract, or conspiracy in restraint of trade. Section 2 forbids monopolies and penalizes monopolies wherever they may exist. I read section 1:

> Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

That is, every contract, combination in the form of a trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade is punishable by section 1. Section 2 reads as follows:

> Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize any part of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

The answer to the Senator from Oregon is that it is our purpose to relieve these associations from all possible risk of being prosecuted under section 1 of the act, but not under section 2.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that every monopoly constitutes elements also of restraint of trade, and that nearly every restraint of trade has the elements of monopoly, and in very nearly every case, and I do not know but in every case, both sections of the act are involved.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, that is a hypothetical question.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; it is not a hypothetical question at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not believe a discussion of it would be helpful at all.

The argument is that the statute is called to the attention of these people who want to organize one of these associations, and it is said to them that "every contract, combination, and so forth, in restraint of trade is involved, and therefore you will be guilty." If they read section 2 to the farmers out West they will say, "Take the National Grain Dealers' Association; it was a monopoly." They say, "There is no monopoly, because we can not possibly organize a monopoly." I will discuss that a little later on. You can not possibly organize a monopoly of wheat growers, you can not organize a monopoly of cotton growers, you can not organize a combination of hay growers, you can not organize a combination of potato growers that will constitute a monopoly in interstate commerce, in my judgment, but you can organize a combination of various producers that might possibly be held to be in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act,

But I may say now, in anticipation, that I shall call attention presently to the fact that monopolies can be organized with reference to certain limited products of the farm that are grown only within a very restricted area or that are perishable in character and will not stand shipment from one end of the country to the other. I may say here, anticipating, that I shall show that milk is one of those things the supply of which to the great industrial centers, to the great populous cities of the country, can be monopolized, and just as easily as not under this act.

I desire to acquaint Senators further with the fact that that is why this provision is included in the bill. The gentlemen are in the gallery now just watching the course of this, one of them representing the association that to-day supplies 60 per cent of the milk consumed in the city of New York.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The discussion by the Senator is very interesting and it leads to this question. I note that the Senate committee bill provides—

> That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the creation of or attempt to create a monopoly.

That language is slightly different from the language of section 2 of the Sherman antitrust law. That speaks of monopolization or an attempt to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce. Was it the intention of the committee to make the exemption in the Senate committee bill as comprehensive as the language contained in section 2?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think it was.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator spoke of monopoly generally in the Senate committee bill, but the Sherman Act speaks of the monopolization of any part of the commerce.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is true.

Mr. POMERENE. There certainly is a difference in the phraseology. I am not entirely clear in my own mind whether there is a distinction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the language of the amendment is ample to cover the case, but the purpose was to leave subject to it the parties who attempted to do anything in contravention of section 2 of the Sherman Act.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, if that be true, the Senator would not object to an amendment to make the Senate committee bill read thus:

> Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the creation of or attempt to create a monopoly as defined in section 2 of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should not have any objection to it myself, but I would not like to complicate the situation any further. I think the language is sufficient.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. It is now a quarter past 5. Unfortunately, speaking for myself and possibly others, we made appointments at 5 o'clock expecting that the Senate would adjourn or recess by that time. It is evident that the Senator from Montana will not conclude to-night. I was wondering if it would meet his pleasure and the pleasure of other Senators that we take a recess at this hour?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should be very glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. We desire to have an executive session if the Senator from Montana is willing to yield at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

PATRIOTISM VERSUS CRIMINAL SYNDICALISM.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have two documents showing the attitude of the Seamen's Union toward the Industrial Workers of the World organization, and also their attitude toward laws passed to prevent that organization. It is so patriotic that I think it should go in the RECORD.

I hope that the shipowners' organization will consider well the charges here made that men who have been expelled from the Seamen's Union because of their affiliation with the Industrial Workers of the World are being taken into crews of ships going all over the world, carrying their red cards and propagating their doctrine. If that is true the shipowners who are permitting that are doing something that is not patriotic, to say the least.

I ask that these papers may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Circular No. 2.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 10, 1921.

To the officers and members of the International Seamen's Union of America, and more especially to the members of the sailors of the Pacific, the members of the marine firemen, oilers, and water tenders, the marine cooks and stewards:

The agitation against our union and in favor of the Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union No. 510 makes it my duty to furnish to you such information as I have with reference to this new and antagonistic organization, antagonistic to the seamen generally and to our union especially, because we are standing in their way. They want to use the seamen for their own purposes. These purposes are to use the seamen as an obstruction to be thrown into and destroy the functions of present society like any obstruction thrown into machinery will destroy the machinery; but you know what happens to the wrench or bolt or other obstruction. It is ground to powder—utterly destroyed. The leaders of this movement to draw the seamen from the International Seamen's Union of America into Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union No. 510 know as well as we do that it means the absolute sacrifice of all the hopes that we have had, and still have to liberate the seamen, to make us in the eyes of the law as free as other men, to gradually raise our wages so that we can marry and live like other men and so that any self-respecting young man may choose our calling for his life work. The real leaders of this attack upon us know this as clearly as they know that they are living, but they are not only willing but eager to sacrifice us to their own ends.

They also know that the sacrifice is as useless as was the sacrifice of men, women, and children practiced in ancient times in order to seek the favor of what they at the time believed to be the angry gods. These leaders are attacking human society. They desire to use us seamen. They know that we shall be crushed, but to this they are willing. Human society as organized here in America and in Europe outside of Russia know all about their purpose. Human society will defend itself. It will crush the agitators and the agitation, therefore we will be crushed if we permit ourselves to be thrown in.

Less than two in a thousand of the population are either directly or closely connected with the sea and marine transportation; such is the fact in Europe. Less than one in a thousand is so connected here in these United States. If all those so connected to the marine transportation here in the United States were organized it would not amount to more than 1,000,000 men. There are at least 35,000,000 grown men here in this country. This will give 1 man in each 35. You, if you be not a fool, must be able to see that you can not possibly do anything for either yourselves or for others by going outside the law and the policy followed by us. I am telling you this because it is my duty to warn you. I am telling you because I am one of you, I never was anything else. Many of you know that I could have been away from this struggle. This I would not do. Quite a number of us have been in this struggle for the seaman as seaman for some 30 years. I and those with me are in this struggle to our own finish—to the time when we can struggle no more. We are not quitters. We do not join a cause to quit it or to betray it. We do not beg mercy from enemy or bread from friend. We are in this fight to our own finish or the finish of those who would betray us and you by destroying our union and then repeal our charter of freedom. I am not now speaking to the crooks. I am trying to speak to the enthusiasts, the honest but sorely misguided young men. Mark where you stand, my young brother. Read the signs of the times. With these times you are one. You may help to restore to yourselves and all other seamen our proper place in human society or you may help to destroy all that has been done. You may help in shackling yourselves and others for the ages. Following the policy of the Seamen's Union we have made progress—more progress than any other union in centuries. The Scandinavian seamen were on the point of getting free, as free as we are here. They permitted themselves to be branded with the one big union branding iron and now their hopes are squashed.

THE MARINE TRANSPORT WORKERS' INDUSTRIAL UNION NO. 510—WHAT IS IT?

According to the constitution of the Industrial Workers of the World—the I. W. W.—it is part of and absolutely subordinated to the I. W. W. It is listed on page 46 of the I. W. W. constitution published officially in 1920. The Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union No. 510 has no constitution. It has a set of by-laws prepared by the I. W. W. and enforced by the I. W. W. general executive board. "The secretary-treasurer of M. T. W. I. U. No. 510 shall handle all funds and supplies and other property of the industrial union, and be held responsible to the G. O. C. for all transactions in the conduct of his office." (Sec. 4, p. 5, by-laws.)

"SEC. B. The chairman of the G. O. C. of the M. T. W. I. U. No. 510 shall receive all communications that pertain to organization in the field. * * *" (Pp. 5 and 6.)

"SEC. 5. Secretary-treasurer and chairman of the G. O. C. shall turn over weekly all important union news to the I. W. W. papers." (P. 6.)

"SEC. 8. The G. O. C. shall have general supervision over the affairs of the organization and see that the interests of the members are protected at all times, and the rules and by-laws passed by the convention enforced. They shall have the power to look over and examine all books and reports of any part of the M. T. W. I. U. No. 510. They shall meet twice a year; once prior to the convention of the M. T. W. I. U. No. 510, and also upon the call of the G. E. B. of the I. W. W." (P. 7, by-laws.) (G. O. C. evidently stands for general organizing committee, and G. E. B. for general executive board.)

"SEC. 16. The secretary-treasurer and the organization committee must be members of the I. W. W. in good standing 18 months, and members of the M. T. W. I. U. No. 510 at least six months." (P. 9.)

If there be any possibility of convincing you that the Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union No. 510 is in fact a subordinate part of the I. W. W. the above quotations must be sufficient. If this be not sufficient, it will be because you are either so blinded by propaganda as to be incapable of using your head or else you are receiving some financial advantage by pretending not to believe.

Having now dealt with the M. T. W. I. U. No. 510, the question may be:

THE ONE BIG UNION—WHAT IS IT?

Please note that its advocates always use the expression "the one big union." The declared purpose of the I. W. W. is to organize all workers into one union on industrial lines divided up according to industries. On pages 45 and 46 of the constitution such division is tentatively made of all the workers or those recognized by the I. W. W. as workers. There is no other organization existing to which the title "the one big union" could possibly be given. The one big union is a loving nickname applied to the I. W. W. sometimes in the spirit of love, but now it is used as a disguise, because most States in the United States have passed laws against the Industrial Workers of the World or, as they are sometimes called, "syndicalists." This transparent deception being disposed of, we will now make a comparison between the constitution and laws of the I. W. W. and the constitution and district laws of the International Seamen's Union of America.

HERE IS NO SMOKE SCREEN.

Excerpts from constitution of the I. W. W., of which the Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union No. 510 is a part, and from constitutions of the International Seamen's Union of America and the Sailors' Union of the Pacific. The I. W. W. mouths democracy; but when it writes its laws for the rank and file, you will find that it is purely bureaucratic, the elected officials having autocratic powers over the rank and file. Here you will find the democracy of the International Seamen's Union of America and the Sailors' Union of the Pacific written in plain language. We do not speak much of democracy, but we try to practice it in our own organization. Read them, compare them, and draw your own conclusions:

COMMENT.

The I. W. W. would permit a switchman, a warehouseman, a longshoreman, or anybody within the same industrial union, to transfer into the sailors and ship as an able seaman, as a fireman, or as a cook. Just consider what that will mean on board of a ship where those who know how must do the work for those who do not know how. We all must eat the food that a switchman or a longshoreman might cook. The seamen's laws provide for transfers from one sailor's district organization to another, or national sailor's union to another. It is the same with firemen or with cooks.

Constitution of I. W. W., 1920.

Comment.

The seamen's organization, beginning as far back as 40 years ago, set for itself the aim to organize the seamen of the world, to liberate them from serfdom, and make them as free as other working people, to promote skill, to abolish crimping, to increase wages, and to improve conditions afloat. Its methods have been and are evolutionary. It works within the law, whether in changing the law or in improving conditions. It has liberated the seamen of the United States and all other seamen coming within the jurisdiction of the United States. It has, in many instances, trebled the wage. It has improved forecastles, caused the vessels to furnish bedding, mess gear, and, in most instances, mess rooms. It has regulated and very materially reduced working hours. It has abolished advance and any recognition of an advance within the United States and has abolished it completely in American vessels everywhere. It has abolished crimping, properly so-called, through the stoppage of the payment of advance and the abolition of involuntary servitude. It is affiliated with the International Seafarers' Federation in order that seamen may find friends everywhere, and for the further purpose of working together with seamen of other nations, to establish at least a like freedom and a like condition in other countries.

DISCIPLINE.

"Organization in any sense implies discipline through the subordination of parts to the whole and of the individual member to the body of which it is a part."

Comment.

The I. W. W., of which the Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union, No. 510, is a part of the Industrial Workers of the World, which was organized in 1905, for the purpose of transforming human society. Its methods being to disregard the law, to overcome it through industrial power, and for that reason has been branded revolutionary. Its more immediate declared purpose was to organize the unskilled, and its stated reason was that the American Federation of Labor had failed to organize the unskilled. After 16 years of an intensive (?) organizing campaign, it has evidently abandoned and forgotten the unskilled and the unorganized and is now seeking instead to disorganize the organized. Its records of achievements are found in Lawrence, Mass., at Winnipeg, in British Columbia, among the sawmill and timber workers in the Pacific and Northwestern States. Its record, so far as the seamen are concerned, are found in the ruins, which it left behind itself on the Atlantic coast in 1913, in British Columbia, and at Buenos Aires, Argentine, in 1920. Like a blighting pest coming through the air it has descended upon place after place to leave nothing but wreckage, misery, and despair behind. It is always to be found watching, especially the losing struggles of the workers, waiting like the buzzards to finish and consume the sick and the wounded; then, gorged by its feast, it flaps its wings and raucously croaks democracy while passing from its latest place of achievement.

If you have not read, read, compare, study, in order that you may understand and wisely choose.

Most respectfully,

ANDREW FURUSETH,
President I. S. U. of A.

A SOUND WARNING.

Believing that a considerable number of seamen have been innocently flirting with ideas and methods of the Industrial Workers of the World or the Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union No. 510, or the one big union, or the International Transport Workers' Federation, or whatever name it may assume in furtherance of so-called revolutionary tactics, I deem it my duty to such men, but more especially to the young among them, to submit to the Seamen's Journal for publication a copy of the law of the State of California defining and dealing with criminal syndicalism:

An act defining criminal syndicalism and sabotage, proscribing certain acts and methods in connection therewith and in pursuance thereof, and providing penalties and punishments therefor. (Approved Apr. 30, 1919. In effect immediately.)

The people of the State of California do enact as follows:

"SECTION 1. The term 'criminal syndicalism' as used in this act is hereby defined as any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change.

"SEC. 2. Any person who—

"1. By spoken or written words or personal conduct advocates, teaches, or aids and abets criminal syndicalism, or the duty, necessity, or propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence, or any unlawful method of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change; or

"2. Willfully and deliberately by spoken or written words justifies or attempts to justify criminal syndicalism, or the commission or attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism with intent to approve, advocate, or further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism; or

"3. Prints, publishes, edits, issues, or circulates, or publicly displays any books, paper, pamphlet, document, poster, or written or printed matter in any other form, containing or carrying written or printed advocacy, teaching, or aid and abetment of, or advising, criminal syndicalism; or

"4. Organizes or assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of any organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism; or

"5. Willfully, by personal act or conduct, practices, or commits any act advised, advocated, taught, or aided and abetted by the doctrine or precept of criminal syndicalism, with intent to accomplish a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change;

"Is guilty of a felony and punishable by imprisonment in the State prison not less than one nor more than 14 years.

"SEC. 3. If for any reason any section, clause, or provision of this act shall by any court be held unconstitutional, then the legislature hereby declares that, irrespective of the unconstitutionality so determined of such section, clause, or provision, it would have enacted and made the law of this State all other sections, clauses, and provisions of this act.

"SEC. 4. Inasmuch as this act concerns and is necessary to the immediate preservation of the public peace and safety, for the reason that at the present time large numbers of persons are going from place to place in this State advocating, teaching, and practicing criminal syndicalism, this act shall take effect upon approval by the governor."

It is not a question of whether such law is really wise. It is not a question of whether it is in accord with what you may believe to be fundamental Americanism. It is the law of this State. It is your first duty, whether you be a citizen or merely a temporary resident in this State, to respect and obey its laws. A very large number of men and some women have been convicted under this law and are serving terms in prison under its provisions.

I am fully aware that there are men who in whispers or in other places loudly proclaim their belief, assumed or genuine, to the effect that it is the real man's duty to resist such law and to take the consequences for the purpose of making the law odious. If the native American, who has received his education in an American school, feels like acting that way, he may be presumed to know what he is doing. And while I urge him to think carefully, to stop, look, and listen, before he proceeds to violate the law of his country, I do not presume to be his special adviser on such questions; I speak especially to seamen who come from foreign countries.

America has given you freedom to quit your vessels in American ports. The United States struck the shackles from your limbs. It raised all the seamen from serfdom to the freedom granted to all other workers within its borders. You have a right to think highly of such a country; but you must realize that with freedom comes responsibility. This you can not shirk. If you fail to do your own duty, you can not complain when others fail in their duty to you. To listen to proposals that are contrary to law you can not at all times help. Your shipmate brings it up in the forecastle. You hear it urged, there is no other place to go; but there is no good reason why you should encourage it or really tolerate it. If you are a real man, you must be able to see and understand that when you do you are returning evil for good. America gave you freedom, and if you listen and agree to proposals that the American people have stamped as criminal, you become allied with those who advocate it and must take the consequences.

Now please read the law over again and note that if you have such literature—as is prohibited in the law—in your possession, you will be sent to prison. If you should for one reason or another be arrested—and you know this might easily happen—and you have an I. W. W. card on your person or in your possession, you are guilty under the law and you may be sent to prison. If you distribute such literature, you are violating the law. If you advocate such ideas, you violate the law and you may be sent to prison. So you will see that, while it is morally wrong, it is also dangerous to you, because you may be punished by loss of liberty for years.

We seamen have other work to do. We were bondmen. America made us free men. It is our duty, as it was our promise in our hours of bondage, to assist other seamen to become at least as free as we are. This can only be accomplished by working to this end within the law. We are free men entitled to participate in the political work of society. Bad laws, and there are unquestionably many such, can only be repealed or amended in one way, and that is by legislation.

We were tied to the ship in the same way as the serf to the soil. That was the law. We succeeded in changing it by working in the regular way within the law. If we leave this beaten path, we will lose everything that has been gained. The seamen's act will be repealed and the imprisonment clauses of the old law will be restored.

If the wobblies had succeeded in getting control of our union, it would have come under the criminal syndicalist law. We would have been under constant police supervision, and finally we would have been abolished by the State, which then would have taken or confiscated our building and our funds, and a great many of us would have been sent to prison. The chief danger now seems to be over, but there must be no compromise with this danger. You must resist it everywhere, and you must attend the meetings in order that you may be able to help in guarding what we have and to assure progress for ourselves and others in the legal and only possible way.

SHIPOWNERS' QUEER POLICIES.

The following self-explanatory letter was forwarded by the Sailors' Union of the Pacific to the Pacific American Shipowners' Association, Alaska Commercial Building, San Francisco, and to the Shipowners' Association of the Pacific Coast, Santa Marina Building, San Francisco:

"GENTLEMEN: The situation among the seamen along this coast seems to call for a plain speech, and believing this I beg to lay before you the following facts, to which I hope you may give such attention as they deserve.

"The seamen on this coast threw up their hands and quit the struggle on July 29, 1921. The action was taken in accordance with advice given to the men by me. After this action had been taken I visited several shipowners and suggested that they might reconsider their action with reference to the establishment of shipping offices at San San Francisco and San Pedro. In these offices you registered the men, and you began to ship them according to their turn as registered.

"I called your attention to the fact that while you had told the seamen and the public that you especially wanted to get rid of the members of the Industrial Workers of the World from the merchant marine of this coast and this country, the system of registration and shipping by turns could not accomplish that purpose. The open shop is their playground, and the registration and shipping by turn is their system, which they impose upon all and in all places where they can exercise any power.

"Your answer was, 'No; we know the wobblies and how to deal with them.' The system of registration is still continuing, although the turn system has, under pressure from shipowners, been so changed that the officers are permitted to choose among the registered men. This became necessary because the inefficient men were sailing and the really efficient men were leaving, as I had suggested would be the result.

"I visited San Pedro with Patrick Flynn, and we were told that wobblies had known before the steam-schooner agreement was voted down by the seamen as to what the shipowners were going to do when it was voted down. The wobblies program was: First, vote down the proposed agreement, then the shipowners will establish shipping offices, where the shipping will be done by turn. Be on hand and ready to register when the offices are open, so we can be in the vessels and make wobblies of those who as yet are not lined up.

"On my return from San Pedro I asked such wobbly leaders as I knew if there was a strong agitation to declare the struggle off as soon as shipping offices were opened. I was told yes. This fits in so well with the advice given from the wobbly office in Chicago that the whole thing seemed clear. But how did the wobblies know what the shipowners were going to do? There must have been a leak, or did some shipowners double-cross their committee just as our committee was double-crossed by the wobblies on our side.

"On September 22 last Capt. Walter Peterson called a few sailors, firemen, and cooks into his office and informed them that offices would be opened in Portland, Aberdeen, and Seattle, and that a continuous discharge book, with the seaman's picture in it, would be issued. Two days later I visited several shipowners and urged that such policy would be destructive to the personnel, because the real seamen would quit the sea—or at least this coast.

"I insisted that the shipowners should postpone establishing the offices and the books for at least 60 days, and thus give us a chance to show that the seamen on this coast can be trusted to clean their own house of the wobblies. This was agreed to on Monday, the 26th.

"Now, here let me record that I understood fully what was at stake. If we failed to clean house, we would be stamped in the eyes of the public and of the law as an organization so tainted as to be subject to prosecution under the criminal syndicalist law of the State of California. But while I was aware of this, I knew also that if the books were issued the men worth while would quit and the personnel of the service here would be given a blow from which it would take years to recover. The law would be used anyway, and the union, such as we have struggled to make it—an organization to help building a real personnel for a real American sea power—would temporarily pass away. I reported the main points to the meeting of the union that night, and the union passed the following resolution:

"Whereas the Seamen's Journal has for some considerable time advocated the ideas of the I. W. W., the Marine Transport Workers' Industrial Union No. 510, which is a section of the I. W. W. and of the One Big Union, which is only another name for the I. W. W.; and

"Whereas this propaganda is directly against the seamen and destructive of all the hopes and aspirations of the seamen; and

"Whereas this propaganda is growing more virulent and aggressive; and

"Whereas there can be no divided allegiance: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the editor, John Vance Thompson, be, and is hereby, instructed to cease all such propaganda in the Journal at once; and be it further

"Resolved, That he edit the Journal on principles laid down in our constitution and according to our policy, namely, for the seamen as seamen, to the end that the Journal shall again become what it was instituted to be—the champion of the seamen's cause.

"I was compelled to go East, and remained away until October 29. In the meeting of October 31 John Vance Thompson brought charges against me for destroying the union's property, to wit, the Seamen's Journal. I brought counter charges against him for editing the Journal in violation of the constitution and the resolution of September 26. When the trial committee was about to be elected the wobblies threw the meeting into confusion and compelled an adjournment by beginning a physical row, but on November 7 the committee was elected and the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas the Sailors' Union of the Pacific is recently being invaded by a number of advocates of revolutionary doctrines and principles wholly contrary to the policy of this union; and

"Whereas the constitution of the Sailors' Union, article 3, section 3, strictly provides that 'no one shall be admitted to membership in this union who is a member of any dual organization or any other organization hostile to the aims and principles of this union': Therefore be it

"Resolved, That article 3, section 3, of the constitution be strictly enforced, and any member found violating same be expelled in accordance with the constitution; and be it further

"Resolved, That this resolution be conspicuously posted at headquarters and in the branches of this Union.

"The trial committee's report was submitted November 14. The report exonerated me and found John Vance Thompson guilty. Whereupon he was expelled. To expel a member in the Sailors' Union requires a two-thirds majority vote, and thus it was proven beyond any question that the Sailors' Union was not so tainted but that it could clean itself. The Sailors' Union was not only abut but it was willing to clean itself. From such information as I have received this was not expected by some of the shipowners. Was the wish the father to this thought? Eighteen more were expelled on November 21, and since then some 10 more."

"The following resolutions were adopted on November 14:

"Resolution 1.

"Whereas it has become know that membership books in the East and elsewhere have been illegally stamped: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That no transfers be made until it has been properly ascertained that the book of the possessor thereof is right; and be it further

"Resolved, That any books offered for transfer be taken up and sent to the Atlantic or the Great Lakes, as the case may be, for verification.

"Resolution 2.

"Whereas threats have been uttered against this building; and

"Whereas all kinds of men are coming into our reading room during the day: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That none except members in good standing, or such as are given permission by the secretary, be permitted in the reading room, under penalty of being prosecuted for trespassing; and further

"Resolved, That placards be posted at the head of the stairs, in the reading room, and the office warning all who are prohibited from the use of the reading room to keep out.

"The 60 days' grace being about passed, I visited some of the shipowners with the suggestion that in order to get the wobblies out of the vessels the owners ought to give us passes to the docks and ships. To expel them from the Sailors' Union was our part of the cleaning process. We did that for our own sake; but to clean the vessels is the shipowners' job. They alone can do that. They own the vessels, and they alone can determine who shall sail in them. With the wobblies—at least some of them—having one name in the union, one on the streets, and then some other name when registering at the owners' office, names and even pictures mean nothing. They must be identified if the work is to be done at all.

"The labor committee of the shipowners met and decided against the passes. The wobblies are sailing. Expelled men are sailing. At least one of the owners has informed me that they know who are the wobblies better than we do. And yet they are sailing. They carry the paraphernalia necessary to join men on the vessels. They joined a good many, some under coercion in the past, and this is still going on. Of course, we being forbidden to visit some of the vessels, it will take us a long time and there may be some trouble here and there if we are to stop this alone. But why should we?

"There are already quite a number of men who believe that the wobblies are carried on the vessels by the shipowners for their own purposes; that they protect them not only on the vessels but in the courts as well. I do not charge that this is so, but it certainly looks like it. They are expelled and their names are published in our official minutes, yet they keep sailing. Why? They are arrested and are out on bail; their trials are delayed. Why? We offer to point them out, but this offer is not accepted. Why? They are not, except in a few instances, even fair seamen, yet they are permitted to sail and carry on their propaganda on the vessels and in the harbors. Why?

"Industrial Solidarity of November 26 has the following to say:

"'In one industry, that of marine transport, the I. W. W. has gone far toward realization of its international ideal. The Marine Transport Workers have their flourishing branches from Scandinavia to South America. Wobbly seamen carry the propaganda of the one big union wherever they go, which means to every seaport on the globe. They have the greatest opportunity of any group of wage earners to make our organization in fact as well as in name the Industrial Workers of the World.'

"This is no mere boast. There is some truth in it, though it is, of course, exaggerated. One would not be willing to believe that there are wobbly shipowners, and I don't believe there are; but that they, for reasons of their own, in some way employ and protect them seems at least reasonable. Are they using them to kill real, honest unionism, with the purpose of dealing with them later or not at all? Just now the real seamen are certainly between two millstones—the shipowners and the wobblies.

"Please do not make the mistake of thinking that we are complaining. We will find ways and means to protect ourselves in some way. But all the shipowners, and the public as well, should be made to understand what is going on here. Whether the same situation is to be found on the Atlantic I, as yet, know not. That will be found out and dealt with later.

"With great respect and in the interest of a real and lasting American merchant marine, I beg to remain on behalf of real seamen,

"Yours, very truly,

"ANDREW FURUSETH,
"Secretary Sailors' Union of the Pacific.

"DECEMBER 5, 1921."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, through Him whose name is above every name do we come to Thee. Thou will surely look with favor upon us who are created in Thy image, and we hope destined to come into Thy likeness. Another one has gone, heroic in our country's defense and skilled in the affairs of government. O be in the chamber of affliction and with those who are in the shadow of this great loss. What is so dark to us is light to Thee, and there is a plan, a purpose, and a goal for everyone. Then give us the trust that lifts skyward and sees beyond the night line. There is nothing in life, nothing in death, and nothing beyond the grave that is able to separate us from the Father and His love. Give us the power of faith and courage to break through earth's cares, earth's burdens, and earth's sorrows, and wait patiently and rest sweetly until the dawning of the perefect day. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDRESS ON ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Judge WILLIAM R. GREEN, be allowed to address the House for 40 minutes, after the reading of the Journal on February 13, on the life and public service of Abraham Lincoln. February 12, Lincoln's birthday, comes on Sunday this year, and Monday is the day following.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. GREEN] may address the House for 40 minutes on February 13, on the life and services of Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF DESTITUTION AMONG INDIANS.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report a joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read House joint resolution 264 to provide for the relief of destitution among Indians, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available until June 30, 1922, for the relief of destitution among Indians, to be used in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for the furnishing of food, clothing, and other supplies: Provided, That where able-bodied Indians have no means of support this appropriation may be used to pay such Indians for work performed in the construction of roads or other improvements on the reservation, or for the purchase of necessary seeds and implements to enable them to cultivate their farms: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the purchase of food, clothing, or other supplies that can be furnished by the War or Navy Departments or by the United States Shipping Board from surplus stock in time to meet the present emergency; and the War and Navy Departments and the United States Shipping Board shall, upon receipt of formal request therefor, and without charge, turn over to the Indian Service at the point of storage any such surplus food, clothing, or other supplies: And provided further, That a sum equal to the total value of all supplies furnished by the other governmental agencies shall be reserved from the appropriation made herein and be covered back into the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, where is this destitution among Indians?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman desires I will take a couple of minutes to make a statement with reference to the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CRAMTON. For the information of the House I will state that a short time ago the Interior Department sent to Congress through the Bureau of the Budget an estimate for an appropriation of $155,000 for this purpose. After the consideration of the matter by the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the Interior Department, the Bureau of Indian Affairs took up with the War Department and the Shipping Board the possibility of securing from surplus stocks on hand food, blankets, and clothing for this purpose.

As a result of their further investigation they came again to the Appropriations Committee and stated that by reason of these facts and because of some lapse of time, as the winter is passing, the amount might be reduced from $155,000 to $100,000.

The resolution before the House provides for that amount, to include the value of any supplies of that kind that are furnished from surplus stock, so that the resolution does not involve the expenditure of the entire $100,000 in cash—probably not over half of it.

The destitution among these Indians is referred to in House Document No. 155 of this session, covering the transmission of the estimates, and on page 3 of that document, in the statement of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the need is set forth that because of drought and crop failures, and so forth, particularly in Montana among the Blackfeet Indians, and in Arizona and New Mexico conditions have been brought about that mean great suffering and possible starvation unless some relief is given.

The current appropriation for relief of distress and prevention of disease among the Indians was $375,000, of which nearly $325,000 is for maintenance of hospitals and sanatoria, leaving a total of about $50,000 for general purposes, and of that only $700 has not been obligated. The present Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Burke, was for a long time chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in this House, and it is only due to the Bureau of Indian Affairs that I should state that in the consideration of the bill for the Interior Department we found that the estimates submitted were on a very economical basis, and your subcommittee in charge of that bill feel that the Indian Office has gone further than any other branch of the Interior Department—and they have all done very well—in the effort for real economy and retrenchment. And we are very well satisfied that unless there was a very real necessity Commissioner Burke would not have submitted this request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What is gained by the Indian Service in the Department of the Interior trimming its figures for the support of the Indians in submitting the Budget figures, which are the basis for the appropriation, and then turning around and asking an appropriation in a lump sum for the relief of the same Indians?

Mr. CRAMTON. The gain probably is in this, that the reduction is in other items where a reduction could be made. There was not a reduction in this particular item for the relief of distress and the prevention of disease among the Indians.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not want to take time to discuss it, but I notice the small appropriations made for the Indians in my part of the country. They are trimming a hundred off each thousand dollars, which amounts to trimming nothing to nothing.

Mr. CRAMTON. I can hardly agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the gentleman has asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this matter?

Mr. WALSH. I asked the gentleman from Michigan under a reservation to object to give me a little information about the matter.

Mr. GARNER. Then, this is furnishing information to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and as the gentleman has not satisfied me I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2022. An act promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico; and

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following title were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2022. An act promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico; to the Committee on Appropriations.

REFUNDING OF OBLIGATIONS OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8762) for the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments, with Senate amendments, and I move that the Senate amendments be agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the consideration of this bill or resolution at this time require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does not. It is a House bill with Senate amendments.

Mr. WALSH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Do we act on the Senate amendments separately or in gross?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that any Member has the right to have them acted upon separately.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask for a separate vote on the next to the last amendment which the Clerk read.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Are not the amendments of the Senate of a character that requires consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It does not seem to the Chair that these amendments involve an expenditure by the Government. It does not seem to the Chair at first blush that they require action in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. There is an amendment fixing the rate of interest which is not in the House bill.

The SPEAKER. That is a limitation on the provisions of the House bill.

Mr. MANN. Does not that propose to fix the rate of interest on Government security? And is not that a proposition which would require consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is not designed to fix the rate of interest, but it is a limitation.

Mr. MANN. That amounts to the same thing.

The SPEAKER. The bill as passed gives the commission full control over the rate of interest, and this reduces rather than increases their power, it seems to the Chair. It does not seem to the Chair that it requires consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I did not happen to be here when the bill passed the House in December, I believe it was. This is purely a question of whether or not the House will agree to certain amendments put on by the Senate. I think the bill is a better bill as it comes back from the Senate than it was when it went there. It contains some things that the membership of the House on this side sought during the consideration of it when it passed this body. In fact, it contains nearly everything they fought for here except the proposition of bringing back to Congress for ratification the action of the commission. In the first place, it guards the appointment of a commission by requiring them to go to the Senate for confirmation. In the second place, it has the limitation of the rate of interest that the Secretary and the commission may agree upon, and third, and the most important of all, it limits the time to which they can extend the payment.

There is also another amendment in the proposition that is a very desirable one, and that was sought to be put on at the time it passed this body, but which was declined, and that is that when once refunded it is to be a final action as far as that is concerned. As it passed the House you could have a funding for a certain year, and that same year it could be refunded again. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, it developed no longer ago than in the past 24 hours that it was the purpose of the administration to extend some of these debts as much as 50 years if the limitation had not been put on in the Senate.

I predict now that when this final consummation is completed you will have some of this interest and some of these payments extended for 25 years, the limit of this bill. It is my belief, from information that has come to me, that it is the purpose of the administration to extend the payment of this interest due on these bonds until the international bankers can collect their four or five billion dollars now owing to them from Europe. That is the whole fight in this matter, and has been from the beginning to now. This will afford an opportunity for the international bankers to collect their money before Uncle Sam can get his, and in the meantime the taxpayers of the country will continue to contribute $500,000,000 in order that they may collect their debt in preference to ours. What does the bill provide? It provides that you can extend the interest due at this time or that will be due next month, and which you criticized the Treasury Department for extending. It provides that you can extend that for 25 years through your commission, and not collect a cent in principal or interest until 1947. I do not want to do that. An effort was made to limit that in this House, and an effort was made to limit it in the Senate, but the Republican organization defeated it. No longer than yesterday when this bill came back from the Senate it was understood that it should be taken up and agreed to at once, but the administration did not want the limitation, and the matter was postponed until to-day. However, it was feared that if the matter went back to the Senate it was questionable whether you could get it through at all if you took off the limitation.

I mention that so that in the future in discussing this matter in the House of Representatives, as you will within the next decade, you may know from discussion that has gone on in this House and in the other end of the Capitol what the purpose of the administration is in asking for this law. I repeat their purpose is twofold. First, it is to extend the interest payment on this debt and the principal a sufficient length of time so that the international banker may collect his four or five billion dollars from Europe before Uncle Sam can collect his, and the taxpayers will come in for taxes to pay the difference.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman recalls that under a previous administration a request was made of the Committee on Ways and Means to give that administration certain authority. At that time did the then Treasury Department ask for a limitation either of interest or of principal?

Mr. GARNER. No. But, Mr. Speaker, that only illustrates the difference between the Democratic and the Republican organizations. We declined to give a Democratic administration this power, while the Republicans give it to a Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the difference. When the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury came to the Democratic committee asking for unlimited power, we said, No; you can not have it; but when it comes to a Republican administration asking it of a Republican committee, that committee says, Oh, yes; and more if you desire. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is in error in summing up the reasons for the passage of this bill. There is no proposition before the committee to postpone the time of collecting the interest until the bankers of New York settle with their creditors abroad, nor has there been any such proposition before the committee since the present administration came into power. That was the proposition presented to the committee by the last administration through a Mr. Davis, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and although the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] did disagree with that gentleman and told him that Congress would not give the authority to extend the time of payment or interest, yet he—Mr. Davis—did say, and the gentleman will admit it, that whether Congress would give the authority or not, the Treasury had the authority and were going to do it, and they did do it; they extended the time of payment by letting the interest payments lapse for three years. The gentleman from Texas knows that. There is no such proposition here.

Again, the gentleman says that the Senate amendment provides for confirmation by the Senate of appointments to this commission. The bill as it passed the House provided that the Senate should confirm such appointments if they were other than Cabinet officers, the Committee on Ways and Means believing that Cabinet officers having already been confirmed by the Senate to perform Government duties it was not necessary to reconfirm them when appointed to this commission.

The only amendment to this bill that is of importance is an amendment fixing the rate of interest by limitation only and the limitation of time that the bonds can be taken for. The act that authorized the loans provided that the bonds of foreign Governments should not be taken for a greater length of time than our bonds ran for, on which we borrowed the money to make the loans. There is no serious objection to that, because that is quite in compliance with the provisions of the original act that authorized the loans. Personally, I think it is a mistake to agree that the minimum rate of interest charged on these foreign loans should be 4½ per cent. It was never intended that we should charge them more interest than we pay to our own people. I believe—and I believe that you believe—that inside of 5 or 10 years our Government bonds, sold bearing a rate of interest at 3 per cent, will be sold at a premium. Rates of interest are excessively high at the present time, due to unsettled conditions the world over, brought about by the war. The gentleman will remember that during the Cleveland administration something over $400,000,000 of Government bonds was disposed of in panic times in the United States, and that those bonds brought a premium of $30,000,000. They bore interest at the rate of 4 per cent. Since that time some Government bonds bearing a rate of interest at 3 per cent sold at a premium, and, in fact, our 2 per cent bonds which can be used for national bank issues have sold at a premium, and the rates of interest paid by our Government will be materially reduced within a few years.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that our 2 per cent bonds issued at that time are to-day selling on the market at a premium?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is correct. I do not think it would be just and equitable on the part of our Government to at any time impose on those people abroad a higher rate of interest than we have to pay here. They stood the brunt of this Great War, and when we made those loans we all agreed, and we do now, that the more money we at that time would furnish to those Governments that were engaged in that Great War to better equip their men that were in the field the less number of men we would be called upon to send there, and if it came to be a question of human blood or money, then money had no value as far as we were concerned. That is the way the loans were so freely made.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not our Government been paying 4¼ per cent and 5 per cent and even 5½ per cent for this money?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and as low as 2 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. If we have been paying these high rates, then why is 4¼ per cent high?

Mr. FORDNEY. We hold their demand obligations now drawing interest at 5 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. The 4¼ per cent is not a high rate.

Mr. FORDNEY. Not just now. I say within 5 or 10 years. We expect a much lower rate of interest, and it is right, my friends, to impose upon these people a rate of interest equal to our own in order to help them in their great distress. Let me say to you, gentlemen, my reason for making that statement is this: Great Britain to-day owes 46 per cent of her total wealth, everything, real and personal. France owes 53; Italy, I do not know, but a percentage somewhat above that sum. The Governments that owe us are in much worse financial condition than the people of the United States. Our public debt to-day is but 7 per cent of our total wealth, real and personal. There is no country on earth, no principal country anywhere, but what has a greater percentage of debt in proportion to their wealth than the people of the United States, notwithstanding the fact our debt is very great. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman answer a question before he yields?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Is it true, as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], that the commission would have authority to extend the payment of this interest for 25 years?

Mr. FORDNEY. There is nothing in the bill to that effect.

Mr. CHALMERS. Have they the power under the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think so; no, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman in favor of all these Senate amendments?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I would rather have this provision I am talking about stricken from the bill. But after consulting with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, they think it is workable and that they can proceed under its provisions. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, there are only two amendments put on by the Senate of anything like major importance, and as the bill is not in the hands of those Members present I will read those two provisions. Page 2, line 20, after "therefor," insert:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of maturity of any such bonds or other obligations due the United States of America by any foreign Government beyond June 15, 1947, or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4½ per cent per annum.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Where does the gentleman find that in the bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is an amendment put on in the Senate. I read it because most of the bills gentlemen have are those reported by the Finance Committee. These amendments were both adopted in open Senate. I entirely disagree with my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in the statement that these amendments improve the bill. On the contrary, I believe they will damage the bill, and the House believed it, too, for when the bill was originally before it amendments of this nature were voted down by a large majority. Gentlemen will recall that an amendment fixing the rate at not less than 5 per cent was substantially voted down and an amendment limiting the number of years that the bonds could run was voted down. I am one of those who believe that as a rule the House is more apt to be right than the body at the other end of the Capitol. [Applause.] I think so in this case. The situation simply is that if we fail now to agree to these amendments, if we have a conference, and if the House should prevail, as I believe it would, in restoring the House provision and striking out these limitations, there may be serious danger in another body that the obstructors of all legislation that we are attempting to enact would filibuster against this, as they do against most of the major constructive measures which our party is endeavoring to pass. [Applause on the Republican side.] I understand that there is no serious objection to the acceptance of these amendments, because, while they will to an extent tie the hands of the commission, it is difficult to imagine a case where any refunding operation extending over a period of more than 25 years or at a less rate of interest than 4½ per cent would be apt to be agreed upon. For these reasons I shall support the motion of the gentleman from Michigan to agree to these amendments and close the matter up once for all.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman has relieved my mind of a query that in case this passes Congress still later the commission could have the power to make better terms for the profit of the Nation?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have not any question that if the commission should find itself seriously hampered—if, for instance, some nation could not find it to be practical to limit the bonds to 25 years or 30 or 35 years, to which I can see no objection—Congress can grant additional authority.

Mr. FESS. But if Congress has not that power it seems to me very unwise to tie up the whole situation for a definite length of time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree with my colleague it is unwise, but it was done by a body less wise in this instance than this House, which placed no limitation upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] in response to an inquiry from some one on the Republican side said that there was no authority in the bill to extend the payment of interest for 25 years. I think the gentleman from Michigan is in error. The bill, section 2, says:

SEC. 2. That, subject to the approval of the President, the commission created by section 1 is hereby authorized to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America, etc.

In other words, this bill authorizes this commission to not only extend the time of payment of the principal, but specifically authorizes it to extend the time of payment of interest that is now due.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman think from the language in the bill the commission would extend the time of payment to the 15th of June, 1947, and make the principal and all the interest due on the same day? It would not be expected that the act intended any such thing.

Mr. WINGO. Candor compels me to state that I do not believe they would extend all the principal and interest for 25 years, but they could extend, and I think they will probably extend, the time of payment of principal at least 25 years, and I should not be surprised, and it is my understanding it is the intention, if they convert the interest that is now due into a principal obligation and extend the time of interest that is now due 25 years. I think that is the scheme. They have the power to do it. Not only that, if there is default in the payment of interest on any obligation, this commission is authorized under this bill then to defer the payment of interest hereafter, because it authorizes them to defer the payment of principal and interest not only on obligations now held but on any other obligations which we may hereafter receive. To my mind, there is no doubt as to the intention. What they intend to do is to convert the accrued interest into a principal sum, taking a bond therefor, and extend the time of payment 25 years. In addition to that, it is intended, and they have the power specifically authorized by this bill to do so, to do just as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has charged.

The main strength of the influences back of having this commission appointed is that the international bankers who hold the other bonds and obligations of these Governments shall get their money first. Is the gentleman deceived by the rise in the market of these foreign bonds in the last few weeks, since it was evident this administration was to put this through? There is no doubt, I think, in the minds of any man who is conversant with what is trying to be done, that that is the object and that that will be done by the commission.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. The language of the section the gentleman read is "now held by the United States." All of the world's demand obligations must be extended. That is the purpose.

Mr. WINGO. Of course, the gentleman, though not willfully, has not noticed. It says, "Any obligations of any foreign Government hereafter received." The original bill goes further than provided by the Senate amendment. It can not only extend the time of payment for all the interest that is now due, but they intend to treat the accrued interest as a sum and include it in the bonds, or else make the rate of interest so high as to absorb it. The obligations they take under this bill will be obligations hereafter received and will mean that this same commission may then defer the interest as it may fall due in the future and defer it from year to year in order to meet the exigencies and the interests of these private bankers. That is what is behind the bill, and without that it would not pass.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? There is one amendment by the Senate that has not been called to the attention of the House, and that is that the whole power of the commission ceases in three years. That, of course, bars them from anything beyond three years.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I think the description of the bill as it is now before us, its effect and probable operation, by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], is very clear, succinct, and convincing. The aspect of the situation, however, with which it deals that I think the House ought to consider, and which, it seems to me, has been overlooked, is the necessity for making provisions to deal with just such a contingency as he describes—and that is failure by one of those debtor Governments to meet their obligations to us. We are not dealing here with individual debtors. We can not go to a court and after obtaining judgment for what may be due against a delinquent nation send the sheriff to collect it. Let us assume for a moment a condition which I think is not merely a possibility but a very strong probability, that some of these Governments can not pay their interest. What, then, are we to do? Are we to treat it as an act of war and send an army and a navy to make war upon them and thus put them in a worse condition for meeting their obligations than they were before? We must reserve somewhere power to deal with such a condition should it arise, and if it be found they are unable to pay—to pay this year or next year—to make arrangements by which we may at least have some prospect in the event of better times to collect as much of what is due us as the situation will allow.

I ask the House to remember, what I think we should never forget for a moment, that we are dealing here with perhaps the most difficult, delicate condition that ever arose in the history of civilized nations. It is the first time that the world has faced a condition when enormous, almost inconceivable, sums are due as the result of a war when the debtors as well as the creditor are all sovereigns. The very essence of sovereignty is that it can not be conditioned or coerced except by war. We can not proceed on the assumption that there is any way in which we can force these debtor nations to settle their debts to us except by war. When that fact is realized I do not think anybody here would contemplate the possibility of sending armed forces to collect the debt or the interest that was in default.

I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that this bill is very much improved by the amendment fixing a minimum limit on the interest that can be accepted. Otherwise, the commission would have the power practically to cancel the debt. Even though specifically prohibited to cancel it, yet if the commission had plenary power to fix the interest it might fix a nominal rate, and that would be virtual cancellation of the debt.

It seems to me therefore that the bill as at present framed is about as effective and fair a measure as this House could adopt. It provides for the collection of this interest as it can be collected, and if it can not be collected it provides a method by which that default can be adjusted. This is the very utmost we could hope to accomplish in the situation actually confronting us. If you attempt to go further than that you risk raising complications graver than we can now realize, and at the same time you will defeat your immediate purpose by attempting the impossible. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I had not supposed that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was in the confidence of the administration, and therefore knew fully in relation to its plans, as he has stated to the House. [Laughter.] I still have some doubt as to whether he is. At all events, I do not profess to speak with authority from the administration as to its intentions and purposes in operating under this bill, but I do believe that this administration will act under this bill for two purposes—to maintain the trade and business of the United States between us and foreign nations, and to realize as much as possible from debtor nations which are financially embarrassed.

Now, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], who has just preceded, has very well stated, there are some of these nations that at the present time are unable to pay. Gentlemen have only to look at the statement of amounts of the debts of European nations which were inserted in the RECORD some time ago to realize that some of these nations owe more than all their total wealth. I doubt whether many of those nations can pay interest at this time, and if they can not, as the gentleman from New York asked, how are we going to get it? When a debtor nation is in such a position it is folly to undertake to force collection. The only way to collect from a bankrupt is to give time for rehabilitation, and if the commission is not given power to do this we might as well have no commission. So also this power must be general. Obviously in a bill of this kind we can not specify how much time should be given each nation. It all depends on the circumstances of the case.

Gentlemen upon the other side have criticized this bill, but they never have presented any other. They have made some suggestion in the way of limitations, but they never have told this House and they never have told the committee what plan they would take.

Mr. COLLIER. They have a better law now than this bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Mississippi state what can be done under the present law? The legal advisers of the Treasury say nothing can be done.

Mr. COLLIER. I say they have a better law than this bill. But I believe in these Senate amendments, because they are, in my opinion, almost everything that we asked for and which the House refused to give. But the Senate has done it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There were good reasons given at that time on account of which we could not accept your suggestions. Under the previous administration the Treasury officials came before our committee, as stated, asking additional power, and they were forced to go without any law, and they did go without any law.

Gentlemen talk about extending the time of the interest. The previous administration, without any law, proceeded to extend the time of payment of interest for three years, and there it stands. Gentlemen say now that it is thought this will be made part of the principal. Why should it not be part of the principal? Why not, with the understanding that the previous administration gave to these foreign debtors as to what would be done with this interest at the expiration of the three years? There is but one thing to do in this situation, and that is to take it and meet it as we find it. The debt can only be collected by force of arms in some instances, and even then, if the property is not there, we can not get it. We should deal with these nations in the same manner as if we had individual debtors in a similar situation—put them on their feet, if possible, and enable them to pay these debts, and enable them to continue to do business with us. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Now, as to this bugaboo about these $5,000,000,000 of foreign indebtedness due to these bankers, who knows anything about the amounts that are due these banks? The principal amount that is due us is due on account of the great amount of agricultural products that we have sold to Europe; and this administration wants, and all the Members on this side want, to have the trade in our agricultural products continued.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can the gentleman inform the House whether or not all these nations are willing to give bonds? Are they willing to settle their debts by giving bonds?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They are willing to issue evidences of indebtedness, so far as I know, except Russia.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The records of the Treasury Department show that the Government of the United States loaned to the Kerensky government, first and last, $187,000,000 in gold, and that it was used not only by the Kerensky government, which lasted only four months, but also by the Wrangel government and by the Kolchak government—two revolutionary governments fighting people with whom we were at peace. Now, will the gentleman say how we are going to refund the $187,000,000 of obligations of the Kerensky government, a government which expired in 1917?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would suggest that the gentleman ask some of the parties who were responsible for those loans. This administration had nothing to do with them. I do not know how that can be done.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In other words, in the opinion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who is very familiar with the facts, and whose judgment we respect, that loan of $187,000,000 to the Kerensky government, on a demand note signed by Mr. Bakhmeteff, is a dead loss?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We certainly are not able to collect it at the present time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One thing more.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has control of the time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman one more minute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is the gentleman from Iowa aware that in the office of the Senate Committee on Finance is a report of facts obtained from the official records of the Treasury Department by that committee's special counsel, Don M. Hunt, which shows that $56,000,000 of the $187,000,000 loaned to the Kerensky government was in the National City Bank of New York City when the Kerensky government failed, subject to the check of Mr. Bakhmeteff?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Personally, I have no knowledge, but I have no doubt the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman make that 10 minutes?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no man so hard to please as the man who has made up his mind not to be pleased whatever happens. My friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], is just now the best example of that frame of mind. I believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] said he was not here when this bill originally passed the House, but he assumed to favor certain propositions that were made at the time; that is, we are to understand that he would have been favorable to them had he been here. He then proceeds to make the assertion that the Senate amendments which we are asked to adopt are in line with the effort then made, which failed, and therefore are just what they should be; and yet, being in a fair way to having accomplished all this through the adoption of these Senate amendments, the gentleman is just as much dissatisfied as he ever was. He is not happy, even though we do the thing which he says he would have been favorable to having done had he been here when he was away.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for these Senate amendments, but I shall not vote for them on the theory that they are wise or that they ought to be adopted if we could readily avoid it. The Secretary of the Treasury seems to have been impressed with statements that have been made to the effect that it might greatly delay the legislation if we were to go to conference after insisting on a disagreement to the Senate amendments. I think the members of the committee are also somewhat impressed with that suggestion. I have heard so many times of the difficulty in the way of getting another body to recede from an untenable position that it does not impress me as much as it once did. My own idea is that when we are quite sure we are right it is always well to go to the limit in attempting to secure legislation in the best possible form. But I am accepting the judgment of those directly responsible, and shall vote for the adoption of the Senate amendments, though I do not approve them. There are two of them that are important, and the wisdom of which is questionable. One places a limit of 25 years on the bonds that we are to accept. The other fixes a minimum interest charge of 4¼ per cent. Just now there is a form of jingoism that seems popular in some quarters with regard to this foreign debt. I am one of those who have always believed that our foreign debtors should meet their obligations to us and that we should proceed on the theory that the debt owed us by Europe is to be paid, at least, in the main. But while holding to that view always and at all times, I have not been impressed with the jingoism that loudly proclaims that we insist on payment instanter and forthwith and beyond question, with a good, round, fat interest charge. That may be popular, but it is neither sane nor sensible in my opinion. It is true that interest rates are high now, but if God is good and the world comes back to normal, the international obligations of sound Governments will not carry an interest rate of 5 per cent or 4¼ per cent for all of the next 25 years. They will eventually be lower; and I am not one of those who believe that it is consistent with the spirit of America, or that it is good business for America, to appear before the world as demanding, over a period of a quarter of a century, an interest rate higher than what is likely to be the average interest rate on sound international obligations. I do not think we shall gain anything, either in prestige or in material benefit, by assuming such an attitude; and as to some of these obligations, those referred to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and some others, we shall do exceedingly well if we ever receive even the principal of the loans made by a former administration. And we are least likely to secure the principal if in the running of the years great interest charges are piling up. Outside of Great Britain there is some question whether any of the foreign Governments indebted to us are to-day in a position to begin to pay upon their debts.

As to some of the lesser nations of Europe, we can scarcely hope or expect that they can begin to make payments immediately. Therefore, not only from the standpoint of a proper posture and attitude toward our debtors, but from the standpoint of good business, those whom we authorize to settle our foreign debts should have a free hand in the matter of fixing the time and the terms of the obligations. I object to these Senate amendments because they are hampering, because they do not give the commission the authority it ought to have to make these settlements in the way, for the time, and on the terms best calculated to enable the people who owe us to pay as speedily as possible and without feeling that they have had the heavy hand of the usurer laid upon them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman give me two minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Now it may be wise, and I am assuming from the attitude of the chairman of the committee [Mr. FORDNEY] that it is wise to agree to these amendments, because not to agree to them and to contest the point might unduly delay the legislation. So far as I am concerned I yield, but I give my vote with reluctance. I still hold to the opinion that the House in this case, as in the case of most of the legislation of this Congress, was right in its judgment and is still right.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I agree fully with what the gentleman has said. Is it the gentleman's opinion that the Treasury might have its hands so tied that we could not by subsequent legislation under a refunding act untie them?

Mr. MONDELL. Of course nothing we do now can bind a future Congress, and the probability is that by reason of the Senate amendments some future Congress will be called upon to make provision which will modify what shall be done under this legislation. We accept the situation because the gentlemen of the committee suggest to us that it is the quickest way to settle the matter.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, can a separate vote be had on amendment No. 7?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the amendment No. 7 be reported and that a separate vote be had on it at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. The other amendments will be considered in gross.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 7.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, after the word "therefor," insert:

"Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of maturity of any such bonds or obligations due the United States by any foreign Government beyond June 15, 1947, or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4½ per cent per annum: Provided further, That when the bond or other obligation of any such Government has been refunded or converted as herein provided, the authority of the commission over such refunded or converted bond or other obligation shall cease."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered.

The question is on the motion to concur in amendment No. 7 just reported.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes had it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 299, nays 27, answered "present" 2, not voting 102, as follows:

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea." I have a pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts. I withdraw that vote of yea and answer "present."

The name of Mr. COLLIER was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the several amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as there are no copies of this bill available as passed by the House and the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the bill as passed be printed in to-day's RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill referred to is as follows:

An act (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments held by the United States of America, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a World War foreign debt commission is hereby created consisting of five members, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall serve as chairman, and four of whom shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. That, subject to the approval of the President, the commission created by section 1 is hereby authorized to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now held by the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration), arising out of the World War, into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Government, in substitution for the bonds or other obligations of such Government now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of maturity of any such bonds or other obligations due the United States of America by any foreign Government beyond June 15, 1947, or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4½ per cent per annum: Provided further, That when the bond or other obligation of any such Government has been refunded or converted as herein provided the authority of the commission over such refunded or converted bond or other obligation shall cease.

SEC. 3. That this act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government, or cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof.

SEC. 4. That the authority granted by this act shall cease and determine at the end of three years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. That the annual report of this commission shall be included in the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, but said commission shall immediately transmit to the Congress copies of any refunding agreements entered into, with the approval of the President, by each foreign Government upon the completion of the authority granted under this act.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the privileged resolution submitted by me yesterday, respecting the right of Congress to fix the size and nature of the Military Establishment, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, did not the gentleman from New York withdraw the reservation yesterday?

Mr. COCKRAN. I am offering it now with this suggestion, and it is so understood by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair would ask the gentleman from New York to defer his request until the Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill H. R. 10267, making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and together with the report thereon referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10101, making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries: Municipal architect, $3,600; engineering assistant, $2,400; superintendent of construction, $2,000; chief draftsman, $1,800; draftsmen—one $1,400, one $1,300; heating, ventilating, and sanitary engineer, $2,000; superintendent of repairs, $1,800; assistant superintendent of repairs, $1,350; clerks—one $1,200, one $1,050, one $1,000, one $720; copyist, $840; driver, $600; in all, $23,060.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying that the committee has stricken from this item of the bill, under the title of "Municipal architect's office," four positions. It has stricken out the position of "boss carpenter," "boss tinner," "boss painter," and "boss steamfitter." The reason for abolishing these places was, for instance, that the position of "boss carpenter" was filled by a clerk who had perhaps never had a hatchet or a saw in his hand during his life. The positions of boss painter, boss steamfitter, and boss tinner were filled by people who knew nothing of these trades. Inasmuch as the Commissioners of the District have seen fit to fill those positions with men who knew nothing of that kind of occupation, men who were totally unfitted for the positions, we eliminated the places from the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

Salaries: Executive secretary, $3,500; accountant, $3,000; traffic engineer, $3,000; assistant accountant, $2,000; chief clerk, $1,800; statistical clerk, $1,400; inspectors—one $1,800, one $1,600, one $1,400; inspector of gas and meters, $2,000; inspector of electric meters, $1,800; assistant inspectors—one $1,200, two at $900 each; clerks—two at $1,400 each, one $1,200; messenger, $720; in all, $31,020.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Some question has arisen in the minds of a good many Members of the House as to whether there should not be a slight amendment to the title of the Public Utilities Commission. Some have thought that an apostrophe should be put after the letter "s" in the word "utilities" to indicate the possessive aspect, because it has been a question whether the title should indicate a commission to regulate public utilities or a commission to serve the purposes of the public utilities.

The transportation system of the District is abominable from every aspect. There seems to be no effort upon the part of the Public Utilities Commission to improve that condition. Outrageous rates of fare are charged. In order to baby along one of the companies rates of fare must be charged for transportation on the other line that are admittedly too high, and in the recent snow blockade as late as yesterday the papers announced that this company that is being petted and babied along by the Utilities Commission was unable even yesterday to resume service on some of its most important lines, the lines to Takoma, to Anacostia, and to some other points.

I have immediately in mind, however, a recent development touching the public services of this Utilities Commission in keeping with the tender attitude it always assumes toward the welfare of the public utilities. I have recently noted in the stormiest days of the winter, on the coldest days, that always there were in service street cars in this city with open vestibules, front and rear, so that the motormen and the conductors were exposed to the most inclement weather that Washington ever has. While much of our weather here is mild, we all know that there are many days when the weather is very severe. Even on the most severe days, the coldest, the stormiest, you will see those open vestibule cars in service upon the Washington Railway & Electric Co. lines.

To my mind that is an abomination which should not be permitted and would not be permitted in the States. I wrote a letter in December to the Public Utilities Commission asking them whether they felt they had authority by order to stop such a practice and insist upon more humane treatment of the street railway company's employees. In reply I have a letter from the commission, under date of January 3, in which the commission sets forth an act of Congress which was passed on March 3, 1905, to prevent this very thing.

Gentlemen are familiar with the fact that the most popular sport of the citizens of Washington is, whenever anything happens that is not entirely pleasant, to blame the Congress for it. If there is anything lacking in equipment it is because Congress did not appropriate the money for it. Perhaps it was never asked for, but nevertheless Congress is to blame. But here we have a case where Congress 16 years ago passed an act to end an abomination, and the companies have had 16 years in which to comply with its terms, and yet to-day this letter from the commission informs me that there are something over 200 cars in service that are not fully inclosed; that 104 cars have the front of the platform only inclosed, 96 with the front and one side of the platform inclosed, and 38 with the front platform entirely inclosed and the rear platform with the end and one side inclosed.

The act of Congress provided that these companies must "provide each car with a glass vestibule, surrounding, as nearly as possible, the place where the motorman operating his car stands, so that said motorman shall be protected from inclement weather." There may be a Negro in the fence, or there may be some vagueness about the language, but it seems pretty clear, because it says "as nearly as possible" the motorman must be surrounded, so that he will be "protected from inclement weather." Notwithstanding they quote the law which required that to be done 16 years ago, which I was asking the commission to enforce, now they come back, having referred it to the railway company to get their full defense of two pages, and quote to me the statement of Mr. Ham, president of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., in which he admits that the company uses——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAMTON. In the statement of Mr. Ham transmitted by the commission he admitted that they are operating numbers of these cars that are not vestibuled, but the excuse is made that they are only operated during the rush hours. Well, I have made inquiry about this from only one of the street car employees. I rode on such a car the other day, and I asked the conductor whether they operated those during only the rush hours, and he said the car he was on then was out 11 hours that day, one of these stormy days, and the employees were out in that kind of weather, and the only time they are not operated is a little while at noon, when the least damage is done to operate them. Mr. Ham further says in his letter that "We do not feel that the men assigned to these cars during the very short rush periods are subject to undue hardship."

The car is taken out at daybreak and it is used in the harshest weather at that time of day, and again at night, so during the coldest periods these cars are operated, and still Mr. Ham in his swivel chair and steam-heated office thinks there is no undue hardship. What is the duty of this Public Utilities Commission? Are they there to enforce the laws of the Nation intrusted to them to enforce, or are they the apologists of the street car companies for their failure to observe the law? May they at will suspend or repeal acts of Congress? They state the law and say:

In view of the large amount of money involved in entirely inclosing the platforms of the 238 cars referred to above, as indicated in the inclosed copy of a letter from the president of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., and in view also of the proposed remodeling of some of these cars into a more modern type—

Sixteen years proposing, and still simply proposing—the commission believe it is inadvisable to require the company to make this larger capital outlay at this time.

How much would it cost to put doors upon these cars, surrounding these platforms so that the men operating them would be protected in a fair degree from the inclement weather? It does not seem to me it would cost very much compared with the suffering now caused the motormen, and in charging 8 cents fare the company can afford to do it. But, in any event, Congress has passed the law and it is the business of this Public Utilities Commission to enforce that law and not to respond to us that they "do not think it is advisable" to enforce the law. With evidence of that kind multiplied by every occasion when the public comes in contact with the Public Utilities Commission I do not believe that we would be far wrong if we were to amend its title and put a possessive apostrophe following the words "Public Utilities," to read "Public Utilities' Commission." [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I agree fully with the gentleman that the law ought to be observed, observed by everybody, by the President of the United States, by Congress, not only the statute laws but the Constitution, by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia and all other governmental agencies and officials. If there has been any failure by the commission, all of whose members are appointees of President Harding, to observed any law, why the commission is subject to criticism. I for one am not inclined to be unduly critical in this day of confusion and difficulty, when there is such a general tendency to criticize, and I certainly do not mean to be unduly critical of this body of which I have the honor to be a Member. But the gentleman has called attention to the railway situation here and to the opinion of the commission that some of the companies are subjected to great financial pressure. This seems to point to the need for legislation in order to enable the street railways to function properly. Now, I ask attention of the gentlemen to the fact that while we have legislated with regard to the steam railways of the country with a great deal of promptness and with considerable liberality, we have failed to legislate with regard to the local street railways. That matter has been agitated——

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not because they brought a bill in here which practically relieved them from taxation, and is not that the reason they did not get any legislation?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Well, I do not know why the failure has continued since that bill was disposed of.

Mr. FOCHT. If the gentleman will yield, is it not a fact that one of the best reputed business men in this section of the country is one of the members of the District Committee?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Certainly he is; and I am not arraigning any committee or any individual.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The point involved here is where Congress did legislate, and the commission charged with the duty of enforcing the law fails and refuses to act.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I agreed a while ago that the law should be executed by those who are charged with the execution. But I passed on to the other point, that it is the admission that railway legislation is necessary and that we do not legislate, as has been stated. A bill was brought in some time ago and was recommitted, and months have elapsed and no other bill has been brought in. Now, whose fault is that? I am not preferring any charge against the distinguished gentlemen who compose the District Committee. But it has not been done. That is the fact. And the further fact is that it ought to be done.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Why should the District behold the mote that is in our eye and not the beam in its own? This District likes to criticize Congress all the while for things it does not do. But we will somewhat paraphrase that by saying or suggesting that the District ought to shovel the snow off from its own sidewalks before it tries to dig us out of our troubles.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman, who is a man of judgment and fairness, that I do not think, to be entirely candid, that the District is quite as critical of Congress as Congress is of the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. We very rarely lose any opportunity to level criticism at the conduct of affairs in the District. There is naturally countercriticism. But the point I am trying to emphasize now is that when we talk about the local railway situation it is a matter that is up to us to deal with; it is a matter that we have got to deal with by legislation, and we will not have a satisfactory condition until we do it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I had no intention of getting onto this very delicate subject, and more or less hesitate to venture upon it now.

I never have taken the floor to make any criticism of the District, and I am not in that censorious mood at the present time. I realize that the psychology—to use a much abused expression—of a community that "hangs on princes' favors," as the District of Columbia does on the Federal Government, is a somewhat abstruse one anyway, and is not likely to be analyzed by laymen very particularly. I know the present situation only represents the inevitable consequence to people who "inure" themselves after generation and generation of practice to depend on somebody else to do for them the things they ought to do for themselves.

There is a continual complaint going up from the District all the time that Congress ignores it, and is unfair, unjust, and even parsimonious in its appropriations for it. That is the only reason I ventured the very facetious suggestion in the remarks of my friend about the snow. In almost every community I ever saw the people would either have such a desire to realize their own self-respect or else to keep their feet dry, or maybe to do both, that they would shovel the snow off their own sidewalks. I cite that as a remarkable example of what a century or more of dependence on the Federal Government may do for folks. Now, they do not want even to do that. I dare say they want a congressional commission to do it for them. So it goes.

And I wish to be considered seriously when I say that the problem of Government in a district like this can not be compared on all fours with that in a self-governing community. We ought not to be too censorious and ought not to be mean in our criticism. But I do think that instances of that kind tend to exasperate popular opinion, as we see it expressed in this Chamber. I think there is a good deal in these newspaper views on Congress as to its attitude toward the District of Columbia that is wholly unjustified. Men are here from States that are self-supporting, and they find these examples of the wretched helplessness and shiftlessness, of dependency on political caprice, and constant watchfulness for hand-outs.

We all know that about this time will begin the annual tirade in the newspapers of the District that the business of Congress is so important that we can not take time to go home about June 1. I sometimes think that the District newspapers are rather more or less run in the interests of the boarding-house people here than in the interests of the country. That may be a bit unfair, perhaps, but it is a hint on the right track.

I have a great respect for most of the people of this District. As for the others, they have not asked me for my opinion. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Page 9, line 6, strike out "$3,500" and insert "$4,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FAIRFIELD: Page 9, line 6, strike out "$3,500," and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, after the castigation of the Civil Service Commission, I am not sure but that I may add fuel to the fire. I have no personal interest in this matter. I am doing this only as what I think is a matter of fairness to the individual who is involved.

Under the reclassification, under Part IV, covering professional services, this particular profession is given a rating of $4,000 per year. I understand that the gentleman who is occupying the position is a graduate of the University of California, and that for 15 years he was an electrical engineer, and that for six or seven years he has been connected with the Public Utilities Commission. In 1920 the salaries were paid from a lump sum, and in 1920 the salary of this gentleman was placed at $4,000. This year it has been reduced to $3,500.

I do not know whether the Utilities Commission is functioning as it ought to function, but I am thoroughly convinced that the position of executive secretary for the commission, if the work is efficiently done, would be important to every man, woman, and child in the District, and that $4,000 is not at all an exorbitant salary for a man holding that position. I understand that the Commissioners of the District were favorable to the retention of the salary as it has been carried ever since the commission was organized. That it was urged upon the part of the Public Utilities Commission, to be sure, might be taken as a matter of course. I simply bring the matter before you, feeling that while men of that kind have no particular Representative here, because they lose their citizenship in the States, it is but fair that a drop at least of $500 in the salary of a man holding that position, which if the work is efficiently conducted is not too great a salary, should not be made without full consideration.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question before he sits down?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I will.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is not the only official of the District of Columbia whose salary has been cut by the committee reporting this bill?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I think not. There were two others at least.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. There were three others.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. There were three others, all told. There was no objection to the cutting of the other two. One of them was cut upon the recommendation of the commissioners. Am I right about that?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I believe so.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. But there was a protest against the cutting of the salary of this man, who, they say, is a very high-grade man, thoroughly efficient, with long years of service to his credit, and who suddenly now, after those long years, finds that he has been dropped $500 on his salary. With me it is only a matter of giving a man a hearing before the committee. I have no personal interest in the matter, and, as I said before, it may be that the Utilities Commission is worthless. If that is true, it should be abolished. But if it is to do the work that it ought to do, that salary is not too great for the man who ought to be the dynamo in the commission to see that the law is enforced. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order I made, so that it will not be subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky in that regard if the current salary is $3,000 or $4,000?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is $4,000. It is not subject to a point of order. This salary was cut by the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota rise in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Emphatically.

This salary was cut by the Budget. I did not know that the commissioners were for it or against it. It was not a question of dispute. But I wish to say this: I do not question but that this man performs his duties all right, but I do question the amount of duties that he has to perform. And in that connection I will say that the general secretary to the commissioners themselves, who I think performs more labor than this man does, gets only $2,700 a year. This is an exceptional case in which a man has been getting a large salary because he was put on there for the Utilities Commission. I certainly object to the raising of his salary. In fact, I do not think he is earning as much money as is the general secretary to the commissioners at $2,700 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I think in reference to this amendment that, of course, we certainly ought to have some very definite or clear evidence before we raise the salary of this official above the recommendation of the Budget Bureau and over the objection of the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota], who has just spoken to us. But while I have never injected myself into District of Columbia matters I do want to say just a little along the line spoken of by my friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON]. It does seem a strange thing that the United States, which is able to enforce its laws in all parts of the Union, in the remotest sections of the country, can not enforce its laws here in the District of Columbia. I understand from the current newspapers that one of the street car companies was able to earn over 10 per cent on its capital investment, the capitalization being at least as high as it ought to be for its assets.

Now, it seems to me that a company that earns over 10 per cent in these days and times on its capital investment would be able to put doors in its cars for the protection of its operators. It is strange that any kind of public utility commission can find an excuse for not compelling this company to obey a law that has been 16 years on the statute books, especially the excuse that it would be a pecuniary hardship.

Another matter: I have been here now some 14 or 15 years, and my recollection is that when I first came here Congress was trying to secure universal transfers, and we have never done it yet, and we do not seem to know how to handle the street car railway systems of the District of Columbia. If we pass a law which they do not like, they will not obey it unless they see proper so to do, and then we can not pass a law that is unsatisfactory to them. Some reference has been made to the fact that Congress refused the other day to pass a bill affecting the street car companies. I voted against that bill, that was brought in here this term, and I will do it again, because it not only gave no relief from the evils we complain of but it seemed intended still further to relieve the street car systems of this city from the burdens properly placed upon them. They were relieved of an expense that they ought to pay; and that seemed to me to be the biggest thing in the bill. But I think it is time that Congress should rouse itself not only to pass laws compelling equity and justice and fair charges to the citizens here but to see to it that the laws passed are enforced with reference to the street car companies. I spoke of one of these companies earning over 10 per cent. I do not know about the other company, but I understand the reason for not enforcing the 5-cent fare or the universal transfer is that, although one company would prosper, the other would suffer losses from lack of business. I go from here to Dupont Circle on the Mount Pleasant road, which is said to be the road that can not stand fare reduction, and if that company is not earning a dividend and would not earn a dividend on 5-cent fares upon its real investment, then I do not know how patronage could enable a company to earn a dividend.

These cars are crowded night and morning until you can not get on or off, and the conductors frequently have friction with the passengers. There is an amount of travel on that road that ought to make it earn on a 5-cent fare a good income on every dollar that is really invested. I say the time has come when Congress ought to see to it that the citizens of this town have universal transfers and that the laws passed by this Congress be obeyed by the public functionaries, the Public Utilities Commission, and by the railroads that seem to own this city so far as doing as they please is concerned. I do not like to criticize.

This is the first time, as far as I remember, that I have injected my remarks into the discussion of this subject, but I do think that the time has come for Congress to assert itself and have its commands obeyed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental and all other general necessary expenses authorized by law, including the employment of expert services where necessary, $8,000.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if this provision is not made to take care of the three experts who were discharged because they did not know anything about their business? If that is the purpose of it, I think this paragraph should be stricken out. I will ask the chairman of the committee what is the necessity for this paragraph?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This paragraph is usually carried in this bill and is for the purpose of covering everything that they could not get a distinct subhead for.

Mr. DOWELL. Should not the paragraph be stricken out and the commissioners held to what is actually needed as provided in the other paragraphs?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This is pretty well guarded. It says:

For incidental and all other general necessary expenses authorized by law, including the employment of expert services where necessary, $8,000.

If that was not in there they might use $18,000. We have cut them down. This bill has been trimmed a little bit and we have fixed this as close as we dare, and as close as economy will permit.

Mr. DOWELL. According to the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] the experts do not know anything about the business for which they are employed, and I am just wondering if these experts provided for in this paragraph are of the character described by the gentleman from Kentucky? If there is no reason for the expenditure of this money, and it is purely for the purpose of putting on a limitation, why not limit it to less than $8,000?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will read the gentleman what the law is on the subject:

The commission is hereby authorized, within the appropriation made by Congress, to incur and pay incidental expenses for postage, printing, blanks, books, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, stationery, binding, rebinding, repairing and preservation of records, desks, office furniture and supplies, traveling expenses of the commission, the commissioners, and every officer, agent, and employee thereof, and all other general expenses reasonably necessary to be incurred in carrying out the purposes of this section.

The gentleman will see that that covers a great many probable expenses, and your committee thought $8,000 would be neither excessive nor too little, so we settled on this amount of $8,000.

Mr. DOWELL. And this was for the purpose of limiting the commission rather than for the purpose of giving them additional authority?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think the commissioners asked for a little more money than this, but your committee decided to give them only $8,000.

Mr. DOWELL. I move to strike out the words in line 14, page 9, "including the employment of expert services when necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: On page 9, line 14, after the word "law," strike out "including the employment of expert services when necessary."

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I really think that after the committee has investigated this as it has, we ought not at this time to cut out a matter of this kind, and I think in all sincerity that the motion of the gentleman ought not to prevail. I appreciate his motive, why he has done it, and everything of that kind, and ordinarily it would be all right, but in this case I think $8,000 is not too much. Therefore I oppose the amendment.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the statute just read by the gentleman included entirely different matter than the expert services, and it seems to me we ought to dispense with some of these expenditures. The amount for stationery and things of that character should be allowed. There is no question about that. But from the statement of the chairman that this is merely a limitation on the things that are authorized by law, it seems to me we ought not to include expert services, after the testimony here that they had discharged three who absolutely knew nothing of their business, who were employed as experts.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will read a further line from the same law.

Mr. DOWELL. Whatever it may be, I am trying to strike out the employment of experts any further than they have been provided for in the preceding paragraphs.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It says further in the law—

And to employ any assistance—

Which would include expert services.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa this question: They have an accountant, an assistant accountant, and a statistical clerk, as well as a chief clerk. Can you imagine why they should need any expert services?

Mr. DOWELL. My private opinion is that they do not need anything more than they have in the paragraph above, and if this amount is placed in the bill they will expend it. I think we ought to save every dollar we can here. The chairman of the committee has not shown that there is any reason whatever for this expenditure, and I think we ought at least to cut out the experts, who seem to come high, and, according to the testimony before us, are of but little account.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It was necessary for me to step out of the Chamber a few moments, and in consequence I missed part of what has just been said; but, taking up the thread of the discussion during the last few moments, I feel that I should say that all along I have been in sympathy with the motion which has just been made. The item which it is proposed to strike out is "including the employment of expert services."

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman from Iowa moves to strike out the whole paragraph.

Mr. DOWELL. No; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 14, strike out the words "including the employment of expert services where necessary."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then I correctly understood that that was the language proposed to be stricken out. When this commission was valuing the street railway property they employed a man to aid them in that work; and, at another time, they employed an expert to advise them as to facilitating or expediting the transit of the cars. I think the principal advice he gave them was that the street cars should jump every other square in making their stops.

For a long time they paid him $100 a day, and when he was not at work for them at $100 a day he was at work for the Interstate Commerce Commission at $50 a day. I was not able then, and am not able now, to see why he could work for a nation-wide commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, on much more expensive and important work for $50 a day and at the same time this District of Columbia commission should see fit to find an excuse to pay him $100 a day for this work which of necessity has been of less importance.

But, more than that, out of this $8,000 is to come a fee of $5,000 which, for personal reasons, I would be very much gratified, indeed, to see paid; but from the standpoint of an official, seeking always to do his duty, I feel constrained to say that it should not be paid. In other words, when this commission was created the corporation counsel for the District of Columbia had his salary increased $1,000 a year in order to serve the Public Utilities Commission. When the Public Utilities Commission became involved in litigation with the street car companies, and with the gas and electric light companies, the then corporation counsel resigned his position, which, I think, paid a salary of $4,500 a year, and instantly was given a $5,000 fee to represent the commission in court before which these questions were then pending. It was my judgment, upon reading the law, that the payment was unauthorized. In the hearings I asked the Utilities Commission to furnish the provision of law which authorized the expenditure of $5,000. They did furnish what they said was their authorization, but there can be no question that that was not an authorization for the expenditure of that money.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The next day the auditor for the District of Columbia, who was present with the Utilities Commission, read aloud from the far end of the table at which the committee was sitting another part of the law which he thought authorized this employment. I misunderstood its reading for the moment, as no doubt the hearings will show, and I expressed the opinion that what he read was authority for the employment. However, afterwards I read the language which had been read aloud to me, and I found that I had not heard distinctly some of the words, and I reached the conclusion that there was no authorization for that employment. The employment for that one year did not stop, and the litigation is hanging in the courts now, so that if my memory serves me correctly the second sum of $5,000 has been paid, and now it is contemplated to pay an additional $5,000, when already the salary of the corporation counsel has been raised $1,000 a year to meet the very contingency about which we are now speaking.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does the $8,000 item include the prospective fee which the gentleman is speaking of?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The $8,000 item includes the $5,000 to this special attorney of whom I was just speaking.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I want to say to my friend, in whom I have a great deal of confidence, that it does seem to me, in view of the enormous importance of the litigation pending and in view of the fact that Mr. Syme has grown up with it and is the only lawyer on the Government side familiar with it, it would be rather unfortunate not to continue his services.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think it more unfortunate that his services were not continued as corporation counsel. He grew up with the work in the office in the District of Columbia; it would look far better if he had remained at a salary of $4,500 rather than to resign for the purpose of getting a larger fee, not only for one but for three or four years, and we do not see the end yet.

Now, as an additional reply to the gentleman from Virginia, I want to say that it is my judgment that Congress had better enact legislation for the employment of legislative counsel rather than undertake to do it through an appropriation bill that has no legislative jurisdiction. The language used is not subject to a point of order, because under that language they would have the right to employ a $100-a-day man to advise them of the "skip-stop" plan, or stopping at every other corner instead of every corner. I do not believe the Comptroller of the Treasury would say, if the question were put to him, that this language authorized the employment under expert service of additional counsel. Therefore I thoroughly agree with the gentleman that the item ought to be stricken from this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota) there were—ayes 16, noes 14.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number, and tellers are denied.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 9, line 15, by striking out "$8,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Page 9, line 15, strike out "$8,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] that $5,000 of this $8,000 is to be expended for special counsel, and that $3,000 is all that is necessary for incidental expenses referred to by the chairman of the committee, it seems to me there is no excuse whatever for leaving the $8,000 in this item, and I think we ought to start right now to cut these items. I am surprised that the committee did not tell us frankly what the $8,000 was for. In view of the revelation made by the gentleman from Kentucky there is no excuse whatever for leaving the $8,000 in the item.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I would say to the gentleman that the Budget authorized $12,000.

Mr. DOWELL. I do not know what the Budget provided, but it is a poor reason for the committee to come before the House and submit an item of $8,000 simply because the Budget did not cut it less than $12,000. If the statements made to-day are correct, the committee should have reduced it to $3,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I would state to the gentleman that there will be an attorney employed just the same, because they have some cases now that are going to last a year or two, and the same attorney will be employed. He has to be employed, because there is no one else to take his place.

Mr. DOWELL. Permit me to say that if an attorney is to be employed, he should be employed in such a way that we may know where the money is being expended and not in this indirect way provided in this paragraph.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They have already engaged him to carry those cases through.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I propose, if possible, to digress from this acrimonious discussion for just a moment to call attention to the insertion in the RECORD of yesterday on page 2321 of a statement taken from a pamphlet issued by the American Exchange National Bank of New York. The matter to which I refer was inserted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. I call the attention of those of you who have had this circular on your desks to the fact that in reading it over the gentleman saw the words "This is a strange world," and that then he discovered following that what appears to be an article entitled "Artificial economics," and what he thought was a specious argument in favor of free trade. At the time he asked that this be put into the RECORD I wondered why he did not hand it in at the desk and have it printed, but instead he read the portion that he wanted inserted. On examination I find that he read only a part of the paragraph, just so much of the subject matter of the article as seemed to apply to what was in his mind. At the sentence commencing "As a practical matter," he balked, for he had been quoting Democratic theory thus far, and in discussing tariff the word "practical" never appeals to a Democrat. So the gentleman from Tennessee finished as follows:

> Protective tariffs mean that this obstruction to coordination will be enlarged and that when the world finally comes to consider coordination, if it ever does, it will find its difficulties even greater than they are now.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there are six more lines in the paragraph that seem to me give an entirely different view as to protective tariff, and especially apply to the delay in the Senate's action on a tariff bill. I quote:

> As a practical matter, the business world is more interested in getting the protective measures established than in their forms. So far as this country is concerned, it is evident that some of the fancied advantages of tariffs are to be nullified by conflicting provisions, but anything is better than uncertainty, and if the legislators will only agree upon some measure or other they will deserve the gratitude of the country for that much at least.

That is the point I want to make; let the Senate agree on some definite plan of valuation and pass the tariff bill. This Congress is the public utilities commission for this great country of ours. The people sitting at home are not so much concerned about this $5,000 that is being saved here on this District of Columbia appropriation bill. What John Brown and Jim Jones and their wives are wondering about is where a ton of coal is going to come from this week, where the shoes for the children are coming from next week, where the new bag of flour is coming from, and how long the mill is to remain shut down and the family pocketbook empty. The Fordney tariff bill is in the Senate ice box, and the shelves of the stores from San Francisco to New York are filled to overflowing with the products that are made in Europe and in the oriental lands, by the cheapest labor in the world, while our men and women are out of employment.

The emergency tariff bill has been functioning long enough to show that it was an advantageous measure. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE] sitting over there I saw yesterday with a broad smile upon his face. He told me that he was feeling good, because he had received 75 cents a hundred more for his No. 2 cattle than he had expected and that they weighed 75 pounds a head more than he guessed they would. I reckon that the extra 75 cents in price was due to slightly improved business conditions and the 75 pounds they had added in weight was due to their being contented cattle, because a Republican administration has given them the emergency tariff bill. [Laughter and applause.]

Gentlemen, I want to say to you that it is necessary that some action be taken to hasten tariff legislation in the Senate. The emergency tariff bill has been functioning long enough to show that it has been beneficial to the wool industry of the country, and it has helped tremendously the dairy products of the country, as well as the grain industry; but this bill was designed as a temporary measure. What we need is a real protective tariff. Waiting has been termed the "essence of wisdom," and if this is so, then the Senate deserves to be acknowledged as wiser than Solomon and all the sages of his generation.

The people of this country expressed their faith in our party in 1920. Let us keep the faith. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I merely desired to get permission to interrupt the gentleman to ask a question, but his time expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

STREET CLEANING DIVISION.

Salaries: Superintendent, $3,000; assistant superintendent, $1,800; chief clerk, $1,400; stenographer and clerk, $1,000; clerks—2 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,100, 1 $1,000, 2 at $720 each; chief inspector, $1,300; inspectors—4 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,100 each; foreman of repairs, $1,200; foremen—1 $1,300, 4 at $1,200 each, 8 at $1,100 each, 1 $1,000, one $900; assistant foremen—3 at $900 each; 2 at $720 each; messenger and driver, $600; in all, $44,180.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if we have such a department in the District at the present time?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. What, the department of insurance?

Mr. DOWELL. Street cleaning. Is there such a department now in the government of the city of Washington?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Well, I understand they have.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman know anything about this department?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Do I know anything about it?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman want me to give my opinion from what I see going on or from what I read in the newspapers?

Mr. DOWELL. I want to know the duties of this department and whether or not this department is functioning?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The duties are to clean the streets. Now, the gentleman can judge whether it is being done or not. I want to say this: I have heard intimations have gone forth that Congress is not giving them money enough and they can not do it. The day the snow first fell they had $174,000, and they have not used any considerable portion of it up yet. They have been promised by the chairman of this grand Committee on Appropriations, and I joined in, that if they would clean the streets, we would see they got some more money. Then I have heard intimations given out that they can not get the men to work; that they can not get the employees who will go out and work. Last evening, or yesterday rather, I got positive information that the United States Employment Agency down here said they had from one to three hundred men to go to work on these streets and they were all rejected, for what reason I know not.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the matter with this department that it does not function?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I can not tell you, sir. And no investigation I am able to make will tell you.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to move to strike out the paragraph because I believe this is one of the necessary departments of this government here.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think so.

Mr. DOWELL. But it does seem to me that this committee ought to find out and ought to know, in view of what has transpired here in the past few days, what is the matter with this department and why it does not even make some effort to function?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield in order to enable me to ask a question?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. The proposition has been put forth in the newspapers that they are only paying 20 cents an hour, and they were not getting the men to shovel snow.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not know except what I see from the newspapers, and I do not always believe all of that, but my information is that from one to three hundred men were ready and they were so notified by the United States Employment Bureau and they were rejected. I do not know why.

Mr. EVANS. The wages, I understand, for the gentleman's information, are fixed by a commission.

Mr. DOWELL. What commission?

Mr. EVANS. A commission that is appointed for that purpose to fix the wages here in the District of Columbia, and the wages were fixed here at $2.80 per day of eight hours.

Mr. DOWELL. And that is the reason they are not employed?

Mr. EVANS. I can not tell you the reason they are not other than what is stated in the newspapers.

Mr. DOWELL. It seems to me there should be some effort by some one to see that this department functions. Apparently no one has been trying to do anything. I am not blaming the committee, but when we are appropriating $44,000, and we know it is not being expended for any purpose resulting in good to the community, we ought to make some further inquiry, and I am suggesting to the committee that before any further money is expended this department of the city should be required in some way to show some action.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman we had a rather exhaustive examination of the street cleaning department. That was done some two or three weeks or more ago, and we completed it before this present avalanche of snow came on the ground. I do not say we would have increased the appropriation any if we knew the snow was coming, but I know we gave them all that we thought was necessary in the opinion of the committee, and I think the street cleaning department were satisfied with it. We did not give any too much, I think, but we gave them a proper sum. Of course, this snow has come on and they will have to use more money, and I for one am willing to give more money if they show that they properly use it, but as to whether officers are performing their duties properly I can not tell you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLOUSE. I would just like to know, as I am somewhat interested in this matter, if the chairman of the committee can tell us just why this department needs 7 inspectors and 14 foremen, if their duties are no greater than they appear to have been in the last week or 10 days?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does not the gentleman realize that the city has to be cleaned all during the year and not only when it is snowing?

Mr. CLOUSE. I realize that, and I realize that the streets need to be cleaned most of all at a time like that which we are passing through. In traveling about in the city of Washington for the past few days I have seen no work on the streets except on Pennsylvania Avenue, no sidewalks opened, but with the snow packed and frozen tight on the main residential streets of this city. I think what ought to be done—and I am just handing this out as a suggestion—is that we ought to provide for fewer inspectors and less foremen and get somebody in the department that will do a little work. With $44,180 appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States to pay no one except the superintendent, his assistant, chief clerk, and a stenographer or two, 7 inspectors and 14 foremen, I believe if we would provide for these men to get picks and shovels and go down and dig snow and sweep the streets, rather than to sit in an office with stiff collars and official titles, we would probably be in better shape.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will listen for a moment.

Mr. CLOUSE. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Of course, the section you have been referring to, on page 9, called the "Street-cleaning division," is made up of salaries amounting to $44,180. If you will turn to page 26 of the bill you will find what all of these inspectors and employees do. They attend to all the dust prevention, cleaning, and snow removal, and if you will go down still further you will see disposal of city refuse. Then go down still further and it takes in trees and parkings. And on the next page you will find that some of these people have to do with the bathing beach and playgrounds. And then there are other things. In fact, this little list here—I call it a little list—is a pretty small list of people to look after all these proceedings.

Mr. CLOUSE. I figure it to be approximatey $1,170,000, but nothing done to show for it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am trying to get the items of that. I see that $1,369,000 is spent altogether for streets, a matter the duties of which are chiefly performed by this $44,000 list.

Mr. CLOUSE. What I say, then, is if they have the appropriation that has been made and the balance unexpended, as the chairman of the committee has stated, what we need to-day is to clean out the official end of the street-cleaning department and put some one down there that will spend the money that is appropriated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the pro forma amendment to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Right in connection with that——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would rather the gentleman should be recognized in his own time.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I want only a minute. In connection with that I wish to inform the gentleman of this. I made a memorandum here, from which I would like to quote: Assessment and permit work, $225,000; paving new streets, $113,600; streets, avenues, and alleys, repairs, $431,250; sidewalks and curbs around public reservations, $15,000; dust prevention, cleaning, and snow removal, $350,000; repairs to suburban roads, $200,000; grading alleys and roads, $231,000; or, in other words, $1,565,850. Whether this $1,565,850 is enough to take care of the streets that is for this Congress to determine.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Under the item of street cleaning, however, your committee cut the appropriation $25,000 below that of last year and $50,000 below that which the commissioners asked for.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I wanted to say something on that. However, it is within my knowledge for estimates to come before our committee and where they have said, "We make them large, because we know you are going to cut them."

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman stated the amount in this bill is $350,000 for cleaning snow.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is in the 1923 bill, the one now before you. That is for cleaning snow, and so forth.

Mr. DOWELL. How much is in the bill of 1922, the one under which we are acting now?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars.

Mr. DOWELL. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not this the first snow we have had?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Well, no; it is not the first snow we have had.

Mr. DOWELL. This year?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No. We have had other snows.

Mr. DOWELL. This appropriation commenced last July and is running until next July. Is not this the first snow we have had that required any of the appropriation?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. You are talking about the current appropriation?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That was $375,000.

Mr. DOWELL. And I am saying this is the first snow.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Of any very great depth; yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Has this fund been exhausted?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I said in my opening statement that the day before this snow fell, or the day it began falling, we had a balance in the Treasury of $174,000 for them to take care of this emergency.

Mr. DOWELL. But what I am inquiring about is, if there is $375,000 for the clearing of snow, and this is the first snowstorm of this year, how did this fund become in any part exhausted before the snow fell?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It was for dust prevention also.

Mr. DOWELL. Oh, they used the other part for taking dust off the street?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes. It is for the prevention of dust and the removal of snow.

Mr. DOWELL. How much has been expended for the removal of snow?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am not the auditor for the District, and I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman think that some of the money spent for taking dust off the streets ought to have been saved and used to take care of a condition that has been very awkward to some of us in the last few days?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If I had known that the snow was going to fall as it did, I believe I would have sent a special messenger down there suggesting to them that they save their money and not take up so much dust and use the money for the removal of snow.

Mr. DOWELL. But they had this fund down there before the snow began of $175,000?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; they had it the day it began to snow.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I believe that it will be accepted that I am not too stingy with criticism of the management of the District of Columbia affairs; but I do believe that the present criticism of the street cleaning department is unjustified, if it be borne in mind that the present snowfall is perhaps the greatest that has ever fallen here since the location of the National Capitol, and since it is reasonably certain that it will not occur again in the lifetime of any of us. It may be compared, I think, to the San Francisco earthquake. The people of the city of San Francisco were not prepared to meet that catastrophe any more than the street cleaning department of the District of Columbia is prepared to meet this situation.

Then another thing must be borne in mind, that the lodging house for the unemployed down here is a most comfortable place, indeed, and in addition to that it must be borne in mind that the laboring population of the District of Columbia is largely made up of colored labor, and anybody who knows as much about that character of labor as I do will readily agree with me that they are not quick to go out into the snow. They will work, and work hard in hot weather, but they like the fireside when the weather is cold, and a few cents more or even an appreciable addition to a day's pay does not appeal to them.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman think it is entirely unfair to limit that to the colored people?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will bear fully in mind what I have just stated, he will recall that I spoke of the inviting lodging house here, where many of the white idle go rather than work. They go there and seek charity when half of them are not entitled to it, and these other people go home because they are not constitutionally built to stand severe weather, and you can not entice them out into it.

But I do believe there is one criticism in this connection that is just, which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE] referred to in an indirect way, and that is that the system is top-heavy. There is no department of the government of the District of Columbia that is not top-heavy. Take the schools, for example. Every school-teacher, if she knows she will not be told on for making the statement, will tell you that the schools are top-heavy in the way of principals. Every branch of this local government is top-heavy, and this particular branch is. They have too many officers. They have plenty of money.

Now, I recall that a number of times I have seen men going about the streets marking the "goose nests," I think they are called, little round holes that come in the pavement, made by automobiles. It always takes two men and sometimes three to draw a chalk mark around those holes, so that when the repair outfit comes along they will see the holes marked and know that they are to be repaired. One man will take a piece of chalk and draw one-third of a circle around it and the next will draw the next third and the third man will complete the circle, when any ordinary man with a piece of chalk in his hand can in a moment draw the ring entirely around it himself. But they are the supervisors or the inspectors of streets. That is where the fault lies.

But this city, located in the climate in which it is, is not now, can not be, and never will be provided to meet such an emergency as we are in now, because if the appropriation is made year after year to remove a volume of snow such as we now have, that money will be wasted, because it will stand appropriated and will be available. It will be wasted, and in my judgment it will be better to accept the situation, horribly bad as it is, rather than to continue through many, many years to make an appropriation to meet a condition that perhaps will never come again. But the department has the money now available for the purpose of cleaning streets, and that money can be used for the purpose of cleaning off the snow. But in justice to the department, and in justice to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, I do not believe that they can get it done. I do not believe that the working force is here to do it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I must give expression to my agreement with the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], who was my predecessor as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and who is probably more familiar with the actual practical government of this District than any other individual on the floor and whose knowledge probably extends as far as that of any commissioner, because he was chairman of the District Committee longer than any member of the present commission has been in office.

It is well enough for some gentlemen who come from the land of the oriole, where they hear the mocking bird forever singing, to talk about cleaning the snow from the streets. But I live just 200 miles directly north from this great city and know something about the snow as it falls in the wintertime and continues to remain on the streets, and while our sidewalks are made passable we are glad to have the snow on the streets for three months of the year. Now, this is a most extraordinary occasion. At only one previous time that I can remember have we had anything like this great snowfall in the District of Columbia, and that was on the day on which President Taft was inaugurated. The heavy snowfall has caused a great deal of inconvenience for the moment, but I am reminded of what Senator Penrose once said when we were on our way from Harrisburg to Pittsburgh in an automobile. It commenced to rain, and some of the gentlemen guests complained about the rain. Senator Penrose said, "What are you complaining about? It is going to rain some time, and you are going to be somewhere when it rains. It is raining now, and here we are. Quit your growling." And so it is with the snowstorms that come. You can not control them, and if we are a little patient, as well we may be in all the events of life, something more powerful than we administers the remedy, and here it comes, and the glory of the sunshine takes away all the cause for complaint. You really have not had time to complain. You did not get in yesterday in time to offer your complaints. You waited until it was too late and until the sun had melted the snow, and it has gone out to the salted sea, to be returned again in the pure snow of the winter and the gentle rain of the spring.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Now, what is it? Has the gentleman any more complaints about the appropriations for these poor fellows who work for the District of Columbia?

Mr. DOWELL. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this snow will be cleared away by the sunshine.

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. But it does not cost the taxpayers $375,000 when it is done in that way.

Mr. FOCHT. I am not complaining or making any observations concerning the appropriation, because I will say in all candor that when it comes to paying a fair wage to men for cleaning the streets or for working on the farm or in the factory, or working for the Government in a public capacity anywhere, in all the years of my public service I have voted when advisable for increased employees and increased salaries, and the last time I ran for this office I had a larger majority than I ever had before in my life.

I do not believe in being a demagogue or in being niggardly about salaries. If people earn them, and if we need the men or women, let us vote for the appropriation and nobody will criticize it. Now, the gentleman from Iowa is a judge, and he must well remember the decision of the Supreme Court in regard to cleaning snow from sidewalks in the District of Columbia. That may have something to do with the indifference of the people here in regard to removing the snow. The decision of the court was that these sidewalks belong to the Government. Nevertheless, I thoroughly agree that with all the civic organizations there are in this city, the Monday Evening Club, and the Northeastern Club, and the Northwestern Association, and the Georgetown Association, and the Southeastern Association, and the Central Union Association, there ought to be enough civic pride to meet all contingencies like this without having any debate on the floor of the House, in the Capitol of our great Nation, and that it ought not to be necessary for the Senate to pass the bill that it passed yesterday, which will be considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House tomorrow and reported favorably, compelling citizens under penalty to remove the snow from the sidewalks. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. I am interested in the decision of the Supreme Court. Has not the Supreme Court held that a citizen can not be compelled to remove the snow from the sidewalk in front of his house?

Mr. FOCHT. I rather think the Supreme Court has so held.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Do I understand the bill which is now contemplated is different from the one which the Supreme Court held was not enforcible because the sidewalks are the property of the Government?

Mr. FOCHT. I think this bill becomes really an ordinance of the town council, which Congress is in its relationship to the District of Columbia, and in this bill we propose to compel them to remove the snow or submit to a fine which will be assessed against their property.

Mr. STEVENSON. Suppose a man has no property?

Mr. FOCHT. The property will be there.

Mr. STEVENSON. Suppose a man rents the house he lives in?

Mr. FOCHT. The day before yesterday I heard some one—I think it was the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]—speaking in a scientific way about a man owning everything up to the sky and everything down to the center of the earth.

Mr. STEVENSON. Suppose a man is a tenant and you fine him. You can not put that on the property which he inhabits, because that belongs to another man, does it not?

Mr. FOCHT. There is a vested right of ownership somewhere.

Mr. KEARNS. If the gentleman will yield, I think every State in the Union has found a way to put a fine or an assessment against the tenant.

Mr. FOCHT. The judge knows all about it and is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Did I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to agree with the gentleman from South Carolina that the Supreme Court had held that a man could not be compelled to remove the snow from the sidwalk in front of his house?

Mr. FOCHT. I do not believe the Supreme Court held that. I believe an inquiry was made of the commissioners, and they referred it to the corporation counsel, who said they could not compel the occupant of a house to remove the snow on the adjoining sidewalk under penalty because of the decision of the Supreme Court that when the original owners of the 19 farms now comprising the District of Columbia turned over their land for the purpose of making this the seat of the National Government they donated these streets to the Government and also the sidewalks.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Did the gentleman say that bill will be reported from his committee to-morrow?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; with great pleasure. Now, what question does the next judge want to ask me? [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. I am not a judge; I am a colonel. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. All right, Colonel.

Mr. WINGO. I was just wondering how you can expect people to clean their sidewalks off in eight hours when they can not clean the sidewalks in this great city in five days with thousands of dollars appropriation?

Mr. FOCHT. I do not. Our distinguished colleague, Mr. Moore, who left this House to become mayor of Philadelphia, announces that this day marks the eclipse of the street contract cleaning business in Philadelphia, where they are talking about doing it in another way, and they are going to do away with the contract system and have the city do it. There is a contradiction, therefore, between that situation and the gentleman's suggestion of a contract system here, and I am very sorry that our friend "Hampy" is not present to give us his ideas about it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Suppose the gentleman reports the bill to the House, does he think he will be successful in having the House give him a day on which it may be considered? Has not my friend been quite unfortunate in getting time for the consideration of District measures?

Mr. FOCHT. I may say that if it had been late in the session we might have more strongly urged an opportunity to be heard, but in my judgment, with all the appropriation bills ahead, and various other contingencies arising, I thought that we might not only win the favor of those who occupy the positions of obstructionists and have them remove it, but also to give us their help.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, we have 100 pages of this bill, and if we are going to discuss all of the principles of government, city and otherwise, we never will get through the bill.

Mr. FOCHT. We are discussing the legislative, actual, and practical features of it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That would apply to provisions all through the bill of 100 pages.

Mr. FOCHT. I am only speaking as to the District.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I was hoping that the District Committee might be given to-morrow in view of the many days that have been assigned for District matters, and the committee has given it up for other measures. Instead of taking an adjournment until Monday I hoped that the House might give the gentleman to-morrow.

Mr. FOCHT. I quite agree with the gentleman. The District Committee has worked very constantly all this year and through the last summer—no one more so than the ranking Member from that side, Mr. WOODS of Virginia. And, by the way, I want to say right here that of all the delegation, with rare exception, I know of no delegation from any State at any time since I have been here that has shown more or reflected more of what I would regard as real statesmanship and courtesy and ability than the Texas delegation. [Applause.] They would make you think that they probably had come from some other part of the country—from some section. I want to say that I have the highest regard for the delegation from Texas, and——[Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes, Major; I will yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman expatiated a good deal on the oriole and the mocking bird, and I hope before he gets through he will give us his opinion on the customs of the ground hog. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. Well, there is one thing certain, as far as the gentleman and his party is concerned, they will see their shadow for many, many years. Oh, you do not understand the language of the Lancaster almanac—when the ground hog sees his shadow he goes back into his hole for six weeks. The Democratic Party saw its shadow in 1920, and you can infer the rest.

Now, before my time is up I want to say, pertaining to the District of Columbia and legislation, that you have had very able chairmen before me, and I know I have a hard time to fill the shoes of the gentleman who preceded me. I do not look upon the District of Columbia as a place for exploitation for rent grafters, or real estate pikers, nor market-house crooks; I look upon it as the great center of the greatest Government in the world, and I want to see it progress in that way; I want to see it developed, beautified, and glorified, and make it as great as I once said at a banquet it would be, which was very much exaggerated by one gentleman from Texas, whom, if disposed to do so, I should except from what I have said before. [Laughter.]

On the question of the railroads, my good Texas friend [Mr. HARDY], with whom I have served a long time, said that he was impelled to vote against the bill. If such men as Mr. WOOD, Mr. ZIHLMAN, Mr. REED, Mr. HAMMER, and Mr. MILLSPAUGH, who I see here, are willing to sit up days and nights and formulate a railroad bill, I think their efforts should be given attention, and if you will help us we will get through a bill that will ultimately bring down the fares and give you transfers and greatly improve the service. Anyone who has ever studied the subject of industrial economy knows that the consolidation of these two traction lines, and held to the law by a utilities commission, assuming that the commission is made up of people who are honest, will tend inevitably to reduce the carfare.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota that debate do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF INSURANCE.

Salaries: Superintendent of insurance, $3,500; deputy and examiner, $2,000; statistician, $1,700; clerks—one $1,200, two at $1,000 each; stenographer, $1,000; in all, $11,400.

Mr. RAINEY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise to call attention to a joint resolution, which I send to the desk and request that it be read in my time, providing for the appointment of an ambassador and minister to the new Irish Free State. The resolution calls for a new departure in United States diplomacy. However, I am confident that it meets with the approval of this country, because no longer is the world asked to consider Ireland merely as "England's domestic problem" but as a free and independent State, one to be governed by the self-determination of the Irish people.

That magic formula "self-determination" has marched armies and tumbled empires these last few years, playing too large a part in the world consciousness to be limited by any arbitrary discrimination in the hour of victory and adjustment. Poles, Czechs, Jugo-Slavs, Ukrainians, and Finns have succeeded in securing the respect and attention of the United States; and now that the land that has ever been dear to so many millions of liberty-loving Americans is about to start her onward march to prosperity, what other country more than ours should have a representative on her shores to help her in every honorable way to the success that lies before her?

In December, 1919, Congress, through the agency of the Foreign Affairs Committee, held hearings at which delegates from large bodies of citizens all over the United States discussed a bill authorizing appropriations to send diplomatic representatives from this Government to Ireland. At that time many Members—and, I think, even a majority—were deeply interested. But the thought then arose that if we as a Government should act then, when the question of autonomy for Ireland was still a subject of bitter contest, it might well be construed as an unfriendly act by Great Britain.

Now that Great Britain, as a great Government, has officially before the world of nations acknowledged Ireland as a Free State, there can no longer be any question of unfriendliness for Great Britain on our part.

It is still, of course, a much-debated question whether the Irish plenipotentiaries should have accepted Great Britain's concession of an Irish Free State or should have continued the contest for an independent nation. But the Free State has come into existence and will begin to function, demonstrating to the world that Irishmen can govern themselves and care for the political, commercial, social, economic, and humanitarian interests of Ireland, as well as contribute to the arts and sciences and to the sum total of the world's culture. In the evolution of time, and possibly somewhat sooner if there is an American ambassador and minister and consuls in Ireland, England will give that people a distinct life as a separate nation, if it appears that England's own interests are not hampered or endangered.

One of the reasons that appeals to me strongly why a separate diplomatic mission should be sent from the United States to Ireland is to safeguard against what many fear. The warm-hearted, trusting, ambitious Irish nature is amenable to flattery. Some of our most prominent students of history, and especially Irish sympathizers, can not forget readily what happened in Ulster when the then leaders of the Irish people were cajoled with flattery, with titles, and gifts of land, and for the most part with mere promises.

With the establishment of the Irish Free State the question has arisen on many sides, Will England repeat her achievement of winning over a few leaders, thus leaving the mass of people worse off than before through bitter disappointment of a great expectation blighted? The point I particularly want to make is this: With an American ambassador and minister there keeping in touch with the political situation it will be the duty of such agents of the United States to report to the United States Government, and we here would know the truth. Then, with our loyalty to the Irish cause on account of blood ties, we could prevent any such attempt at British diplomacy. Also the very presence of official representatives of the United States Government would cause Great Britain to go very slow in making any efforts inducing leaders to play traitor to the cause of the Irish people.

When would be a more fitting time for action by the United States Government to show sympathetic desire to aid in the setting up of an effective and stable government in Ireland than now, when the nations of the world are here gathered in the spirit of "peace on earth," and when the negotiations between these two great countries, the United States and Great Britain, could be carried on by the accredited representatives of each in conference?

The time is ripe, the conditions are opportune.

As never before the Irish are united. With the exception of a few pro-[illegible]ing majorities in the north of Ireland, which, press reports assure us, are fast dying out, Ireland to-day needs the guiding hand of a friendly American Government, not to rankle old sores of hatred and discontent but to assist her with sound, practical advice as to the best procedure for her to follow during this trying period of her reconstruction.

In America the Irish have put aside the factional bitterness of the past and stand solidly and squarely in support of Ireland's aspirations to develop and maintain her distinctiveness as a nation.

It is this that makes the movements of the Irish people at present of vital interest to nearly one-fifth of the American people, for in this fair land of ours there are approximately 20,000,000 people of Irish birth or descent woven into the warp and woof of our national life by common aspirations and devotions.

With the silver showing through the clouds after 750 years of trials, tribulations, and suffering never equaled by any race in history, it is not necessary to detail the oft-repeated story of Ireland's struggle, identical with what the patriots of our own country fought and bled and died for.

We have always been proud to follow the leadership of Gen. George Washington, "Father of His Country," "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen"—the only President ever unanimously elected. Where can we find better guidance to-day than to follow the noble example he set, offering his warm heart's strongest freedom-loving sympathies to the oppressed people of Ireland raising their heads in the struggle for human liberty? For Gen. George Washington, with Edward Hand, Adjutant General of the Continental Army, signed their names to the membership roll of the Society of the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick in Philadelphia.

Glance over the brightest pages of American history and you will find written there most gloriously the names of Irishmen unnumbered who signed the Declaration of Independence, who sat in the Continental Congress, and on whom Gen. Washington placed the utmost dependence as trusted officers during the fight of this country for freedom. You will find that 38 per cent of the Revolutionary Army that won American independence was Irish. You will find also that the leading advocate of American rights in the British Parliament and America's best friend in Parliament were men of Irish birth. Here are a few names taken from the most priceless annals of the Revolutionary period:

James Duane, Member of the Continental Congress, son of Anthony Duane, of County Galway, Ireland.
Charles Thomas, secretary of the Continental Congress, born in County Derry, Ireland.
Edmund Burke, the leading advocate of American rights in the English Parliament, born in Dublin, Ireland.
Isaac Barre, "America's greatest friend in Parliament," born in Dublin, Ireland.
Maj. Gen. John Sullivan, of the Continental Army, son of John Sullivan, of Limerick, and Marjery Sullivan, of Cork, Ireland.
George Read, signer of the Declaration of Independence, son of John Read, of Dublin, Ireland.
James Smith, signer of the Declaration of Independence, born in Dublin, Ireland.
Stephen Moylan, colonel of Cavalry, Continental Army, and aid-de-camp to Gen. Washington, born in Cork, Ireland.
Thomas Lynch, jr., signer of the Declaration of Independence, grandson of Thomas Lynch, of Galway, Ireland.
Edward Rutledge, signer of the Declaration of Independence, a native of Ireland.
Maj. Charles McHenry, private secretary to Gen. Washington, born in Antrim, Ireland.
John Barry, father of the American Navy, born in County Wexford, Ireland.
Gen. Andrew Lewis, of the Continental Army, born in Donegal, Ireland, whose statue has been raised in Richmond, Va.
Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, signer of the Declaration of Independence, grandson of Charles O'Carroll, a native of Kings County, Ireland.
George Taylor, signer of the Declaration of Independence, born in Ireland.
Matthew Thornton, signer of the Declaration of Independence, born in Limerick, Ireland.
Thomas McKean, signer of the Declaration of Independence, son of William and Letitia McKean, of County Derry, Ireland.
Gen. Richard Butler, of the Continental Army, born in Dublin, Ireland.
Edward Hand, colonel and adjutant general, Continental Army, born in Kings County, Ireland.
Gen. Richard Montgomery, of the Continental Army, born in County Donegal, Ireland.
Gen. John Shee, of the Continental Army, born in County Meath, Ireland.
Count Arthur Dillon, colonel regiment de Dillon, French-Irish Brigade, a native of Ireland.
Col. Walter Stewart, of the Pennsylvania line, Continental Army, born in Donegal, Ireland.
George Bryan, patriot of the Revolution and governor of Pennsylvania, born in Dublin, Ireland.
Gen. William Irvine, of the Continental Army, born in County Fermanagh, Ireland.

The story of the heroic sacrifices of the men at Valley Forge, Princeton, Trenton, continued for seven centuries would only partly tell the tale of the fight put up by these indomitable people. From 1195 to 1867 virtually every Irish generation had bared its naked breasts against the might of England, only to sink down to defeat and new despair under sheer weight of numbers. From 1870 to 1916 home rule meant Ireland and Ireland meant home rule. The movement and the nation were one and rang through the world with a single great appeal.

For the first time in seven centuries the Irish put armed force aside and submitted their demand for independence to the arbitral justice of an English Parliament. The Irish Republican Brotherhood was a memory, the Fenian leaders lived as exiles, Sinn Fein was not even an anticipation, and a crushed and dispirited Irish people indorsed the decision to substitute constitutional methods for the sword.

Isaac Butt, a Presbyterian Ulsterman, was the father of home rule. As an honest man his sense of fair play made him place his brilliant legal talents at the service of these unhappy scores who were dragnetted after the Fenian uprising of 1867. The infamy of the trials, the packed juries, the bitter prejudice of the judges, all combined to change the intense conservatism of his youth and he soon took rank as a leader in the fight for Irish freedom. The futile rebellions of the past, however, no less than his legal training, led him sharply away from force and he evolved the doctrine of evidence and argument.

For full seven centuries the island had pitted itself against the overwhelming resources of England in war after war, but defeat, exile, and famine joined at last to rob the Irish of strength to continue the struggle on any open field of battle. Yet there was no surrender, no formal submission, no pledge of loyalty, and the period between 1691 to 1916 is one long record of protest, agitation, and insurrection against what? Against the very English rule that your sires and my sires gave their life's blood on the battle fields of the American Revolution.

We find them performing the same deeds of bravery, fighting the same old fight, in 1691; again in 1698. Another century rolls by, and once more, 1716, they cry for their freedom, proclaiming to all the world similar words as those of our own great patriot, "Taxation without representation is tyranny."

Famine scourged the unhappy land in 1726 and again in 1740. Lecky, the noted English historian, recording these instances of human agony as related by an eyewitness, said:

I have seen the laborer endeavoring to work at his spade, but, fainting from want of food, forced to quit it. I have seen the aged father eating grass like a beast, and in the anguish of his soul wishing for his dissolution. I have seen the helpless orphan exposed on the dunghcap, and none to take him, for fear of infection, and I have seen the hungry infant sucking his mother's breast, of the already expired parent.

Helpless, for the army of occupation was always crouched to spring, the Irish were confined to sporadic uprisings until the American Revolution came with its message of courage and inspiration. The shot at Concord echoed nowhere more loudly than in Ireland, and when King George tried to draft 4,000 Irishmen for service against Washington, offering to send Hessians in return, the red hand of Ulster lifted again in one of its old fierce gestures. Ostensibly for the protection of the coast against the French, a volunteer force of 100,000 sprang into being, drawing in men from south and west, Catholics as well as Protestants, and it was this mailed hand that caught at the throat of Parliament.

Threatened, weakened, and sorely tried, England did attempt to alleviate matters for the Irish by promising reforms and enacting legislation, including an Irish Parliament, but once more Ireland was fooled and one of her greatest opportunities for freedom went by. This was 1783.

In 1791 we find scattered bands together once more as the united Irishmen, under the leadership of Wolfe Tone, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and Arthur O'Connor, Protestants all, and Presbyterian in its essence, but with the broad platform of parliamentary reform and Catholic emancipation.

The story of 1797 and 1798, the terrible reign of suffering and oppression that was visited on these unfortunate people, culminating three years later in the infamous "act of union," which the great Gladstone referred to as the blackest page in English history, saying, "I know no blacker or fouler transaction in the history of man than the making of the union between England and Ireland," are too well known to dwell upon here. Nor is it necessary to detail the subsequent uprisings, the failure of the potato crop in 1845, which preceded the famine in 1847.

Between 1848 and 1855 two million left Ireland to find homes in other lands, the bulk of them coming to the United States. Those remaining were oppressed by the most unjust laws, and in 1858 James Stephens first sounded the call for the Irish Republican Brotherhood, a movement dedicated to physical force.

John Mitchel, whose grandson was destined to rule as mayor of the great metropolis of New York, and Thomas Francis Meagher, both leaders in a previous uprising, were in America, after a dramatic escape from Van Dieman's Land, the former wielding his brilliant pen and the latter rising to heights of popularity through heroic leadership of the Irish Brigade in the Civil War.

It was in America that the Fenians formed in 1861, and the spirit of the organization, marching to Ireland with men and dollars, joined hands with the brotherhood and planned the rising of 1867. Again, however, the English spy and the informer were in the inner circles, treachery resulted in the arrest of all the leaders, and the most terrible storm in the history of Ireland broke the force of the uprising as effectively as British arms. From 1870 to 1916, first under the leadership of Butt, then Parnell, then Redmond, the fight for independence was the fight in the English Parliament for home rule.

It is in 1916 that we return again the Irish tradition, the ancient faith that Ireland's freedom can only be won with Irish blood, either shed in battle with victory as the wild hope or in martyrdom to shock the world into attention and some sympathy.

The resentment of the Irish people at the trickery of England and Ulster's unnatural actions in 1914; the bloody battles in the streets of Dublin, Easter week, 1916; the execution of Pearse, the first president of the Irish republic, with his compatriots; the bitter campaigns raged through 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, and up to the signing of the Anglo-Irish treaty, are too familiar to all here for me to repeat; but now that the whole wretched story is ended and Ireland has an opportunity to stand upon her own feet and take her rightful position among the peoples of the world, I say let this country, for which she has such unbounded love and affection, leave nothing undone that might help her make that future rich and prosperous.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION FUND.

For carrying out the provisions of section 11 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, extending to the employees of the government of the District of Columbia the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, $7,000.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a resolution here which I shall ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution expressing the intention of the United States to grant complete and absolute independence to the Philippine Islands within one year and requesting the President to consider the expediency of effecting a treaty of recognition for said republic.

Whereas the Congress of the United States in the Jones law proclaimed its intention to withdraw sovereignty from the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence "as soon as a stable government can be established therein"; and

Whereas the last previous American Governor General of the islands, who served in that capacity more than seven years, officially reported to Congress and the President of the United States that the Filipino people had established the specified stable government, and were therefore entitled to independence; and

Whereas President Wilson in a message to Congress reported the same facts as to the existence of a stable government in the Philippines, recommending that Congress grant independence; and

Whereas the report of the Wood-Forbes special Philippine mission does not show the absence of a stable government in the Philippines, thereby failing to justify longer American sovereignty therein; and

Whereas recent reports from the islands indicate that if the United States does not now keep faith and carry out its solemn pledge of independence to the Philippines the inhabitants thereof will not continue to have the same measure of confidence in and respect for the United States that they now maintain; and

Whereas the loss of the friendship of a nation of 10,500,000 Christian people in the Orient can be avoided and their friendship, affection, and cooperation secured forever by the granting of the independence which the Filipino people are entitled to both by divine right and because the Congress of the United States definitely promised it to them; and

Whereas failure to do this justice to the Filipino people will seriously embarrass the United States before the other nations of the world, especially in view of the principle proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and by the further fact that the United States championed the principle of "self-determination" during the recent war; and

Whereas the recognition of Philippine independence would amount to a saving to the American taxpayers of millions, if not hundreds of millions, of dollars annually: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That it is the purpose of the United States to cease exercising sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to establish an independent government in said islands within one year from the date of the adoption of this resolution; that in pursuance of such purpose the President is respectfully requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Japan, Italy, Spain, China, and other powers for the purpose of effecting a joint treaty with such Governments by which such independent Philippine government shall be recognized; and that the Philippine government thus established shall agree that it will maintain equality of trade relations with all the signatory powers.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up the time of the House at this time to discuss this resolution, but shall do so at a later date.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I wish to give notice now that hereafter I shall object to anything that does not pertain to the item under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

For assessment and permit work, including maintenance of motor vehicles, $225,0000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerks calls attention of the Chair to the fact that there is a clerical error in line 12, page 20.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota: Page 20, line 12, strike out a cipher.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Streets, alleys, and roads.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of asking the chairman if the District has a paving plant of its own for repairs, or are those repairs made by letting contracts for repairs on the streets of the city?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. This work is done by contract. There is some repair work done by the city, but very little; the major part of all this work is done by contract.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, after line 17, insert a new paragraph, as follows:
"Northwest: For paving west side of Connecticut Avenue, Chappell Road to Chevy Chase Circle, 60 feet wide, $58,500."

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revert back to that page, as I happened to be out when the paragraph was read. This relates to the item of street improvement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to offer his amendment, notwithstanding the fact that the paragraph was passed. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I shall demand on this a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw that demand.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that this item for the paving of the west side of Connecticut Avenue was in the estimates submitted by the commissioners and was approved by the Director of the Budget, but cut out of the estimates which were sent to the committee, as were fully 60 per cent of the items under the head of street improvements. Connecticut Avenue is one of the main thoroughfares of the city, connecting up entirely with the Maryland road system. It is the main artery of travel used by approximately 50,000 people, thousands of whom live in the District of Columbia. The District has already paved the east side of the street, and if this item is not included under this head this west side of Connecticut Avenue, one of the main thoroughfares of the city, will remain in the condition it now is for another 12 months. This improvement is necessary. The unemployment conference which was held here in Washington a few months ago recommended that public improvements of this nature be taken up and completed in order to relieve the deplorable condition of unemployment prevailing in the country. There can be no substantial reason advanced why this improvement should not be made. I asked the chairman of the subcommittee the other day why this item was not included, and he stated that this improvement would have to make way for other necessary improvements. Now, as I have previously pointed out, this bill cuts the estimate for street improvements fully 85 per cent. This is one of the essentially needed improvements in the northwestern section of the city. It has been approved by the Director of the Budget. The east side of the street is now paved, and I know of no substantial reason that can be advanced why this improvement should not be made during the coming fiscal year. The District of Columbia is able to raise under the plan of taxation proposed by the commissioners three-fourths of the sum total carried by this bill. This will be no hardship upon the people of the District, because many Members of this House complain that the present taxation is too low and is inadequate at the present time, and under the plan of financing the District that has been adopted, the Government will, of course, pay its 40 or 50 per cent, whatever rate the Congress in its wisdom deems is wise to be expended.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Do I understand the gentleman to advocate a ratio of 75 to 25?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; I did not state that. I stated yesterday, and I repeat now, that if the District raises the sum in taxation the commissioners propose—$14,000,000—and the Government does not contribute any more than is proposed to be contributed by this bill, it will not be much more than 30 per cent. Congress determines on the ratio, but that does not detract from the necessity of this improvement of one of the great thoroughfares leading into this city.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will.

Mr. CROWTHER. Is not that the great thoroughfare that leads out to the principal golf links here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It is.

Mr. CROWTHER. I want to ask seriously if the gentleman knows whether or not it can be well done for the amount of money; if he has any idea of road construction?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state to the gentleman that the figures I carry in my amendment are the figures presented by the Engineer Department of the District of Columbia, who stated that it can be done for the sum carried.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman tell me also whether or not when these contracts are made there is a provision made for the commissioners to appoint inspectors to see that the foundation, which is the very substance of a good road, is laid according to specifications or not?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman will notice that in this bill a great many inspectors are carried. It has been pointed out there are too many inspectors.

Mr. CROWTHER. I know we voted here a year and a half ago for some $60,000 for the improvement of this Bladensburg Road, and I know to-day that $60,000 was wasted.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That was not expended, I will state to the gentleman. The District Commissioners could not have the work done for that sum. The present work there was repair work and does not constitute repaving as provided in the appropriation.

Mr. CROWTHER. All the money that was spent for repairing was wasted, because the road is worse than it ever was before.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I understand what they are trying to do is to get an added sum in order to repave the road.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to speak in opposition?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Now, the gentleman says that one side of this street is paved and the other is not. I wish very briefly to recite the history of this proposition. Two years ago this matter was up before the committee and was stricken out, but afterwards it got in in the Senate for the improvement of one side of the street. The street has already been asphalted and paved for many years and last year one side repaved as far out as Chevy Chase Circle. The gentleman said here that this street leads out to Chevy Chase Circle, where the big bugs live, and so forth.

Mr. CROWTHER. And where our people go for amusement.

Mr. WYANT. Does not that road lead to Ridgeville and other points in Maryland?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I think it does.

Mr. WYANT. And is not this a very much traveled thoroughfare, leading to this road?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It may be, but there are many other roads leading toward Baltimore more than there are this way. I wish to simply state the fact, and I only wish more Members were here in order that I might tell them what the facts are.

This street clear to the circle has been asphalted for many years, but two years ago an appropriation was made, after considerable controversy, and going to the Senate, so that one side of it was repaved. Now, the other side is paved but it is not in as good shape as the new pavement on the right side going out. But I will state that in the hearings two years ago when this matter was up Commissioner Kutz said this:

I know, in fact, that this does not absolutely need repaving anew, but it will be economical to do it, because it will cost less to keep it in repair.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes, sir.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Is it not a fact that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have already laid the water mains and sewers and underground work necessary to paving this street, and that it is in a torn-up condition at this time?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do not know about that. I am talking about the street and its condition now. The point about that was, that if we repave both sides of it, it will take less money each year to keep it in repair. I will admit that the side that was repaved two years ago is in better condition than the other side. We drove down over it the other day. There are some places I know that need repair and improvement. But it is a good, fair pavement all the way, except in certain spots. Now, if the Government wants to appropriate $50,000 to make this a little better all right. I say, a little better, because it would be hardly noticeable except for a slight break or hole in it. I have been over it often. And it leads, furthermore, gentlemen, out into a locality that is used chiefly by men who live in Chevy Chase, outside of the District of Columbia, and in the State of Maryland. Of course, I do not object to that.

I have assisted in making many appropriations for roads leading into Maryland. And they have good roads out there. Mr. Chairman, while it would improve this street by repairing, yet a little repair each year will keep it in very good shape, where you can drive an automobile at a rapid rate over it, without hurting the automobile at all. It is a good street now. But, of course, the other side being paved, the argument is that, "In as much as you have one side paved, you ought to have the other paved." They have got the head of the camel under the tent, and the whole animal must go in now.

The gentleman has misquoted me in one respect, by saying we did not do this because we needed the money for other improvements. I said this, that we ought not to do this thing, because there are other streets of this city that need improvement more than this—a great deal more. Now, we left out only two or three of the 15 or 20 items mentioned in the Budget. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky made the statement the other day, and I agree with him, that where it is built up on both sides with residences, solid, or even 75 per cent, the street ought to be paved, and I do not think we left out a single street where it was built up on either side 75 per cent.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Has the gentleman ever traveled out that road and into Maryland?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Is not that the worst mile of road between the Capitol Building here and Ridgeville? The city of Rockville has even paved its main street.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If the gentleman is going to ask at this time to pave every road in the State of Maryland, it is a different proposition.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to building roads because they lead out into Maryland?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No, sir. You have gotten many hundreds of thousands of dollars out of this city and the Government to build your roads in Maryland outside of the District line, and I have helped put them on for you. But it does not follow that this small road, leading to Chevy Chase Circle, needs $57,000 at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIHLMAN: Page 21, after line 21, insert "Northwest: For paving Wisconsin Avenue between Thirty-fifth Street and Thirty-seventh Street, $55,000."

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will state that this amendment calls for the paving of two squares on Wisconsin Avenue just above Georgetown, which are now paved with Belgian blocks. I am advised by the office of the engineer commissioner that $20,000 of the $55,000 will be paid by the street car company for paving between the tracks, and under the laws of the District of Columbia the property owners will pay half of the remaining $35,000, so that the expense to the District of Columbia will be only $17,500.

Wisconsin Avenue below this section was paved some years ago, and the street car company, that has two tracks on the street, made the plea of poverty and said that because of the condition of their treasury they were unable to build the paving between the tracks, and that has never been paved. But these two squares provided for in this amendment are in an almost impassable condition. The bed of the street car tracks, which occupy the middle of the street, was never intended for the weight of the heavy cars that now use those tracks, and they have sunk down into the middle of the street, and that is pried up with Belgian blocks on each side, so that it is almost impassable for an automobile coming from the west down Wisconsin Avenue to Georgetown.

I may say that I am offering this amendment at the request of some of the business men of Georgetown, who contend that all traffic is diverted down Massachusetts Avenue because people are unable to use Wisconsin Avenue in coming from Maryland to Georgetown.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do I understand that the gentleman is prepared to assure the House that the street car company is finally prepared to do its duty in the premises? Has the gentleman any assurance that they will pay for their share of the paving if it is done?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No. I will say to the gentleman that under the law the Commissioners of the District of Columbia can assess the cost of paving between the tracks against the street car company and can collect the amount due under the law.

Mr. CRAMTON. But is it not a fact that for a number of years they have not succeeded in having that done by the street car companies? Has the gentleman from Maryland any assurance that the Public Utilities Commission can collect it?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. There has never been any difficulty about collecting for the paving between the street car tracks in the city, to my knowledge. What I stated in this instance was that the street car company did not pave the streets between the tracks. There has never been any difficulty on the part of the corporation counsel to collect from these companies, one of which is paying over 10 per cent on its capital and collecting more for its fares than it is entitled to.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not definitely informed, but I recall that a year ago the commissioners stated they were not able to, in compliance with the law. I was wondering whether the tender feelings of the commission would permit them to see to it that the street car companies shall do their part.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Under this amendment there will be sufficient money to pave the street from curb to curb. The street car companies will have to pay $20,000, and the property owners will have to pay one-half of the remainder, and therefore the District of Columbia government will have to pay only one-half of $35,000, or $17,500. I do not see anything in the contention of the gentleman from Michigan that the District Commissioners will not be able to collect this money from the street car companies.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. What is the fact as to the ownership of this line of the company? Is it the Washington Railway & Electric Co., or is it a subsidiary company—that is, the liability is not on the principal company but on the company that really has not the means?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that, under the charter granted by Congress, all these companies that are now within the Washington Railway & Electric Co. are merged, and the common stock which the other day paid a little over 6 per cent dividend is all under one company, and that company controls the Potomac Electric Power Co., which is a very profitable institution.

Mr. EVANS. Does the gentleman say that a judgment against the company owning the line on Wisconsin Avenue could be collected against the property of the Washington Railway & Electric Co.?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, this is another street, not quite so fashionable as the one to Chevy Chase. It is pretty well paved on either side. A portion of it is paved with Belgian blocks, and all that is necessary to keep that in repair is for the able men handling the repairs of streets to repair it a little. That is all. It seems to me unnecessary to appropriate $55,000 for that purpose at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 7, noes 13.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. In spite of the fact that we seem to have an attendance of only about 20 or perhaps as many as 25, I am going to take the liberty of calling attention to one general feature of this bill.

The estimates sent in by the commissioners to the Bureau of the Budget were cut by the bureau to the extent of over $2,600,000. The commissioners requested the subcommittee to consider the items that had been eliminated by the bureau and the reduction which it had made in many other items. The committee, however, declined to do so. Very many of the eliminations and reductions were of estimates proposed for street construction and street repair, but the committee took the view that there was such sanctity attaching to the conclusions of the bureau as to preclude any interference with them. That was stated at the outset by the chairman. I read from the hearings, page 5. The chairman said—and this is the view that he expressed later, and this is the view that was carried into the report and into the bill that we are now considering—

> I am inclined to believe this committee now—I will consult the committee hereafter—will consider they can not take up anything that does not appear in the estimates as they come from the President.

And they did not take up anything except one item, a trifling item of about $700. So we are here now allowing ourselves to be controlled absolutely to the extent of upward of $2,600,000 by the action of the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I should like to ask the gentleman if he voted for the Budget?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; and I approve the budget law now, except that I am perfectly satisfied—and this is parenthetical because it is not in the line of the statement I am proposing to make—that the law ought not to be applied to appropriations for the District of Columbia. But how did the bureau proceed? We have every reason to believe that one individual was intrusted with the duty of passing on the estimates submitted by the commissioners—a gentleman who formerly represented the State of Illinois in the Senate, Mr. Sherman. It seems therefore that the House in dealing with this bill, so far as a great variety of matters are concerned, including the matters to which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] has asked attention, is now expected to defer altogether and finally to the judgment of Mr. Sherman.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Did Senator Sherman, while he was in the Senate, six or eight years or longer, have anything to do with the District of Columbia?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; but it does not seem to me that because of that circumstance we should now follow him blindly in this vitally important business.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Was he not chairman of the District Committee for several years?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Even though he was chairman of the District Committee he should not be permitted to take complete charge of our legislative functions and responsibilities. We should not put the House of Representatives in the hands of a gentleman, however able and reputable he may be, because at one time he happened to be the chairman of the Senate Committee on the District. Now, let us see what occurred at the hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am going to quote from the record of the hearings. Following the statement of the chairman of the committee, already quoted, Mr. Rudolph, one of the commissioners of the District, said:

> Then, Mr. Chairman, the bill here does not reflect the judgment of the commissioners.
>
> Mr. DAVIS. That I grant you; but we have got to go upon the Budget here submitted to us by the President as our estimates.

Mr. RUDOLPH. There may be some mistakes, and some very glaring ones have been made in this bill.
Mr. DAVIS. That is true.
Mr. RUDOLPH. I say that in all deference to the Budget Bureau.
Mr. DAVIS. Anyway, the committee will consider that hereafter; but I say that has been the universal custom of this committee—not to consider any item that did not appear in the estimates.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], who did not share the opinion of the chairman, said:

Commissioner Rudolph, had those who prepared this bill seen your minute and specific statements before this was written?
Mr. RUDOLPH. Yes, sir. What we did, Mr. Johnson, was to send our estimates to the Treasury Department on the 15th day of September for the Bureau of the Budget to consider.
Mr. JOHNSON. And did you have in your estimates then the items to which you now refer?
Mr. RUDOLPH. Yes, sir; a matter of something over $3,000,000 additional. And, as you know, Mr. Dawes called in former Senator Sherman when this bill came up.
Mr. JOHNSON. You were not consulted about any item that was taken out?

Now, listen to this, as indicating how little consideration the estimates of the commissioners received:

Mr. RUDOLPH. Mr. Sherman did confer with Col. Kutz and Capt. Oyster and briefly with me over the phone.

From this we can understand what transpired. Mr. Sherman was called in, and when the critical moment came, he at one end of the telephone and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia at the other end of the telephone, had some conference, and later the decisions of Mr. Sherman were incorporated in the Budget submitted to Congress. His decisions were accepted by the subcommittee and the Committee on Appropriations as conclusive, and are now pressed upon us as an adjudication which is beyond question. I appeal to the common sense of Members as to whether it is not little less than monstrous that the House should for a moment consider abdicating its authority in any such way as that? I read again from the hearings another conversation between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and Commissioner Rudolph.

Mr. JOHNSON again inquired upon whose judgment so many street items were cut out by the bureau. Mr. Rudolph said, "I do not know." Mr. Keller said, "We were not consulted." Then Mr. JOHNSON asked, "Have you any information as to who went with the Budget committee or anybody else to review these projects that were cut out?" Mr. Rudolph said, "No, sir." Mr. BUCHANAN, a member of the subcommittee, asked, "Did they actually review these projects?" Mr. Rudolph said, "I do not know, sir." Then Mr. TINKHAM, who is also a member of the subcommittee, asked this very relevant question, "Is there anyone here who represents the Budget committee?" Mr. Rudolph said, "I do not know, sir." In fact, no one appeared to explain or defend Mr. Sherman's action.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The subcommittee accepted Mr. Sherman's drastic reduction of the estimates of the commissioners, declining to interfere with them, and inviting no disclosure of the reasons on which they were based. When the matter of sewers was reached by the subcommittee, Mr. Rudolph said:

Appropriations for sewers, cleaning, and repairing. We asked for $100,000, and they put in $80,000.
Col. KELLER. Right there, on behalf of the sewer department, I want to say that $100,000 won't begin to do the work and, with $100,000 only, a great deal of necessary cleaning and the routine portion of the work will have to be neglected.
Mr. JOHNSON. Are you advised, Colonel, on what authority the reduction from $100,000 to $80,000 was made?
Col. KELLER. I have not the faintest idea what the explanation is.
Mr. JOHNSON. You have no means of knowing whether it was based on scientific information or guesswork?

Is not the situation most remarkable? We, who are charged with the grave duty of legislating for the District, are told that we perform that duty and divest ourselves of responsibility by a wholesale, uninformed submission to the views and opinions of Mr. Sherman as to streets, sewers, and many other matters.

I have nothing unpleasant or derogatory to say of Mr. Sherman. But I do condemn the construction that is being placed on the Budget law and the system that construction has created. I hope very much that my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will give us the benefit of his opinion during this debate. I have great respect for him. I know that some have reckoned him as hostile to the District, but I know him to be a man of very fine qualities of intellect and character, who is guided by the sincerest desire to do what is best for the country and the District.

I heartily wish that there might be substituted for this bill such a bill as he, having wide knowledge of conditions here, might, in conference with the commissioners, determine to be a wise and just measure.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up very much time. I am a little surprised to hear the gentleman from Virginia say that he is in favor of abolishing the Budget system, in so far as it applies to the District of Columbia. It is good enough for the balance of the United States, but not good enough for the District of Columbia. I am a little surprised at that, although he says he voted for the Budget system. I know that the District of Columbia is different from any other part of the United States. But I am about as conversant with the action and conduct of the management of the business of the District of Columbia as is the gentleman from Virginia. I have been on the floor of this House for nearly 20 years, and three-quarters of that time I have been connected with the District of Columbia affairs. Now, I wish to say further that while the gentleman says he does not wish to criticize Senator Sherman, I would like to state what experience Senator Sherman had with the District of Columbia.

I believe he was there five or six years as chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia in the Senate. Of course, I know that he knows perhaps more than I do, but I will not say that he knows more about the District of Columbia than my friend from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]. However, I think he has gone more into details concerning the District of Columbia in the last six or eight years than has my friend from Virginia. I am satisfied that I have also gone into them as much as he has. Let us see now who these other men are—lovely men, big men. Commissioner Rudolph is one of the finest men I ever met. What experience has he had compared with Senator Sherman? He has been commissioner for only lately—only a few months—but a number of years ago, 8 or 10 years ago, he was connected for a short time with the District of Columbia government. That was years ago. His recent knowledge is based upon a few months.

How about Commissioner Oyster? What wonderful experience has he had with the District of Columbia affairs, outside of the private business that he has been engaged in? Has he been examining these streets; has he been examining these sidewalks and alleys? Has he been examining the schools and other matters of governmental nature? While he is an estimable gentlemen, I must insist that his experience is somewhat limited along this line. How about Commissioner Kutz? He is the engineer commissioner. When Commissioner Kutz left here with six years' experience he knew very much about the affairs of the District of Columbia. Commissioner Keller has been acting only a few months.

Are men like Senator Sherman, who had particularly to do with the District for five or six years as chairman of the committee in the Senate, and myself, with an experience of 18 or 20 years in connection with the subject, to be set aside and have it said that we know nothing about the District of Columbia?

How about the Budget? The gentleman from Virginia has said that he voted for the Budget, but he does not think it ought to apply to the District of Columbia. He thinks it ought to apply to the city of Chicago, the city of New York, and the balance of the United States. I was surprised to hear him make that statement. I propose to put into the RECORD exactly what my views are in respect to the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The Budget act, which is permanent law, requires that the President shall transmit to Congress on the first day of each regular session the Budget, and provides that the Bureau of the Budget, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe—and he has prescribed these rules—shall prepare for him the Budget and any supplemental or deficiency estimates, and to this end shall have authority to assemble, correlate, revise, reduce, or increase the estimates of the several departments and establishments. That refers to all of the departments of the Government. My friend from Virginia says that ought not to apply to the District of Columbia, but to all of the other departments of the Government in which 110,000,000 people are interested. The Budget is all right for them.

No one will contend, not even myself, that the President or the Director of the Bureau of the Budget within the time allotted personally could go into the multitudinous details of the estimates presented by the several spending agencies, not only of the District of Columbia, but of all of the United States. I think I should say here that my friend from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], without a dissenting voice from me, put in the estimates of the commissioners. Have you ever before heard of the estimates of any other department going into the record? No; but it was done in this particular instance. The estimates put into the record are usually the Budget Bureau estimates set forth in this particular case. It so happened that the Director of the Budget prevailed upon Senator Sherman to make a study of the estimates for him and for the President, and we must certainly all concede that the director acted wisely in getting the aid and service of a man of such caliber as former Senator Sherman, who is so well versed in District matters. The director certainly would not have felt like relying on some one without experience or who was not conversant with District matters.

I think those who are criticizing him now would be among the first to condemn him if he had pursued a course and picked out a man who had no knowledge of the affairs of the District. He picked out a man who, I think, knew as much about it as any man, barring possibly my friend, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. I am somewhat amused to see the pride and glory with which some men are praising Mr. JOHNSON now. Look at some of the things that occurred a few years ago, how the gentleman from Kentucky was then condemned for his attitude on matters respecting the District. It must be borne in mind that under the Budget system appropriations and revenues go hand in hand. That was the principal object of the Budget system. The law requires, as in the case of the regular estimates, that whenever supplemental or deficiency estimates reach an aggregate which, if they had been contained in the Budget, would have required the President to make a recommendation for new taxes, loans, or other appropriate action looking to the provision of means to pay the bills, that such a recommendation shall be submitted, and where we add accounts here in excess of the Budget proposals, we are adding to the Treasury demands without knowledge as to whether or not the demands can be met, and are running directly opposite to what we require of the President.

If we should begin here to ignore the Budget proposals, as suggested by my friend from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], the first thing that will happen is that when our action has been summed up at the end of the session we will find that we have appropriated beyond our means. That applies to the whole United States. Of course, it may be said that a thousand dollars or so here and there would make no particular difference, but we do not wish to begin the practice, because if the precedent should once be established we will find it very difficult to stem the tide of future onslaughts. Either follow the Budget, take their estimates, and do the best we can with them, or else abolish the Budget system. Shall we follow the advice of my friend from Virginia and abolish the Budget system as far as the District of Columbia is concerned and let the balance of the United States operate under it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. Mr. Chairman, I do not think my friend from Minnesota has answered the proposition that I advanced. He does not answer it when he says that I disapprove of the Budget plan so far as the District is concerned. I could, if time permitted and the patience of the House afforded an opportunity, draw a very distinct line between the operation of the plan as to the District and its operation as to various governmental departments. Whatever I may think on that point, however, the fact remains that there is nothing in the budget law that compels the Committee on Appropriations and this Congress to "go it blindly" in following the recommendations of the bureau. The gentleman in undertaking to defend what has occurred—the appointment of Mr. Sherman—and leaving the entire subject to be dealt with by him, says where could anybody have been found who knows more about the District, and that Mr. Sherman has more knowledge of District conditions than the gentleman from Minnesota or myself.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman stated he was appointed. He was not appointed; he was simply asked to be an advisor to Mr. Dawes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Even so. Whatever the gentleman from Minnesota may know or not know about conditions in the District and whatever I may know or not know, the cold fact remains, and this is the only thing I am directing attention to now, that the officials of the Government did not themselves act, but selected an outsider to act for them.

The Budget officials drew into the situation a gentleman who was once, but is not now, connected with the Government and apparently turned over to him the entire subject, to be dealt with in his discretion. And now it is argued that that having been done, and the heart having been cut out of the estimates of the commissioners, we must stand in a wholly submissive and uncomplaining attitude.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Excuse me, sir; I contradict that flat-footedly. I said he came before the committee, of which I was the chairman, the committee upon which I have served for 20 years, and I exercised some discretion about this matter, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is on that committee and he did also.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Any gentleman on this floor who chooses to read the hearings, whether he is a lawyer or a layman, will find out that there was practically no investigation of estimates sent in by the commissioners which were turned down by Mr. Sherman. A few hours of talk about them, occupying a few pages, and that was all, but there was no real inquiry as to why the estimates were mutilated or as to whether they were meritorious in whole or meritorious in part. On one side was Mr. Sherman, who did not confer with the commissioners, and on the other side the committee saying, "We will take what he did and we will reject the recommendations and protests of the commissioners."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that I had said all that was necessary relative to the Budget estimates which had been made for the District of Columbia. During the hearings I arrived at the conclusion that the Budget recommendations had been perfunctorily made rather than scientifically made. For that reason I asked the questions which have just been read from the hearings by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], and others in the same direction which he has not read. We all recognize ex-Senator Sherman as a man of very great ability; but I for one am unable to see why, as an ex-Member of the Senate, his judgment should be conceded to a greater extent than when he was a Member of the Senate. As a Member of the Senate, he had much to do with District of Columbia legislation, but I do not believe with his experience in that direction, and from what I know of his former life and general character, that he is sufficiently equipped to compete in judgment with an engineer Army officer of admitted ability as to the cost of construction of sewers and streets. I can see very well how he can exercise good judgment as to whether or not a street is in good or bad condition, but I am unable to see how he can go so far as to reduce the actual estimate made by the Engineer Department as to what a street or a sewer is to cost. Having more confidence in the capacity of the Engineer Department for that peculiar character of work than I have in that of an untrained man for that sort of work, throughout the hearings I preferred to accept the opinion, particularly as to scientific subjects, of the Engineer Commissioner and his assistants rather than that of a layman.

Throughout my service here I have never been guided by either friendship or enmity toward the District of Columbia. Instead, I have undertaken to hew to the line as judgment and conscience told me I should, regardless of whether it pleased or displeased. I am following that policy to-day. Until this session I have never been upon an appropriating committee. If, long ago, I had been upon an appropriating committee I would have recognized the opinions of men trained in a science rather than the opinions of those, no matter what their ability in other directions may be, who are not so trained. I would have great respect for the opinion of Senator Sherman relative to any law of the District of Columbia. As to his legal opinion, I would as soon defer to it as to that of any other man I know, but when it comes to the construction of streets and sewers I must insist that I prefer to have the opinion of competent engineers. And for that reason I have taken the position which I now take relative to these matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For current work of repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, including resurfacing and repairs to asphalt pavements with the same or other not inferior material, and including the maintenance of motor vehicles used in this work, and including an allowance of not to exceed $26 per month for an automobile for use for official purposes, $431,250. This appropriation shall be available for repairing pavements of street railways when necessary; the amounts thus expended shall be collected from such railroad companies as provided by section 5 of "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia," approved June 11, 1878, and shall be deposited to the credit of the appropriation for the fiscal year in which they are collected.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. On page 22, line 18, I move to strike out the figures "$431,250" and insert "$575,000" in lieu thereof.

And I wish to say for the information of the House that——

Mr. WALSH. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIHLMAN: Page 22, line 18, strike out the figures "$431,250" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$575,000."

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that the figures I have offered as an amendment are the figures carried in the appropriation bill for the present fiscal year. This appropriation, under the head of repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys, has been cut, in round figures, about $140,000. As previously pointed out, this bill has been cut by the Director of the Budget and the subcommittee more than $8,000,000 below the actual needs for improvement work here in the District of Columbia, and in order to show where these cuts apply and the drastic reductions that have been made, I offer this amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I certainly oppose the amendment, and I do so with the unanimous consent, I think, of the entire subcommittee. After full discussion, we considered that this amount was all that was necessary at this time for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that this appropriation is available for repairing pavements of street railways and the amounts to be collected. As I recall, when the last appropriation bill was under consideration, there was a large amount of money due the Government or the District from one of the street railway companies, arising out of repairs and construction of a bridge. Has that money ever been collected? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman is talking of repairs to bridges, or about collecting fees for carrying passengers?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; the latter.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The law is that they shall pay half a cent for each passenger carried. As to whether there has been a correct count kept of that or not I have my doubts, but at the time the last bill was before the committee here they were $60,000 behind, and the committee put in a provision increasing the power of the legal body in the District of Columbia to enforce collection, and I am sorry to say that my friend here made a point or order on the provision. It was afterwards put in, and now they have it all paid up but $6,000, as I understand.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TEMPLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution:

Senate concurrent resolution 18.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there shall be printed 16,800 additional copies of Senate Document No. 114, Sixty-seventh Congress, entitled "Message of the President of the United States, transmitting the report of the International Joint Commission concerning the improvement of the St. Lawrence River," of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room, 500 copies for the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 100 copies for the Senate Committee on Commerce, 10,000 copies for the House document room, 1,000 copies for the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and 200 copies for the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. FLETCHER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Department of Commerce.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPAIRS TO SUBURBAN ROADS.

For current work of repairs to suburban roads and suburban streets, including maintenance of motor vehicles used in this work, $200,000.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to this paragraph. On page 23, line 17, I move to strike out the figures "$200,000" and insert "$250,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIHLMAN: Page 23, line 17, strike out the figures "$200,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$250,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish merely to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this is the amount carried in the appropriation bill for the current fiscal year for the repair of suburban roads. The commissioners have stated that this fund is inadequate, and I have therefore offered an amendment carrying the same sum as was appropriated for this same purpose last year.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will inform the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, that there was not much objection to this when the Commissioners themselves said that the cost of materials for these repairs had been reduced about 25 per cent, so that this extra $50,000 which was cut off was cut off in consequence of the reduction in the cost of material and labor, so that they themselves said this $200,000 would do as much work in the coming year as $250,000 would do a year ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Highway Bridge across Potomac River: Draw operators—2 at $1,020 each, 2 at $720 each; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; labor, $2,000; power and miscellaneous supplies and expenses of every kind necessarily incident to the operation and maintenance of the bridge and approaches, $6,340; in all, $14,700.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIHLMAN: Page 25, line 2, after the figures "$14,700," insert "Masonry bridge across Rock Creek on line of Calvert Street, $180,000."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to state that this is one of the estimates that was submitted by the commissioners. Four years ago the unsafe condition of the bridge on Calvert Street across Rock Creek was called to the attention of Congress, and Congress in the appropriation bill for 1917 appropriated $6,000 for the drafting of plans for this bridge. The present bridge is a dangerous wooden structure and is unsafe. It carries the entire street car traffic that goes out Connecticut Avenue. A number of Members of this House have spoken to me of the urgent need for this bridge. It carries the heaviest street cars, the Chevy Chase street cars, operating here in the District of Columbia.

Congress recognized the need of a modern structure at that point four years ago, and there has been spent $6,000 on plans, and my amendment provides an initial appropriation of only $180,000 for this new bridge, which, when completed, will cost approximately $1,200,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, in yesterday's Evening Star the following item appears:

Says cars are safe on Calvert Bridge. Traction engineers declare every precaution will be taken there.

The text is as follows:

The Capital Traction Co. and its engineers feel that the snow has not endangered the safety of the Calvert Street Bridge, but will take every precaution to assure the continued safety of street car traffic across it, President George E. Hamilton said to-day.

This is said by President George E. Hamilton, of the Capital Traction road, whose roads runs across it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I infer from the gentleman's reading that article that there was some doubt about the safety of this bridge.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No; there was some question as to the snow, as there has been all over the city, concerning roofs and everything else. The question was asked, "Will not the snow smash that bridge?"

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the bridge was closed to traffic.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am going to read the article:

Fear that the heavy snow of a few days past had placed the bridge in a perilous condition was discounted by the traction company officials to-day, and unless some direct evidence that the structure is in a precarious condition comes up, the street cars will continue in operation across it. The snow was cleared off the bridge before traffic across it was resumed.

That is something commendable.

I have read this article simply to show that the man most interested, who is at the head of the street car company whose tracks and cars cross that bridge, says it is in no danger at all, that it is perfectly safe—George E. Hamilton:

The District Commissioners included an item for $180,000 for the start of construction of a new bridge across Rock Creek at Calvert Street in their recently submitted estimates for the next fiscal year. The item was stricken from the list of District appropriations in the office of the Budget Director. The total cost of the proposed bridge, plans for which have been approved by both the commissioners and Fine Arts Commission, is estimated at $1,200,000.

It would be a five-span structure of masonry. The central span in the plans measures 155.7 feet and is flanked on each side by a 103-foot span, while one 16-foot span would be placed on each side of these smaller spans.

Since 1917 the plans have been lying unused in the District Building. In that year George O. Totten drew them up and presented them to the commissioners, following authorization for such steps by Congress. Since that time the commissioners have made repeated attempts to obtain the initial appropriation, but have failed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He does not say anything about making provision for this structure in the future. I understood from what the gentleman said that it is dangerous and dilapidated and being worn out.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am simply reading the statement of the man highest up in authority; that is George E. Hamilton, president of the Capital Traction Co., who says it is not true; that the bridge is all right and perfectly safe for traffic.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course, that is pretty good authority.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. In my judgment George E. Hamilton would not allow his cars to run over a bridge if there was any danger of its going down.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should hope not.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I should hope not, too.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe that when the history and the use of this bridge are thoroughly understood this proposition will have no support. A good many years ago the street car company built this bridge for its necessary street car operation. After a little while the street car company generously (?) made to the District of Columbia a present of half the bridge in order that the District of Columbia might contribute toward its maintenance. Within perhaps 200 or 250 feet of the north end of the Calvert Street bridge is the north end of the million dollar cement bridge on Connecticut Avenue, and the distance between the million dollar bridge on Connecticut Avenue and the south end of this bridge is only about two squares. Now, at public expense, there has been built a million dollar cement bridge along Connecticut Avenue for the use of the general public, but the street car company must have a new bridge for their own use within a few hundred feet of where we now have a million dollar cement highway bridge. No provision is made in this contemplated appropriation that the street car company shall pay one cent for its construction or maintenance, when the street car company will be the principal user of it. Now, tell me why, in the name of common sense, should the people be taxed to build a bridge for the street car company with no provision in it that the street car company shall participate even in its maintenance?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Is not this bridge on a line with Calvert Street, which is one of the great thoroughfares of the city?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is on Calvert Street.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It is not a bridge over a river. It is a bridge over the valley of Rock Creek Park.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But the public does not need it, because there is a public highway bridge right along by the side of it. But the street car company does need it, because it can not operate its cars over the million dollar cement bridge on Connecticut Avenue, which is within a few hundred feet of it.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. EVANS. Is there a legal or a moral obligation to construct a bridge where a street crosses Rock Creek Park, as does Calvert Street.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am unable to see that there is.

Let us take another view of it. We have two street car systems, one the Washington Electric, which has about 131 miles of tracks in the District, the other, the Capital Traction Co., which has about 70 miles in the District. The Capital Traction Co. has its trackage through the congested part of the town, and the cars are always full. The other company not only has trackage through the congested part of the town but into the suburbs of the District of Columbia, where empty cars frequently run, and from which they get little revenue and which are consequently operated at a loss. In order to keep the weaker company in operation an 8-cent fare has been fixed by the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia. In order to keep the people from leaving the company which is not making a living and flocking to that which is making a living the fare has to be made the same for both companies. The Capital Traction Co. admits, if we can rely on newspaper statement, that they are receiving nearly 11 per cent on their investment, and, admittedly, they are receiving more than they are asking for. Tell me why they should not take the money surplus derived from a too large car fare and build their own bridge, instead of coming to Congress and asking the taxpayers to build a bridge for them, when for the public there is a bridge within 250 feet of the site of this bridge?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts insist on his point of order?

Mr. WALSH. I do, that it is unauthorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read line 1, page 26 of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We are getting to an important item, which is likely to evoke some comment, the item for streets, and I wondered how late the gentleman from Minnesota intends to run.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am ready to continue or ready to quit.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the frame of mind in which gentlemen seem to be, I regret to take up any of the time even for a moment; but if I may be allowed just a moment, having reached this question of streets and street cleaning, I want to make a few observations relative to the situation in the city. Coming down from my home this morning, walking to the Capitol, the street the sidewalks of which were the best cleaned of snow and ice was a street bordered by plain, two-story buildings, occupied I think wholly by colored people. For the entire length of the street the sidewalks were cleaned their full length and width and were in a dry and excellent condition. The dwellers along that street had sufficient civic pride and sufficient realization of their responsibility to clean their sidewalks.

On the same journey I passed a palatial residence that cost at least half a million dollars and not a particle of snow had been removed from the sidewalk abutting and adjacent to that palatial property. I passed the homes of the fairly comfortable and well to do, in front of some of which there had been no effort to clean the snow during the five days since it fell. I found stores in this city transacting large business with the sidewalks covered with snow and ice, dangerous for customers and pedestrians that pass along. I commend to these white folks, to these rich folks, these folks engaged in business, the example of the colored dwellers along the street to which I first referred.

Since I have been in Congress we have enacted, I do not know how many, laws compelling the removal of snow and ice from the sidewalk by adjacent property owners. The courts have held them unconstitutional. I have a high regard for the judgments and decisions of the courts, and yet I find it very difficult to understand how it is that it is unconstitutional for a municipality to require owners and occupants to keep the sidewalks in front of the premises owned or occupied by them in a condition to render them reasonably safe for the passing public.

I can not quite understand why people are allowed to build residences at great cost and hold vacant lots which the growth of population renders valuable and still be relieved of all responsibility in the matter of keeping their premises clean of snow and ice.

I hope the District Committee will be able to frame a law that will stand, a law so carefully framed that it will get by these tender-hearted judges, these judges tender of the alleged rights of property holders and tenants—a law under which the people of this Capital City will be required to keep their sidewalks clean and free from snow and ice and in a condition in which they are safe for those who find it necessary to use them.

While we are discussing this matter it might be well to recall that the newspapers of this city, when they have not been blaming the Congress for an alleged failure to provide funds for the cleaning of ice and snow from the streets, have been blaming the commissioners because they did not use the funds they have for the purpose. Up to this time, however, I have not seen any reference in any newspaper of the city to the flagrant, almost criminal, failure on the part of many of the very respectable people of this city to clean their sidewalks of snow and ice. The Federal Government is expected to do much for Washington, and does do much for Washington, and expects to do much for Washington; it is high time, however, that the people of Washington realized their duty and responsibility and acquired a civic pride which will incline them to clean away from their premises the snow and ice which is a menace to life and limb. If I may be so bold, may I suggest to the newspapers of this city that in discussing the question of cleaning away the snow and the ice they suggest to the good people of this town that if they can not hire some one to clean their sidewalks, they get a shovel and do it themselves? [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think there should be a quorum here to listen to the reply to this speech.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10101, and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the privileged resolution which I introduced yesterday, respecting the right of Congress to fix the size and nature of the Military Establishment to be maintained by the United States, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I do not see what jurisdiction the Committee on Foreign Affairs has over a resolution referring to the military and naval forces of the United States and appropriations therefor.

Mr. COCKRAN. This does not refer to the question of appropriations. It merely raises the right of treaties with foreign powers.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman from Massachusetts think that the committee having jurisdiction of this is the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WALSH. It does not apply to foreign affairs, in my judgment.

Mr. COCKRAN. I submit it does, because it deals with the question of treaties with foreign powers.

Mr. WALSH. It is dealing with the right of treaties to be made and depriving Congress of the jurisdiction of appropriations for military and naval forces in the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that if the Chair would refer it he would refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, may I offer this suggestion: I said what I did to the gentleman from Massachusetts in all seriousness, because those of the Committee on the Judiciary who were present know that the Supreme Court has settled this question. The Constitution says that a treaty is the supreme law of the land. The courts have held that a treaty is like any other law and may be repealed by an act of Congress. It involves a judicial question, and it occurs to me that the Committee on the Judiciary is the proper committee to which to refer a resolution of this kind. If it is necessary for this House to express itself upon that question, it is a judicial question, and I think the Committee on the Judiciary ought to have the resolution and not the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair recollects, this question came up before and Judge Tucker, of Virginia, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, made a very elaborate report upon it. However, the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.
